which France had acquired on the continent of Europe? It was not the power attained by preserving those islands in our possession that rendered us capable of contending with France, so far as regarded her continental power, because it was not exactly of the same sort. France had acquired a power by which other powers were less safe, but which she had rendered safe by rounding her territories; but would the possession of the West India Islands have the same effect with respect to this country? So far from increasing the means of this country, it brought with it rather weakness than strength; it divided our means and our resources, and certainly the acquisition of those resources we should acquire afforded no new means of defence, nor any means of counterbalancing the advantages acquired by France in India. This was felt at the negotiation at Lisle, in which it was fully understood that the West-India Islands could be no counterbalance to the power of France. If we had possessed the means of counterbalancing the power of France by means of our West-India Islands, then it must follow that ministers were highly to blame in giving up those means; but it had not been proved that we possessed them. It was likewise to be recollected, that whilst we possessed no means of controlling France upon the continent, it was only by means of the West-India Islands, to which she would direct her attention, that we had any means of influencing her, through the medium of the trade which she would establish and carry on in those islands.—He had heard no definite proposition made as to the propriety or expediency of continuing the war; it seemed, according to the arguments of gentlemen on the other side, that we were to carry on the war merely for the purpose of taking the chance of whatever might occur; they did not state a probability of effecting a change in the state of Europe, but they were contented with a bare possibility. According to these arguments, we were to continue the war for the mere purpose of not being at peace. We were to go to war merely for the possibility of a change in the affairs of Europe; and if this did not happen soon, we might exhaust our resources before it did happen; and, supposing it did not happen in any reasonable time, we should be under the necessity of making peace upon terms much less honourable and advantageous to this country. There were gentlemen on the other side who thought it was right to make peace, but contended that the peace showed that we had completely failed in all the objects of the war. A failure on our part there had been none; the object of the war had always been stated to be, to provide for our safety; we had not failed; so far from it, we were then in that House, after escaping from the revolutionary furor to which almost every power which had come into contact with it, except ourselves, had fallen a victim. Here we were in the midst of our ancient constitutional rights. We had been engaged with Europe, in which we could only assist; but it was never imagined that we were to overcome the enemy by dint of our own strength. They all remembered the time when the dread of French principles was so great, that Mr. Burke said, it was better to be conquered by any other nation than to yield to the principles of France, who had voluntarily torn herself from the civilized world, from which it was evident they meant to keep no terms with society. Surely, then, it was a consolation that France had now shown a disposition to enter into the pale of society, into which she was proceeding as fast as circumstances would admit!—If Buonapartè had taken measures to extirpate Jacobinism, whatever might be his conduct on other occasions, he had certainly done a real service to mankind. The conduct of Buonapartè in this instance was certainly founded on good policy; as, if Jacobinism should be established in France, no other government could enjoy repose; and if Jacobinism should be established any where else, it was clear that no government could exist in France. If Buonapartè wished to extirpate Jacobinism, it was certainly sound policy, as, whilst it was suffered to exist there was no security for the existence of government there or any where else.—With respect to the cession of Louisiana to Spain, the value and importance of that cession had been only discovered within a few nights preceding; and he believed that the question had been over-looked before, not only by them but by their ancestors. It was formerly in the possession of France, when France was perfectly alive to her own interest; but she had not been able to draw from it those advantages which it was contended might be derived from it. Louisiana was ceded to them by the treaty of 1763. His right hon. friend had said, that Spain would feel a rankling spite against this country, for agreeing to the cession of Louisiana; but for this he could see no reason; it was the voluntary cession of Spain. With respect to the danger arising from it, he could not perceive that degree of injury to this country which had been portrayed. It was ceded to France at the peace of 1763, and no danger was then apprehended from that cession, though the ministers of that day were fully competent to discover that danger, if it really existed. The only danger likely to result from it that he could discover, rose from bringing France in contact with the united states of America. It might happen, in the course of ages, that some danger might result from this connexion, but it would not soon be so. He had much doubt whether the treaty of Utrecht, alluded to by the hon. baronet, would have prevented the cession of Louisiana by Spain. All that that treaty declared was, that Spain should not cede any of her territories to France; but, Louisiana having been ceded to France by the treaty of 1763, it became a question whether the cession of it now again to France was a breach of that treaty.—With respect to the non-revival of treaties, he was of opinion, that those gentlemen who had brought forward arguments against this omission in the definitive treaty, had argued against themselves. They had brought forward claims on the part of France, which they admitted were utterly destitute of foundation. They had assumed an injustice on the part of France, and proved that former treaties ought to have been revived by the very same arguments which would render those treaties absolutely nugatory; for, if France disregarded treaties for the purpose of reviving former claims, which had been settled by those treaties, then all treaties with her would be useless. If this was the character of the French government, we ought to be constantly at war with her, and publicly to state the reason of it. Confidence begot confidence; and if we entertained these opinions of France, we should be acting in the same manner as the French directory, who received every declaration of ours with a declaration on their side that they doubted our sincerity. It was certainly not fair to put into the mouth of France claims and pretensions which we ourselves reprobated and condemned.—With respect to the general ground of the revival of former treaties, he was not disposed to admit the propriety of it; but he supposed that some motive which he had not been able to discover, had induced the renewal of former treaties in other negotiations. There were some instances at least in which, as in the present case, if former treaties were renewed, they would be renewed without an object to refer to. France had generally begun in former treaties with the renewal of the treaty of Westphalia, and proceeded forward from thence. It was asserted, that we had in this instance departed from the established law of nations; but respecting the practice, it was not so uniform as it seemed to be supposed. Treaties had been before made with France, in which no mention was made of former treaties; in the treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht, for instance, no mention was made of former treaties; yet Europe stood as before. There were several treaties between this country and France, which, if now renewed, would not only have no object to refer to, but would be absolutely contrary, in their operation, to the present situation of affairs. In adverting to the renewal of former treaties, it should have been stated for what purpose they ought to be renewed; for unless gentlemen could show him some benefit to be derived from that renewal, he could see no reason for it. One effect was stated to be the consequence of this omission, which was, that all treaties, not renewed, fell to the ground. There were some which he thought it was of little consequence whether they fell to the ground or not. For instance, if a cession was made, it became absolutely part of the dominion of the country to which it was ceded; it was of no consequence that the treaty was not renewed in the event of a war and a subsequent peace, as the territory ceded could not revert back to the party ceding. Thus, with respect to the Bay of Honduras, which had been alluded to, it was said to be doubtful; our right to cut logwood there was not done away by the non-renewal of former treaties. In the first place, however, it was not very clear that we derived our title to it from a treaty; and, in the next, we were in possession of the right of property at the commencement of the war, which we had retained, and still held at the conclusion of the war. The right of property, therefore, still remained in this country, and there could not be a clause inserted in the treaty to give us that which we had never lost; we merely restored what we had taken possession of; what we had before possessed in our own right, must remain vested in the same manner, without any necessity for its being so stipulated by treaty. With respect to these treaties, the ground on which gentlemen contended was, that we were left in that quarter of the globe without security or safety against the claims which France might set up against us. It was a singular circumstance, if the treaty set aside all claims, that we should still be subject to them. We had got into a whimsical debate upon the subject. They all agreed that there was no doubt as to our rights; yet they were discussing among themselves whether France might not dispute those claims with us. It seemed we were to implore France to negotiate with us on a subject, in respect of which we said there was no dispute. The offer ought to come from her. No, it was said, we must go to France and state to her certain claims which we requested her to give up; and it was perfectly natural to suppose that France, finding she had such claims, would demand a compensation for giving them up; this was a complete inversion of our situation; we were to ask her not to attempt what she had not attempted. The definitive treaty gave France nothing but the factories and possessions which she had at the commencement of the war. Under the treaty of 1783, she might claim, according to the provisions of that treaty, various rights with respect to trade, founded upon ancient documents: but we now gave her nothing but what we had taken from her during the war. He should like to know whether a question could be set up as to her claims of right of trade under that treaty. He should have thought that France, if she set up any claims, would do it under the convention of 1787, that being in his opinion the only plausible claim which she could make. By saying that we gave her factories, it was a question which might be started, whether we gave her those rights of trade which she formerly enjoyed, whether those rights were restored as they existed before the war, or whether France only received her possessions according to the letter of her treaty? But in all his reading, he had never met with the question which was now started, that France might pass by the commencement of the war, and mount up to any indeterminate period, for the purpose of establishing claims. He had never heard any such question arise out of a treaty; the single question was, whether she acquired only by the treaty, or received the privileges which she enjoyed at the commencement of the war? If the latter was to be the case, as gentlemen on the other side contended, and that a nation was to acquire that which she had not gained by conquest or concession, but merely because she was conquered, whilst the conqueror lost something, it was one of the most whimsical arguments he had ever heard adduced. If this doctrine of claims, which were not claimed, was to be set up, it would be necessary to bring all the exertions of imagination, and the superinduction of every probability into a negotiation, and to choose a person of the most lively fancy to assist every ambassador; he must retire to his closet, and invent and contrive every thing that his imagination could suggest, that might be made the subject of claim or dispute by the adversary, and then let all these be inserted in the treaty. He would not trespass any farther upon the House. He trusted that the peace would stand justified; and that whilst they should prove themselves fully capable of preserving its blessings, they would be ready, if war became unavoidable, to meet it with firmness and with energy.

Dr. Laurence said, it was with surprise and regret that he perceived how different the conclusions were which his right hon. friend who had just sat down drew from the same facts, to those which he inferred from them. His right hon. friend had, in concert with gentlemen of the same opinion as to the treaty, put the question, how far this or that particular island would be a justifiable cause of war, and how far any event which had occurred in the interval between the signing the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty, would be a good ground for breaking off that negotiation. It was the custom to put this question on each of those islands on events separately, without considering the joint effects of the whole; and still more, whether ministers might not have concluded better terms? It was rather remarkable, that the negative of this latter question was uniformly assumed, without the least evidence being adduced to show that many of the disadvantages of the treaty arose, not so much from the want of skill and judgment in ministers, as from the peculiar circumstances of the times. Gentlemen, in touching on the subject of Louisiana, seemed to keep aloof from any allusion to the Floridas, though they were also ceded to France, and were known to have many excellent ports and other important advantages. The noble lord on the treasury-bench had observed, that Louisiana was before in the hands of the French, and that it never was deemed of much consequence in value or produce; but the true reason of that was, that the French then turned their attention to Canada, and neglected the cultivation of Louisiana. If, however, the strength of France was such at present, that it would have been criminal in ministers to delay the definitive treaty, on account of this or that particular place, how far would that argument go; and how far was it likely to operate upon us, when the strength of France should be increased by the consolidation of their resources? The noble lord had observed, that during the negotiation of the peace of 1763, the French privately ceded to the Spaniards this settlement of Louisiana: but that case bore no analogy to the late clandestine proceeding; it was not known until after the treaty was ratified; and the reason of the surrender was very well known—it was given over to the Spaniards as a purchase for Minorca, which the French were to transfer to us.—The learned gentleman was quite dissatisfied with the arrangement respecting Malta; that island should have been a grand barrier against France; it should not have been neutral, but ought to be a naval station well fortified, and able to assist us in interrupting the progress of any fleet that France might send out to attempt a passage to our Indian possessions. France professed, five years ago, when she sent her first expedition to Egypt, that her principal object was to extinguish the system of its government and religion; as it was said, by the then governors of France, to be the centre of superstition and aristocracy; and they could now boast of having accomplished their object, for the new organization of the constitution of Malta left scarce a vestige of the venerable old system; it innovated upon all that time had consecrated; and the island itself, instead of being under one influence, was placed under a picnic guarantee; the whole of this plan being prepared and carried into effect without the consent, or, in a great degree, the knowledge, of the knights of the order.—He would not plead for the indiscriminate renewal of all our political and commercial treaties; but there were some which he thought it would have been wise to renew, and not to rely solely on the treaty before the House, in which nothing definitive was to be found, and yet it was to form the basis of the future system of Europe; the principles and practice of all former statesmen being totally rejected. The vessel of the state was to be thrown afloat on the ocean of politics and commerce, with no rudder but the very distinct and comprehensive treaty on the table. As to the commercial treaty of 1787, the noble lord last night stated, that this treaty was inconsistent with the Alien bill. If so, we were the aggressors in the war; but that assertion was directly in the teeth of the arguments employed by his right hon. friend behind him, when he proposed that law to the House before the war.—He contended, on the whole, that ministers gave up more for the hollow-armed truce which they had obtained, than they should have done had the war been unsuccessful throughout. Certainly it had been productive of much expense; so much indeed, that when gentlemen adverted with any pride to the amount of our exports and imports, it would be curious to inquire whether that amount was equal to the interest on the national debt created by the war. Among the faults of omission, he reckoned as extremely culpable, the state in which our merchants, who had settled in the ceded colonies, were left, as to the removal of their property. If that had been judiciously provided for, according to ancient custom, we should now, without augmenting the miseries of the slave trade, be enabled from those colonies to furnish a sufficient number of negroes to cultivate our newly-acquired island of Trinidad. These were the points to which the address referred; and surely a large and respectable body of the country was discontented with the loose conditions of the treaty. It would be a good opportunity of putting the sincerity of France to the test, by proposing some arrangement on those topics, before the restitutions should be made. It had been often said by the advocates of the peace, that it was called for by the public opinion—that the late ministers advised it, and that the country received it with joy; but he had no hesitation in stating it as his firm belief, that if a list of the concessions to be made to the enemy had accompanied the first news of the peace, instead of being the subject of exultation, even with the common people, the peace would have been received with strong murmurs of discontent. The people of England required to be led;—they were influenced by the character of those above them; and that formed not the least part of their praise; they were capable of great exertion, and patient of suffering: they combined in their character the extremes of the good qualities of other nations: they were constant in their fortitude; loyal in their sentiments; and elevated in their spirit; they were above the idea of submitting to any peace that was dishonourable or disadvantageous, and had too much good sense to value one that was insecure. If, from the imprudent temerity in which this treaty had been concluded, and the loose terms in which it was drawn up, hostilities should soon recommence, the fault would not be in the circumstances of the period at which the negotiation commenced as asserted—not in the conduct of the predecessors of ministers, but in the ministers themselves, who entered upon the negotiation, and followed it up almost to a termination, without resorting to parliament for counsel in any step of their progress. The consequences would be attributable to them, should those apprehended arise from a peace which left so much open for discussion, constituting so many grounds of dispute and discord.

Mr. Bond said, he would not at that late hour enter at large into the subject now before them, which had been so ably treated on that side of the House, particularly by his noble friend last night, and on the present by his right hon. and learned friend, who had displayed every thing which ingenuity, learning, information, talents, and eloquence could furnish. Gentlemen on the other side had also displayed great ability; he would not say, whether they had, or had not, produced much effect, by the manner in which they treated the subject; he would not impute to his learned friend who had just spoken, nor to any other gentleman, any intention of making unfavourable impressions by the observations which they made; but certainly such was the tendency of their arguments; it was true indeed, they professed to have no intention to censure any body; but, notwithstanding their professions, it was impossible not to perceive that the effect of all their observations was to convey censure both upon the peace, and upon the ministers by whom it was negotiated. He wished to know whether there was any fact by which it could be fairly concluded that better terms could have been obtained. If there was not, why should the treaty be disapproved of, or its authors be censured. It was true, that the treaty could not be declared to be perfect—no treaty was ever so: nothing could be easier than for speculative men to form expectations in their closets; but to bring them into active life and reality, was often impracticable. Such was the case in the present instance; innumerable difficulties must occur in the course of such a negotiation, many of which were incapable of explanation, from their very nature, but a bare reference to which would be sufficient for the common sense of that House.—He then proceeded to observe upon some of those difficulties; and said, that he was very far from intending to insinuate that the spirit of the people of this country was broken; but it must be admitted, that, from the circumstances of the war, they wished for peace; nor was it unnatural that they should do so. The great load of the national debt could not be forgotten; the pressure of scarcity which we had endured, in some instances bordering upon famine, were hardships which must have an effect upon the public; from the consideration of these things, it was the business of every good administration to enter into negotiation; not that he meant to allege that peace was a matter of absolute necessity, but it certainly was a matter of prudence. Ministers, in concluding peace, had, therefore, in his opinion, done every thing that prudence could dictate. That, however, was but half their work: the remaining part was, to preserve entire our resources; and to preserve as much as possible, by wise measures, the spirit of the people, in order that, if ever the evil hour should arrive, we should have the ability and disposition to oppose, with effect, the ambitious projects of our rival.

Mr. Wynn expressed himself dissatisfied with several parts of the treaty of peace, although he did not wish that the good faith of it should not be preserved. In his opinion, the House ought to adopt the address moved by his right hon. friend.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that in the exhausted state of the House, and, he could add, the exhausted state of the question, it would be unpardonable in him to detain them for any considerable length of time; but there were some points to which he felt it his duty to offer a few words. He concurred with his right hon. friend in opinion, that the turn of the argument of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, amounted to this—that the definitive treaty was such as ought to be approved of. He concurred with his learned friend, (Mr. Bond), whom, for the first time, he had the happiness of hearing, and whom he hoped he should often hear, that the tendency of the arguments of gentlemen on the other side went to censure the peace and those who advised his majesty to enter into it. His right hon. friend, from whom the address proceeded, he was free to acknowledge, had made his proposition from those genuine principles, by which he had been influenced during the whole of the contest in which we had been engaged. He thought he perceived, from the proposition of his right hon. friend, the same disposition which led him, some time ago, to declare in that House, soon after the preliminaries were signed his disapprobation of the peace altogether. That disapprobation he had expressed in terms almost unqualified. He had declared his opinion against the power of France and the usurpations of that power; and by the manner in which he made that declaration, he must have censured the peace itself, as a death-blow to the prosperity of this country. He was convinced that if his right hon. friend entertained the same sentiments, those sentiments went the length of considering that any peace with the present government of France was inadmissible. Before he knew the terms he had considered the peace itself as a death-blow to the prosperity of this country. This had always been the opinion of his right hon. friend upon the subject; and that it was his opinion still, was clear from the motion he had now made upon the subject. Other gentlemen, who concurred in the opinion that the peace was not such as this country had a right to expect, did not concur, however, with him in saying that peace ought not to be made at any rate; but his right hon. friend had always gone the full length of saying, that any peace with France in its present state was inadmissible. He could not help adding, that if the principles of his right hon. friend were adopted, they must inevitably lead to a speedy renewal of the war. The question, however, now was, not whether a definitive treaty ought not to be concluded, but whether, being concluded, it was or was not a proper measure? He could not help observing, however, that although gentlemen on the other side had not said that this subject ought to have been discussed by piece-meal, yet they certainly conducted themselves on that principle, and had objected to the treaty by piece-meal; but ministers had laid their claim to discuss the subject altogether, and that was, in his opinion, the wiser mode. He was ready to rest the defence of the measure upon what had already been said: he admitted that circumstances of a very important nature had taken place between the signing of the preliminary and the definitive treaty—points which required explanation; and that there were differences between the preliminary and definitive treaties, which it would be proper for him to explain. And yet, having made all these admissions, he did not hesitate to ask the House this question. Was it or was it not, under all the circumstances, a treaty which it was wise in his majesty's servants to advise his majesty to assent to? Having said this, there were two or three points which he should proceed to explain. On the subject of Louisiana, he should say no more than appeared to be necessary by way of answer to the danger which had been talked of by gentlemen on the other side. In 1762, both Canada and Louisiana, were in the possession of the French, when Great Britain had large possessions in America; and the possession of Louisiana and Canada was not enough to prevent Great Britain from being more than a match for France. Canada certainly being important, and Louisiana being now said to be so, they were nevertheless unable to make a stand against Great Britain. What was said to endanger us now, was the power of France in that quarter, but which was not equal to our own possessions and strength, and with the friendship, for this purpose, at least, of an independent, and now become a powerful and populous country, namely, the United States of America. But with respect to another point, namely, the hazard to which our commercial interests were exposed in this quarter, thus stood the fact; there was a difference stated to exist between Louisiana and Fort Hillsborough. There was not in Louisiana a single port wherein a ship of the line could enter, and, in the other, a ship of the line could not anchor without taking out her guns. Nor was there any danger to our commerce in that quarter, from the cession of this place to France;—the improvement which had taken place in making copper-bottoms to our ships, and other circumstances, gave us other great advantages in that quarter, by enabling us to alter the course of our navigation, by going through the windward passage, instead of the gulf of Mexico, so that we should never be annoyed in that quarter by the French, in the manner in which the hon. gentleman had stated.—With respect to the difference between the definitive treaty and the preliminary articles, he would ask the House, whether, under all the circumstances, they were not satisfied that this definitive treaty was a fair execution of the preliminary articles? He admitted that they were not strictly the same; and indeed if they were, there would have been no occasion for preliminary articles. There were five articles in the definitive treaty modified from that of the preliminary articles; 1st, the article respecting prisoners; 2nd, that respecting Newfoundland; 3rd, Portugal; 4th, Malta; and, 5th, the Cape of Good Hope. Now, with regard to three of these articles, they were revived in the definitive treaty, and finally settled in a way that was advantageous—he meant those which related to the prisoners, Newfoundland, and Portugal; it was therefore only as to Malta and the Cape that any doubt could arise. Now, with respect to Portugal, he would not say that gentlemen had a wilful misconception on that subject; but he really knew not how they could state the objections they had stated so often, after the explanations which had been given to them. He averred again, that the treaty of Badajos was known to his majesty's ministers previous to the signing of the preliminary articles, and that communication took place between us and the court of Lisbon on the subject of the limits of Portuguese and French Guiana: we were given to understand the limits of Portuguese Guiana; and this created a determination in us to afford them every protection possible; there was an apprehension that they would not meet their danger as danger ought to be met; and might therefore be induced to accept of terms still more disadvantageous than those in the treaty of Badajos. What was the conduct of his majesty's ministers? From an understanding which gentlemen might comprehend without calling for particulars, it was stipulated on our part, that the treaty of Badajos should be in force only in a particular manner, as far as it related to the limits of Portuguese Guiana; and that a subsequent treaty entered into, or which might be entered into, fixing the limits more disadvantageously to Portugal, should be null and void, as far as these limits were concerned. The treaty of Badajos, in consequence of the dissatisfaction of the French, was not ratified; but the treaty of Madrid was ratified, in which the terms were much more disadvantageous to Portugal than those of the treaty of Badajos, as far as respected the limits of the Portuguese Guiana. The House would recollect the explanation of his noble friend upon that subject, by which it manifestly appeared that we had acted generously towards Portugal in this respect; and this was so far supported by the best evidence, that no objection was made to it on the part of the court of Lisbon.—On the subject of Malta, he would, after so much had been said already, say no more than that the noble lord (Temple) misconceived the thing, if he thought the accounts to which he referred described the whole of the order of Malta, in point of revenue; for it related only to that part of the revenue which grew out of the customs. It had been asked, whether the king of Naples acquiesced in this matter? To which he answered, that the acceptance of the king of Naples had been signified in this particular, and therefore all objection on that article was done away. Austria had also accepted the guarantee.—Having thus gone through all that appeared to him to be necessary to particularize, he would ask, whether this treaty was or was not, under all the circumstances, fit to be entertained by the House, and worthy of its support? He was not desiring that it should be praised. He had never thought of this treaty, nor of the preliminary articles, with any sentiment of exultation; he had satisfied himself, that it was that which, upon the whole, was the best measure that could be taken; he had never endeavoured to paint it in false colours; he had never attempted to apply to it any epithets of praise; he was content with the reflection that he had not tarnished the honour of the country by the measures he had adopted; he had long been of opinion, that there was no extremity of distress which the nation would not rather suffer, than that its honour should be tarnished; for honour was another word for strength; but if he were asked, under such circumstances, and after an additional proof of the ambitious views of France, and of its power by the transaction of Lyons, if this country had abstained from making remonstrances, or from taking any step to signify to our adversary the feelings of his majesty on that occasion? he would answer, that gentlemen who argued a case like this had many advantages over a person in his situation. They could easily put questions to him which it was impossible for him to answer; and they might state obstacles which it was difficult, if not impossible, for a minister to remove in the way of argument. He would only say, that it was matter of great satisfaction with him and with the rest of his majesty's ministers, that they were determined, in the event of the failure of the negotiation, to have laid before the House every document which they possessed upon the subject. He thought, after this it would be tautology in him to say, that he was satisfied the honour of the country was not tarnished by any thing that had been done by his majesty's ministers in the course of this negotiation. But if the question was put to him, he would answer it, not by any particular statement, but relying on what had been said already by his friends, that an attempt on the part of Great Britain to maintain alone the contest with France until her territorial power in Europe was abridged considerably, was an unwise measure. That the extent of that territorial power was matter of regret, was unquestionable; but it was a lot which we had not the power of controlling. We ought to be contented with the conviction that we had abundant means of providing for our own security, in a separate state and condition; but we were not able, under all the circumstances by which the greater part of the world was affected, to provide for that security on a large scale which connected us with the security of other powers. That depended upon events over which we had no control. He could only say, he was astonished that his right hon. friend (Mr. Windham), whose heart, he was persuaded, was deeply interested in these things, and who even now cherished the hope, perhaps, of recovering all that had been lost in the contest, should not long ago have been satisfied with the arguments by which the expediency of making peace was demonstrable; and that even upon the very principle of his right hon. friend himself, which was this, that if ever Austria and Prussia and other powers should recover the power, and regain the inclination, of obtaining what they had lost in the contest, the only way to enable this country to give vigour and energy to such a principle was, to preserve our resources from waste; and that nothing was capable of doing so, in an effectual manner, but peace. He should rejoice to see the resources of this country economized, as he hoped they would be by peace. "God grant," said, Mr. Addington, "that peace may be preserved! It is my earnest prayer, that we may long enjoy the blessings of peace; and that France may not use her power in such a way as to compel us to arm against her; but if war should again take place in two or three years (and I hate to state the supposition), I would say, that it will even then be matter of great consolation to every man in this House that he has done every thing in his power to avert the calamity. I am well persuaded, that, whatever may happen, it is the wisest course for us to husband our resources at present that we may the better be prepared, if that should be our lot, to exert ourselves with energy and effect. Nothing is so likely to prevent a war, as the being prepared to meet it; nothing is so likely to keep other powers from molesting us, as the knowledge that we possess the means of vindicating our rights. I think, therefore, that we should take care not to exhaust our resources when there is nothing to be gained by it. Let it not be supposed, that because I say this, I am of opinion that our resources have been improvidently employed. I am so far from thinking so, that I believe the very means by which we have obtained peace have arisen from the vigour with which we prosecuted the war." Mr. Addington then proceeded to observe, that neither himself nor any of his colleagues had any plea of inadvertency for an excuse, if the definitive treaty was defective in its provisions. He should think it highly unworthy to urge such a plea if he had it; but there was no such plea, for they had been guided in drawing the treaty, and all the provisions of it, by lord Eldon, whose knowledge, diligence, talents, and other excellent qualities, were too well known to render an enumeration of them necessary. The treaty, therefore, on our part, had all the advantages which belonged to consummate understanding, and the habits of professional accuracy in the construction of written instruments. He was thoroughly persuaded also, that in another branch of the negotiation he should be without excuse if the treaty was defective; for there never was a period when the business of the office in Downing-street was more ably conducted. He knew that some insinuations had gone forth upon the conduct of the negotiation. He knew there were some who had doubted the propriety of that selection; to whom he would say, that the able person here alluded to had not only conducted himself in a manner which conciliated affection, and attached personal respect, but had showed great wisdom, and exhibited a fresh claim to the affection and gratitude of the public. Gentlemen who had spoken against the treaty, had taken the parts of it which appeared to them to be objectionable, without touching those which they themselves beheld with satisfaction. They had forgotten that the preliminary articles were the result of the negotiation before the fate of Egypt was known, and, therefore, it had so much the more merit. He was not disposed to enter into a comparison of power, and the probable result of it, as between Great Britain and France; but it excited his astonishment that gentlemen, in discussing these topics, made no difference between the probable effect of power acquired by violence, and that which was the effect of virtuous exertion. Some gentlemen affected to say, that the people had altered their opinion on the subject of this peace. He believed that the speeches of gentlemen in that House had affected the inhabitants of the metropolis in some degree. He did not make it a matter of charge against these gentlemen; but this was certainly the effect of the manner in which they had treated this subject. He did not believe, however, that any effect was produced on the mass of the people; he believed they hailed the peace as a blessing. Some felt a pressure on account of taxes, and were impatient for the peace, under a delusion into which they had been led, that peace would immediately lessen the pressure of those taxes. Many things had been attributed to the war of which it was not the cause, and among these was the high price of provisions, of which the war was very slightly indeed, if at all, the cause. With these feelings (said Mr. Addington), I am convinced that the language held out by gentlemen in this House (from a sense of their duty, I have no doubt) may have an effect, for a time, on the people, to disincline them to the peace, and may have an effect on the continuance of it, unless counteracted. I should, however, be grieved if that were the effect of it. I am sure I speak the sentiments of every individual in his majesty's service, when I say, it is our earnest wish that the blessings of peace may be continued, and we wish to take every measure consistently with honour, and the safety of the country, to preserve these blessings, and I am impressed with a thorough conviction, notwithstanding what has been said, that the probabilities of the continuance of the peace now concluded, are not less than the probabilities of the continuance of the different pacifications which have taken place at various periods of the last century; I mean, if the country be disposed to make provision for its own security; without which peace cannot be lasting. We must not suppose that France is free from the disposition of taking advantage of our weakness, if we should appear at any time to be weak; but let us guard against weakness, and give ourselves that security which we have the means of giving. By this course, we shall at once inspire our friends with confidence, and discourage those who may incline to be our enemies. If advantage they can take, advantage they will take; but I know of nothing in circumstances of the present time; I know of nothing in the disposition of the government of France, nor in the disposition of the person at the head of the government of France, that warrants any apprehension that the peace now concluded may not be lasting. If this country be true itself, I think a just expectation may be entertained, that it will be lasting. This country is now in a state of acknowledged strength, and indisputable power. It is on an eminence; and may continue so, by a fixed determination to pursue a right course; which is, not to invade the rights of others, nor to suffer others to invade its own. By a system of conciliation and firmness, I am confident peace may be maintained, and the pre-eminence of this country preserved as high as it is at present. I can hardly wish it to be higher; but I trust it will never be lower. It is the wish of my heart, and it shall be my unremitting endeavour, to preserve, as far as I am able, the happiness of this country, which now is the admiration of surrounding nations.

Mr. Sheridan said :—Sir, at this late hour (about two o'clock) it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to trespass on your time and patience. I shall not be singular to-night in the professions I make you of avoiding details; but, in one respect, my conduct will differ from every other gentleman who has addressed you—I will keep my word. If I feel repugnance to rise at so late an hour, I feel equally strange with respect to the unpopularity which I fear I must experience. It is natural to every person to have pleasure in voting in a majority, though to that pleasure I have long been a stranger. Among the strange things we are continually witnessing, is, the strange division of parties at present in this House. Sir, I have heard it said that there are about twelve or thirteen different parties among us; nay, some carry the number much farther. Now, I scarcely expect a single vote with me beyond that little constitutional party who have, for the last ten years, been the object of so much unqualified abuse; but those men who have so often been held up to public opprobrium are the very same whose every prediction has been fulfilled, and every fear realized. The discussion of this necessary but disgraceful treaty of peace to-night, is a confirmation of the propriety of their conduct during the whole course of the war. My friends must feel poignant shame and deep humiliation at the situation to which, by these terms, this country is reduced, but which they have laboured steadily to avert. Those who oppose this peace have been arraigned by the last speaker as aiming at a censure on the issue of the negotiations, and on the ministers themselves; and certainly, Sir, their object is, to condemn the peace, and to cast a slur on the abilities of his majesty's ministers. But, in this conduct of theirs, they have at least the merit of being consistent. I support the peace, because I feel confident that no better terms, considering all circumstances, could be obtained. Their predecessors had taken care of that. They had left them no choice, but between an expensive, bloody, and fruitless war, and a perilous and hollow peace. They have chosen the best of the alternatives. Now, says the minister, they who oppose me, depress the country. I thank these new oppositionists for their manly firmness in coming forward, and opposing, upon their own principles, this degrading treaty. Let the people of this country be fully aware of all the circumstances of the peace. They have done their duty, then, in thus publicly discussing them. But a right hon. gentleman, not here this evening, an ex-minister, too, suspects something more. If he has not altered his opinion since yesterday, he suspects their motives. "They," says he, "disapprove the treaty, and attack administration, because they wish to drive out ministers, and succeed to their places, and for that purpose they have formed a confederacy." Truly, Sir, a heavy charge! But I must declare that they have never veiled their opinions. Some of them especially have been at all times very open; and I conceive that it would be high injustice to suspect them, upon slight grounds, of a dirty cabal to turn out the present ministers.—Says the right hon. gentleman, "upon their principles, they would never have made peace." Why, so we have always said. It is now therefore confirmed, that a leading part of the late ministry acted upon such principles. But as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Dundas) yesterday denounced their foul ambition, and their design to trip up the heels of their successors, another great discovery is now made—these persons principles were such as rendered a peace impossible, and yet the very men who say so have just been thanking them all, as the saviours of the country! Can the right hon. gentleman account for this inconsistency? I should think not; and yet he looks so confidently, that I almost think he could. He thought I was cheering him, as if I did not suppose him a constant supporter of the war; and he assures the House "he was a steady friend to it!" But he has now found out that it was necessary to stop. Pray, why not have stopped a little sooner? why not before you were so much exhausted? for instance, when Bounaparté made you an offer? Now, however, he finds the necessity of peace. But is this such a peace as will give us real repose? Consider your debt and taxes, and the necessity which seems to be at length coming upon you of keeping up a peace establishment unknown in this country. It is lamentable to see you all split into miserable parties, when your great enemy is uniting every possible means of extending his power. You are squabbling about the measuring of ribbons and tapes, and the paltry revenues of Malta, when much greater objects are before you. The events of every day seem to call more and more for the expression of a public feeling, that the time will come when French encroachments and oppression must cease, and when the voice of this country must be clearly raised against their atrocities and tyrannical conduct. The right hon. gentleman says, "we have preserved our honour!" Honour depends more on the manner of doing a thing than on the thing itself. We had a great armament at the time of negotiation, but I do not hear that it carried any point whatever. "This," says he, "is a peace in which we relinquish nothing, and gain much!" Will any man of common sense undertake to prove that? I defy him to name the single object, ever-varying, ever-shifting, unrelinquished. What did we go to war for? Why, to prevent French aggrandizement. Have we done that? No. Then we were to rescue Holland! Is that accomplished or relinquished? No. Brabant was a sine qua non! Is it gained? No. Then come security and indemnity! Are they obtained? No. The late minister told us, that the example of a Jacobin government in Europe, founded on the ruins of the holy altar, and the tomb of a martyred monarch, was a spectacle so dreadful and infectious to Christendom, that we could never be safe while it existed, and could do nothing short of our very last effort for its destruction. Now, Sir, let us see what we have laid out for all these fine words, which at last gave way to "security" and "indemnity?" Why, near 200,000 lives, and 300 millions of money! And we have got Ceylon and Trinidad! I should propose, that as we have given to our heroes titles from the places where their laurels were won, our St. Vincents, Nelsons of the Nile, &c. so we should name Ceylon, Security island; and call Trinidad, the island of Indemnity! Now, if we look at the state of Europe, we find that the noble lord opposite has a most curious and convenient epithet, which he applies to what is rather a disagreeable object to him (lord Hawkesbury). He talks of its being in an "uncomfortable"—Was it? Oh, no! "unsatisfactory state." Germany, Holland, Italy, they are all in an "unsatisfactory state;" and so, I suppose, is Switzerland, which now seems likely to undergo a division among her powerful and generous neighbours. That innocent and virtuous suffering country is now, I suppose, in an "unsatisfactory state!" But great Britain is all this time far from langour. She is in a "satisfactory state!" However, a grave and learned master of the rolls, tells us, for our comfort, that, notwithstanding all that has happened, here we are debating and doing business, in all the old forms and customs of the House. Pray, now, could not this have happened, supposing we had never gone to war? I think he should have made that out before he congratulated us so warmly upon our present debate under all the "old forms of the House!" The minister, too, goes on acceding to old forms; he has his majorities according to custom. Prussia can go on too in its old forms! Is this armed repose, this hollow peace, then, the fruit of our long and glorious war?—A great deal, too, has been said to be gained by the disposition of France to lay aside Jacobinism. But the grand consolation of all is in looking to Buonaparté as the extirpator of Jacobinism! A learned gentleman, however, states to this House, that it is the nature of Jacobinism, if driven from any country, always to look with pride and ambition to a settlement in the place where it had birth, and to fix itself there. So now this "Child and Champion of Jacobinism," as he was styled, is to become a parricide. The child of sin is to destroy his mother! As this Jacobinism is by the late minister stated to be a vice never to be eradicated from the bosom when it has once been implanted, all Europe will doubtless look to this great consul for its destruction. Indeed he seems very desirous of extending his care to his neighbours. Suppose you make him king of Europe at once—he will soon extirpate all the Jacobinism that infests it. My alarms begin when the alarms of some persons cease. The great question about the dangers of the French revolution were always upon the degree of the danger to be apprehended. Some danger was always allowed; but to suppose the people of this country so miserably infatuated as to fall in love with dirt, and blood, and guillotines, with all the atrocious deformities of the system of Robespierre; and that now—when France is "covered with glory," though certainly without liberty, or any thing that much resembles it—there should be nothing to dazzle and captivate, is out of my comprehension. If there be in this country men of dangerous ambition, Buonaparté is the man to hold out to them, by his ambitious and successful conduct, an example much stronger than any thing that could attract the people in the exhibitions of riot and murder. But they say, he has "begged pardon of God and man" by his piety and penitence! Yes, the pious, prostrate Buonaparté, has begged pardon of God, for making a tool of the sovereign pontiff, by bringing back the prelates of the Gallican church, and constituting them, with the salaries of curates, spies, and informers. How has he begged pardon of man? By coming down on that honest, simple, hospitable people, the Swiss, and destroying the independence earned by the bravery of their ancestors. How has he acted to us? Why, by condescending to receive our humiliating submission of every thing we had acquired by the prowess of our army and navy! I must trust to our valour to defend us against his armies; and I pray Heaven to protect us against the effects of his penitence and piety!—I must confess, that nothing has been stated against this peace unaccompanied by proofs. I would rather have given to France Malta, and taken the Cape, than have made this absurd arrangement. If the late secretary for the war department were here—who is perhaps here [looking at Mr. Pitt] by proxy—he might have made a whimsical charge against the present ministers. He (Mr. Dundas) said, that "the minister who should give up the Cape would deserve to lose his head!" There sits the minister, however, with his head safe upon his shoulders. I have almost a mind to attack him on the authority of Mr. Dundas. Malta would have been a great acquisition to us; and therein I agree with the war secretary. It would have stood, with the British standard flying in the centre of the Mediterranean, "like a great sea-mark, saving those that eye it." Ministers say, the emperor of Russia would not take care of Malta. If they will tell me so upon their honour, I will believe them; otherwise, upon my honour, I won't believe any body that says so. That did not appear to be Paul's idea of it. Perhaps he was mad! There was, however, some method in his madness. But, Sir, there's a message which Buonaparté has sent to his tribunate concerning some Russian soldiers, who are to go and take good care of the republic of the Seven Islands: and they may probably be intended for Alexandria, and may be connected with some plan against Turkey. Sir, if any thing in the shape of a statesman will say in this House, that he looks at that power, "at which the world turns pale," without apprehension, as the minister seems to tell us to-night, I must say he has a prodigious stock of courage; but I cannot give him credit for wisdom as a statesman. But he has found an excellent reason for not being afraid of Buonaparté. He says, colonies will give him commerce, and that the enjoyment of trade and wealth will divert his mind from war, and be a pledge of future peace. Sir, I do not know what France will be; but I do know that she is now a hard, iron republic. Buonaparté, from his military education, and the sort of company he has kept, they allow, is as yet a little rough; but then, if we could only catch him and clap him behind the counter, he will become perfectly civil and quiet. Sir, when I was reading the treaty, I thought all the foreign places, Pondicherry, Chandernagore, Cochin, Martinico, &c. were all cessions. Not they; they are all so many traps and holes to catch this silly fellow in, and make a merchant of him! I really think the best way upon such a principle would be this: let the merchants of London open a public subscription, and set Buonaparté up at once! I hear a great deal respecting a certain statue about to be erected to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) now in my eye, at a great expense. Send all that money over to the first consul, and give him what you talk of so much—capital to begin trade with. I hope the right hon. gentleman over the way will, like the first consul, refuse a statue for the present, and postpone it to posterity. There is no harm, however, in marking out the place. The right hon. gentleman is musing, perhaps, what square, or place, he will choose for its erection. I recommend the Bank of England. Now for the material. Not gold: no, no! he has not left enough of it. I should, however, propose papier maché and old Bank notes. Ministers recommend us to make France commercial for the sake of peaceful habits, and then tell us how impossible it is for her to increase in trade and commerce for want of the necessary credit and capital: There my prospect was damped!—I was going now to India; but I remember I promised to avoid detail: I must keep my word. There was some Northern logic here last night—something specious—a kind of northern lights—pretty enough to look at, but not very useful, about our possessions having a better security in India without, than with, our enemy's recognition of our rights. This, I confess, I cannot understand. The right hon. gentleman asks, whether they would have been justified in breaking off the treaty? That is a question between him and those who like the preliminaries; but it is otherwise with those who like neither. The secretary at war (Mr. Yorke) has said, Buonaparté will look at us with a "soldier's eye." I think he will with that of a statesman! Now the city militia, and some other corps, are disbanded, it is not exactly a spectacle for a soldier's eye. One cannot walk along the streets without hearing doubts expressed of the nature and security of the peace! And the next great inquiry is, "Pray, who is minister now? Is there, then, an interior and an exterior prime minister?—one who appears to the world, and another secret, irresponsible directing minister?" Certainly, in many respects I have given my testimony in behalf of the present ministers. In nothing more than for making the best peace, perhaps, that they could, after their predecessors had left them in such a deplorable situation. But the present ministers continue to identify themselves with the former. They have ministerially supported a refusal to inquire into the state of the country, just as they were about to take the government; they have passed an indemnity bill, and since that a security bill, in a resolution of thanks, and these are the only indemnity and security acquired!—The ex-ministers are quite separate and distinct, and yet they and the new ministers are all "honourable friends!" What is the meaning of this mysterious connexion? Why does not the minister defend his peace on the only good grounds of defence? Does he hold that situation only to make peace, and leave it for his predecessor? Do they bargain for support, on one side of talent, and on the other of power? No minister of this country ever condescended to act under such an incomprehensible connexion, and to receive such equivocal support. Part of the case is clear. If the late minister attacked the treaty, the present would turn round and say—"You brought me into a situation of necessity—you compelled me to sign a disgraceful treaty—you had been arrogant, and I have put up with indignity—Buonaparté by his minister Otto, would laugh at me!—This work is yours—you placed us in this sad dilemma. The minister takes no strong ground of defence: I will not say he dares not take it. There he sits to receive the attack of the new confederacy, who are not great in numbers, but in talents. The ex-minister is mounted on a kind of hillfort to fire down on the assailants; but the garrison is all manned with deserters from the principles of the war. I should like to support the present minister on fair ground; but what is he? A sort of outside passenger; or rather a man leading the horses round a corner, while reins and whip, and all, are in the hands of the coachman on the box! [Looking at Mr. P.'s elevated seat three or four benches above that of the treasury]. Why not have an union of the two ministers, or at least, some intelligible connexion? When the ex-minister quitted office, almost all the subordinates kept their places. How was it that the whole family did not move together? Had he only one covered waggon to carry away friends and goods; or has he left directions behind him that they may know where to call? The only way in which I can solve this strange division of parts is this: Aristophanes, a Greek author whom a noble lord (Belgrave) will understand but whom I must translate for the benefit of the country gentlemen, tells a story somewhat in point: he says, that Nycias sat so long in one posture (perhaps as long as the ex-minister sat on the treasury bench), that he adhered to the seat; so that when Hercules came to snatch him away, in the sudden jirk a certain proportion of his sitting-part was left behind him [loud laughing!]. The House can make the allusion. Sir, this is not a noble, manly kind of coalition between these gentlemen. Of the ex-minister I would just say, that no man admires his splendid talents more than I do. If ever there was a man fitted by nature to benefit his country, and to give it lustre, he is the man. He has too much good sense, taste, and talent, to set his mind upon ribbons, stars, titles, and other appendages and idols of rank: he is of a nature not at all suited to be the creature or tool of any court. [Mr. Pitt bowed repeatedly]. But while I

thus say of him no more than I think his character and great talents deserve, I must tell him how grossly he has misapplied them in the politics of this country. I must tell him how he has augmented our national debt, and of the lives lost in this war. I must tell him he has done more against the privileges of the people, increased more the power of the crown, and injured more the constitution of his country, than any minister that I can mention. Respecting the resignation of the late ministry, I do not believe one word of what is said about Catholic emancipation. I could as soon believe that it was because they had discovered the longitude. If they did go out on that ground, they were certainly at liberty so to do. But after they quitted their situations they circulated a paper in Ireland, attributing the failure of an indispensable measure to resistance in a certain quarter (and that quarter was their sovereign), and directing the Irish Catholics to look to them for hope of relief. If this was short of high treason, how far short of it I cannot define. The non-performance of the promise had, I believe, withheld the hearts of the people of Ireland, and might be a reason for making the peace on the terms upon which it was concluded. I consider it fair to those who have entertained the sentiments that I do of the rise and progress of the war, to record the real grounds on which we approve of a peace, the terms of which are so inadequate and insecure. Supposing that Mr. Windham's motion will be rejected, I have framed mine in such a manner as to come as an amendment to lord Hawkesbury's; and, according to the precedent of the other, I make it in the shape of a resolution, by leaving out all the words of the address, but "That", and then proceed: "It is the opinion of this House, that the omission of various opportunities of negotiating a peace with advantage to this country, and more especially the rejection of the Overtures made by the Chief Consul of France in January 1800, appears to this House to have led to a state of affairs which rendered peace so necessary as to justify the important and painful sacrifices which his majesty has been advised to make for the attainment thereof."

Mr. Tierney briefly explained the reason why he could not, however desirous of giving a vote in favour of the peace, vote for the amendment which the noble lord had proposed. It contained certain expressions as to the dangerous designs of the enemy, that seemed to imply a justification of the war, which he had ever thought it his duty to oppose, as unnecessary, ruinous, and unjust. The credit of the country, too, was spoken of in terms which did not appear to him consistent with fact. Unless these words were expunged, he was determined to vote against the amendment, however reluctant he was to do any thing which at all looked like a disapprobation of the conduct of ministers in bringing to a successful termination the work of peace.

Mr. Grey thought ministers right in concluding the peace, but would not allow that the beneficial effects described in lord Hawkesbury's amendment were produced by the war, and therefore could not vote for it. It had been said, respecting the treaties of 1783 and 1787, that the former contained poison with regard to the safety of our Indian possessions. He was authorized by the noble marquis (Lansdowne) who concluded that treaty, to say, that he wished it were in his power to defend the treaty in that House; as he would then show that it did not contain the poison imputed to it, and that it was not improved by the treaty of 1787. Mr. Grey gave no opinion of his own, farther than that he thought the non-renewal of treaties left it open to the French to make claims, though they would be unjust.

Mr. W. Smith was sorry he could not vote for the amendment, though he approved of the minister's conduct in concluding the peace. It had been contended, that the original address was not a censure upon his majesty's present ministers; but it appeared to him not only a censure, but a very strong one.

Mr. Hobhouse was anxious to explain the grounds on which he should give his vote that night, as he differed materially from those hon. gentlemen, with whom he had been accustomed formerly to agree. The address moved by Mr. Windham did not recommend a violation of the definitive treaty, which had lately been concluded at Amiens. What then was its real object? Was it not to pass a vote of censure on ministers? Considered generally and practically, this was its object, and in that interpretation the right hon. gentleman himself had acquiesced. In what light, then, was the House to regard the amendment proposed by the noble lord?

It was no other than a motion to declare, that the House approved of the definitive treaty. In that general view it was surely entitled to the support of all those who justified the peace on any grounds, however different from each other. A nice criticism of the import of every word or sentence was unnecessary; it was sufficient to consider the general purport, both of the original address and the amendment. But he was prepared to go farther, and to assert that the words, which had been chosen by the noble lord need not rest upon this defence; for, if fairly examined, they would not admit of the construction put upon them by his hon. friends. Two phrases were deemed exceptionable. The first was, "The wild and destructive projects with which this country was threatened by France at the commencement of the war had been happily frustrated." The words were not—the wild and destructive projects on the part of France, which this country was threatened by which had occasioned the war. Had such terms been employed, those who did not consider France to be the aggressor could not subscribe to them. But here no reference was made to the causes of the war; it was only said that France, when the war was begun, meditated designs against this country of a wild and destructive nature, which had happily been frustrated. It was natural that France, when once she had drawn the sword, should endeavour to use it to the injury of her adversary; and that many of her hostile schemes had failed, no gentleman would deny. That war being once commenced, she meditated, and would gladly have effected a revolution in Great Britain, whether by intrigue, or force of arms, was past all doubt; and that such a plan had been frustrated was no less incontestible. He would also ask, whether, the invasion she had more than once projected, she had not been obliged to abandon? His hon. friend (Mr. Tierney) objected to the phrase, that the credit of the nation had been improved; but where did he find any such language? The terms were, that "our commercial and maritime superiority had been improved." Was not this the fact? Had we not received a most convincing proof of it in the statements of our imports and exports, made by a noble lord this night? He would not attempt to enumerate our great naval victories, which had nearly annihilated the navy of our enemies.

They were known to every gentleman who heard him; and future ages would contemplate the gallant exploits of a Howe, a St. Vincent, a Duncan, and a Nelson, with no less enthusiastic admiration and pride, than those who were immediate witnesses of the services which they had rendered to their country. For these reasons he thought that the objections of his hon. friends to the amendment were without foundation, and therefore it should have his cordial support. He begged the present administration to accept his praise and gratitude, as an individual, for having conferred the blessings of peace upon the nation.

Mr. Whitbread said, it would, in his opinion, have been policy in the noble lord who moved the amendment to have couched it in such terms as would have met the sanction of the whole House; and to enable him to vote for the amendment, he must move for certain words to be omitted.

The question being put, that the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the question,

The House divided:

Tellers.

|      |   | Mr. Bond - - - -     |   |     |

Mr. Windham's motion consequently passed in the negative. The amendment proposed by Mr. Sheridan was then put and negatived. The amendment proposed by lord Hawkesbury was adopted without a division, and the House adjourned at half past four in the morning.

Claims of the Prince of Wales.] May 10. Mr. Tyrwhitt said, he was sure the House would hear with pleasure, that the claims of the illustrious personage in whose service he was, had at last found their way into a court of justice. However, he trusted the House would not think the time wasted which they had employed in considering those claims, when they were told that his Royal Highness's petition of right during the time of the late lord chancellor had lain in the office six years and a half, without receiving an answer. If the learned judge, who now held the seals, should be against the claims of his Royal Highness, they must rest for ever. But, he trusted that the able and honourable men, whose legal assistance the prince of Wales had, would find their opinion confirmed by that of the chancellor. In that case, he should deem it his duty to lay the result before the House. He took that opportunity of stating, that since the year 1795, 525,000*l.* had been paid of his Royal Highness's debts, not from the public purse, but from a portion of his income set apart for that purpose. He hoped that the sum it would be found his Royal Highness was entitled to would enable him to pay what still remained; for it would give him the liveliest satisfaction to be able to pay his own debts with his own means.

Debate in the Commons on the Bull-baiting Bill.] May 24. Mr. Dent having moved, that the bill to prevent Bull-baiting and Bull-running, be read a second time,

Sir Richard Hill said:—Sir, I rise in behalf of a race of poor friendless beings who certainly cannot speak for themselves. I shall, however, be brief, being well assured, that if the voice of common sense, common humanity, and uncommon distress and misery cannot be heard, all I can say will be of no avail. Instead, therefore, of multiplying words, I shall bring forward some facts, which I hope will prove the means of setting forth the barbarous custom of bull-baiting in its true light. Sir Richard then read some passages which he had selected, mentioning the shocking cruelties which had been inflicted on a poor animal, in order to make him furious enough to afford diversion to his brutal tormentors; but the tortured creature soon becoming outrageous, he was entangled with ropes, his hoofs cut off, and baited again, whilst he feebly sustained and defended himself on his stumps. He then brought a striking citation from sir Matthew Hale, where, in an address to the Deity, that great man expresses his sentiments concerning cruelty towards the brute creation. He next said, that after the testimony of so illustrious a person as sir M. Hale, he could adduce no higher human authority, and should therefore finish his quotations with a short word from a source the purity of which, he trusted, would never be disputed in that great assembly of professing Christians, whatever it might be in a French convention. He who was at once the wisest of men, and the greatest of kings, had declared that "the merciful man regarded the life of his beast, but that the tender mercies of the wicked were cruel." There was wanted no comment to prove that, in this saying, Solomon contrasted the difference between the good man and the wicked man, in one particular instance, which related to the conduct of each towards dumb creatures. He said, he had in his pocket many letters from the most respectable characters in the kingdom, setting forth the dreadful cruelties, as well as shocking accidents, which had accrued from the abominable practice. He also mentioned a letter which he had received from a worthy clerical friend and brother magistrate, in the district wherein he himself acted, in which the respectable name of the chairman of the quarter-sessions was added, as joining in the general wish of the county of Salop, for the abolition of a custom which had been pregnant with such horrid barbarities. Sir Richard added, that he had several more petitions, besides those already on the table, but he was ashamed to take up the time of the House by reciting them. In Ireland an act had passed for the abolition of bull-baiting; and as the Irish gentlemen had been so favourable to their own bulls, he was sure they would not be less indulgent to ours. Sir Richard then requested that the petition from Norwich (the place which Mr. Windham represents) might be read; but there being no such petition from thence against the bill, sir Richard said he might reasonably have supposed that all the cathedral church, together with the mayor and corporation, had sent up such a petition. It had been objected, that this bill was only the beginning of a system; but what system?—a system of humanity! a system of peace! And was this system so grating to the ears of some gentlemen, that they could not even bear to hear of a definitive treaty between a dog and a bull? The amiable sex, in general, were advocates for the bill. There might, indeed, be some exceptions; but where should we find them? Perhaps, staggering out of a gin-shop in St. Giles's; perhaps sitting over an oyster-tub, or riding in a cinder-cart, but it could not strictly be said of any one of these ladies, "Grace is in all her steps, Heaven in her eye; in all her gestures dignity and love." Though he had observed, at the beginning of his speech, that he was an advocate for poor beings who could not speak for themselves, there came into his mind a fact, wherein even a dumb animal, through the immediate power of the Almighty, rebuked the cruelty of his owner. He then mentioned the case of Balaam's ass; and added, that if an angel interposed on the occasion, surely it was not a circumstance improper to be adduced in a Christian assembly.

Mr. Windham said, that the evil complained of by the supporters of this bill was not such as justified the interference of the legislature. It was not an evil that had "grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength: but, on the contrary, it had declined as they had increased. An allusion had been made to a petition from Norwich on the subject; and an insinuation had been thrown out, that it was a practice generally prevalent in that neighbourhood. The fact, however, was, that within the last twenty years only two instances were remembered of a bull bait in Norwich or its vicinity. Decreasing as the practice was all over the country, he could not but think that the discussion of such paltry local complaints was wholly unworthy of the legislature of a great nation. It was part of a system of introducing subjects of a similar kind into parliament, which he could not but reprobate in the strongest terms. The subject was, in all points of view degrading; but it appeared more especially unworthy of being entertained by the imperial parliament, at a time when so many other subjects of great national importance were calling for the attention of the House. Such a sort of public interference with matters unworthy of the consideration of the legislature could be productive of no consequences but such as were mischievous. No law could be desirable which would be attended with no national advantage, and this advantage ought to be well weighed before a legislative enactment was required. A law in all cases necessarily involved a certain degree of restraint; and it was also to be taken into the account, that it could not be carried into effect without vesting in those who were to enforce its provisions a considerable degree of discretion. If such a law were to be passed, it could not act by a silent operation. On the contrary, it would be enforced by those who principally exerted themselves for the observance of the game laws, and who, in enforcing its provisions, could not possibly escape a large share of public odium. Such was the subject now before the House, which contained nothing of public or general interest. To procure the discussion of such subjects, it was necessary to resort to canvass and intrigue. Members, whose attendance was induced by local considerations in most cases of this description, were present; the discussion if any took place, was managed by the friends of the measure; and the decision of the House was perhaps ultimately a matter of mere chance. The present bill was precisely one of a similar description, and but from the circumstance of the subject having excited some attention in a former session it might have been considered by chance, and agreed to without discussion. On this general principle, then, he was inclined to oppose the discussion of the subject, as totally unworthy of the dignity of the House. But he had, in the next place, to object to the manner in which the subject of bull-baiting had been considered, not from a general view of the subject, but from a few insulated examples. The friends of the bill took a view of the practice complained of, merely as exhibited on a minute scale, and from them consequences were drawn. They put the bull and the dog as exhibited in a few instances, into the eye of their microscope, and through this confined medium desired the House to contemplate the general practice. The cruelties of the practice were the only circumstances held up to observation, and every thing else was kept out of view. But if this mode of viewing the subject were to be adopted, he saw no reason why all other sports should not be contemplated in a similar manner. If the cruelty of bull-baiting was thus to be held up to the attention of the House in such glaring colours, why was not hunting, shooting, fishing, and all other amusements of a similar description, to be judged of by similar principles? If the effects of the one were to be viewed through the medium of a microscope, why were not the consequences of the other to be scrutinized with equal severity? By viewing objects in this way, not only would false conclusions be drawn, but the objects themselves would appear inverted, and in a way never intended by nature. Things would not only not appear the same, but their whole aspect would be reversed. Nothing could be more pleasing to the eye than the sight of female beauty; but even if the fairest complexion were contemplated through a microscope, deformities would appear, and hairs unobservable to the naked eye would present themselves as the bristles on the back of a boar. Such attacks as the present on the amusements of the people struck him in no other light than as the first step to a reform of the manners of the lower orders. Those who, when young men, had formed projects for the reformation of parliament, finding themselves disappointed in those projects now formed the design of reforming the manners of the people. In their desires to accomplish this object there were two great parties united, the Jacobins and the Methodists, though the objects they had in view by this change were essentially different. By the former every rural amusement was condemned with a rigour only to be equalled by the severity of the puritanical decisions. They were described as a part of the lewd sports and Antichristian pastimes which in times of puritanism, had been totally proscribed. Every thing joyous was to be prohibited, to prepare the people for the reception of their fanatical doctrines. By the Jacobins on the other hand, it was an object of important consideration to give to the disposition of the lower orders a character of greater seriousness and gravity, as the means of facilitating the reception of their tenets; and to aid this design, it was necessary to discourage the practice of what were termed idle sports and useless amusements. This was a design which he should ever think it his duty strenuously to oppose. For, though he wished that the people might become more virtuous, more attentive to the duties of religion, better fathers, better husbands, better children, he could never agree that for this purpose their social habits should be changed; that they should prove more austere, more unsociable, and more self-conceited than they now were. Whenever he saw any steps taken to produce this effect, he could not consider them in any other light than as so many steps of a departure from the old English character. The habits long established among the people were the best fitted to resist the schemes of innovation; and it was among the labouring and illiterate part of the people that Jacobinical doctrines had made the smallest progress. In this respect indeed, it was otherwise with Methodist doctrines. They thrived best on a stubborn soil; but they had the effect of preparing it for the reception of the doctrines of Jacobinism. In this work, indeed, the two parties mutually over-reached each other. The party of Methodists invited the people to read, and in the first instance they might peruse a few Jacobinical productions, that they might read with greater advantage their fanatical productions at a future period. In the same way, the Jacobins wished to divert the people from every social pursuit; reading they strenuously recommended; and, though a few Methodistical books were, in the first instance, not wholly proscribed, they were allowed only to fit the mind for the reception of their poisonous tenets. The effect of their exertions was the same, though thus differently pursued. It was equally directed to the destruction of the old English character, by the abolition of all rural sports. So much convinced was he that this was the object of such a bill as the present, that he almost felt disposed to rest his opposition to it on this footing. Out of the whole number of the disaffected, he questioned if a single bull-baiter could be found, or if a single sportsman had distinguished himself in the Corresponding Society: the hunting for which they reserved themselves was of a noble kind; they disdained the low pursuits of ordinary sportsmen; the game against which their efforts were directed were of no less a quality than kings. When he spoke of this union of the Methodists and Jacobins, he did not mean to deny that, in their political principles, as well as their ultimate objects, they essentially differed. Religion was an ingredient in the character of the Methodists, which was directly hostile to the views of Jacobinism; for in the composition of modern Jacobinism religion formed no part. But they were not, on serious consideration, so very far removed from each other as might at first sight appear. As a general assertion, it would be admitted, that hot water was farther removed from congelation than what was cold; but when the hot water was exposed to the air, it was more speedily frozen. In a similar manner, though in the abstract Methodism and Jacobinism seemed to be the farthest removed from each other, yet facts showed that the tenets of the one prepared the mind for the adoption of the doctrines of the other. In confirmation of this mutual design of these parties, the right hon. member took occasion to quote a passage from the memoirs of a rural poet of considerable celebrity (Bloomfield, author of the Farmer's Boy, &c. by Mr. Capel Lofft) in which it is mentioned that the poet was in the habit of spending his time in reading in his garret, or attending a debating society, which the editor recommends as a much more worthy mode of employing himself, than if he had been occupied in gambling, drinking, or fighting. Mr. W. paid some very handsome compliments to the originality of many of the thoughts of this poet, to his natural simplicity, and unaffected elegance of language. He wished what he now said to be considered as an unexaggerated declaration of his opinion of the merits of the poem. But with this high opinion of the merits of the poet, he had doubts how far it was proper to encourage ideas of literary profit or renown in those who had been bred to a useful trade. In particular instances it might not be prejudicial; but to inculcate such notions as those contained in the passage of the memoirs to which he had referred, could tend only to a mischievous purpose. He regretted the minuteness with which he was obliged to enter into the consideration of the subject, but threw the blame on those by whom such a subject was introduced. An examination of the bill was not less necessary than if it had referred to a subject of the highest national importance. To examine the character of a daub of Teniers was often a work of more difficulty than to describe the beauties of the Madona of Raphael. —He next proceeded to read an extract from a sermon, which he declared he should in all probability never have read, but from the circumstances of its having been sent to him by the author, in which the cruelty of bull-baiting was described in very strong terms; and the man who would encourage the practice was represented as a person who would not hesitate to sheath a blade in the bowels of his fellow creatures. That the practice of sports even when they were of a cruel kind, tended to render mankind cruel, he denied, and he founded his assertion on the history of all ages and countries. The most elegant scholars, and the finest poets in antient or modern times, from Xenophon to Virgil and Milton, were loud in the praises of many of those sports which, with equal justice, might be called cruel, as that which had been so loudly condemned. What was the inference he drew from all this, but that cruelty was not at all the object of those sports though in certain instances it might be the result? If he were asked what was the object of bull-baiting? he should be better able to give an intelligible answer, than if he were asked a similar question with regard to hunting, or other amusements of a similar description. That a certain degree of gratification might be received from the spectacle of the combats of animals, the history of all ages sufficiently proved. Even the philosophy of the present age took part in a practice which had prevailed in this country for centuries. In the time of queen Elizabeth, that which was now despised and reprobated as the amusement only of the lowest of the people, was an amusement courted by all ranks. Since that period, bull-baiting had declined, and hunting had usurped its room. The one had become the favourite amusement of the great and the other had sunk in dignity till it was, in a great measure, annihilated. And yet it was at such a moment as this that the House were called upon to put it down by a legislative enactment. Was this, he asked, a time to abridge the amusements of the common people, when we were meditating the extension of the game laws to Ireland?—But the riots and confusion which the practice of bull-baiting occasioned were urged as another reason for the necessity of the interference of the legislature. This was a favourite argument on a former occasion when the subject was before the House, with an hon. friend of his (Mr. Wilberforce) the member for Yorkshire. In this instance, the conduct of his right hon. friend put him in mind of the story of the butcher who ran about seeking for his knife while it was in his teeth; for he was searching every quarter in quest of objects of reform, while those in his own neighbourhood were totally overlooked. When he condemned the excesses to which bull-baiting gave rise, had he forgotten all the confusion and riot which horse-racing produced? He himself did not object to the practice of horse-racing, since there were so many individuals to whom it was a source of pleasure. But he might be allowed to remind the House of the observation of

Dr. Johnson, who had expressed his surprise at the paucity of human pleasures, when horse-racing constituted one of their number. Perhaps the anxiety displayed by many persons in the pursuit of this pleasure, might be considered as approximating to the efforts of the degenerate emperors of Rome, to gratify a palate which luxury had rendered insensible to the ordinary materials of food. To horse-racing he was himself personally no more an enemy than he was to boxing—though in making this observation he was far from meaning to disparage boxing so far, as to put them on an equal footing, or to insinuate that so poor, mean, and wretched an amusement as the one, was at all to vie in importance with the other, which was connected with ideas of personal merit, and individual dignity. But he was confident, that, in point of effect on the morals of the people, the influence of horse-racing was infinitely more pernicious than any which bull-baiting could produce. What did a horse-race consist of? What was the description of persons whom it encouraged to assemble? They consisted of all the riff-raff from every part of the country. There were to be seen collected all the black-legs of the metropolis, the markers at billiard-tables, apprentices who had embezzled the property of their masters, and who were afterwards obliged to resort to knavery to cover their fraud, gingerbread venders, strolling gamblers, in a word, infamous characters of every description. Such was the description of individuals whom horse-racing assembled. Now, what was the object which such an amusement had in view? He confessed himself unable to view it in any other light than as a species of gambling. It did not seem to him to give exercise for one generous feeling. His hon. friend had, however, taken a cumbersome leap over no less than nine racing-grounds in the county which he represented, and had never descended till he had alighted at a bull-bait. He had totally neglected the duty of destroying abuses at home, but had spent all his labour, and exerted all his zeal, in poaching on foreign manors.—So much for the argument, that bull-baiting was productive of riot and confusion. He next recurred to the inexpediency of abridging the amusements of the lower orders at the present moment. There was a very numerous class of pleasures from which their circumstances in life excluded them.

To the pleasures of intellect, that source of the purest delight, their situation denied them access. To the accommodations of social life, so far as change of situation and place was concerned, they were strangers. The rich had their feasts, their assemblies, their parties of pleasure, their pic nics, every thing, in short, which could afford them gratification. From amusements of this kind the lower orders were excluded by their poverty. But there was another class of pleasure from which they were, in a great measure, excluded by the rigour of the law. The authority of the magistrate was often interposed to counteract even their harmless pleasures. To dance at all out of season, was to draw on their heads the rigor of unrelenting justice. The great might gratify themselves by a thousand different ways, and the magistrate did not conceive it within his sphere to interrupt their amusements. But it was known that an organ did not sound more harshly in the ears of a puritan, than did the notes of a fiddle in those of a magistrate, when he himself was not to be of the party. He made an allusion to a beautiful passage of Sterne, in which he describes the condition of the lower orders at the close of the day, when labour was finished, when families met together to join in social pleasures, when the old encouraged the sports of the young, and rejoiced in the amusements of their children. But what was all this when translated into plain English? It conveyed to us merely the idea of a hop. In confirmation of his ideas about the restraints to which the amusements of the lower orders were subjected, he referred to certain transactions which took place in a square at the West end of the town (Berkeley-square) a few years ago. The whole neighbourhood had been alarmed; the most serious apprehensions were excited; the aid of the military was judged necessary; and after all this idle pomp of authority, it was discovered that the formidable disturbers of the public peace were a few domestics dancing to the music of a blind sailor's fiddle. It was to be regretted, that many gentlemen should be anxious to deprive the lower orders of their amusements, from a seeming apprehension, that if they were suffered to enjoy those recreations they would not labour sufficiently, and might become, from their improvidence, a burthen to the poor-rates, to which the rich must contribute. This was a most injudicious system of thinking, and he cautioned the rich against acting upon it. The efficient part of the community for labour ought to be encouraged in their exertions, rather by furnishing them with occasional amusements, than by depriving them of one, as this bill proposed—a bill, the supporters of which would take them to the Tabernacle or to Jacobinism—for, if to poverty were to be added a privation of amusements, he knew nothing that could operate more strongly to goad the mind into desperation, and to prepare the poor for that dangerous enthusiasm which was analogous to Jacobinism.—He objected to the way in which gentlemen would have the House to look at the consequences of bull-baiting, by citing particular accidents, and from that concluding that the practice was cruel, and that the bull in baiting was treated with cruelty. He believed the bull felt a satisfaction in the contest, not less so than the hound did when he heard the sound of the horn which summoned him to the chace. True it was, that young bulls, or those which were never baited before, showed reluctance to be tied to the stake; but those bulls, which according to the language of the sport, were called game bulls, who were used to baiting, approached the stake and stood there while preparing, for the contest with the utmost composure. If the bull felt no pleasure, and was cruelly dealt with, surely the dogs had also some claim to compassion; but the fact was, that both seemed equally arduous in the conflict; and the bull, like every other animal, while it had the better side, did not appear to feel unpleasantly: it would be ridiculous to say he felt no pain; yet, when on such occasions he exhibited no sign of terror, it was a demonstrable proof that he felt some pleasure. With regard to the petition from Stamford against this bill, it was entitled to the most respectful attention, for it came from a body of sober loyal men, who attended to their several vocations, and never meddled with politics, faithful to their landlord (the marquis of Exeter), with whom, however, they could not avoid being a little displeased for his endeavours to deprive them of their favourite sport by supporting this bill. Those petitioners state, that this amusement had been enjoyed by their town, for a period of 5 or 600 years; and the antiquity of the thing was deserving of respect—for respect for antiquity was the best preservation of the church and state—it was by connecting the past with the present, and the present with the future, that genuine patriotism was produced and preserved.—He repeated that he was shocked and scandalized at the manner in which the advocates of this bill would persuade the House to act; to prohibit an old amusement, because it was the amusement of the poor; for the objection was not to the cruelty of the amusement, or the scope of the bill ought to be enlarged. Those gentlemen seemed to be influenced by a species of philosophy dictated by their wives, one of whom might be supposed to address her husband thus:—“My dear, do you know, that after you went out with your dogs this morning, I walked into the village, and was shocked to see a set of wretches at a bull-bait, tormenting the poor animal. I wish, dear, you would speak to our member, and request him to bring a bill into parliament to prevent that horrid practice.” Independent of the injustice of encroaching upon the few small amusements of the poor, he would beg the House to consider the consequence of rendering them discontented or dispirited, by leaving nothing for them but the wide waste of labour. The reason why our labourers were capable of more work than slaves, was obvious; because they felt that they worked for themselves; and, according as their profit, or their prospect of pleasure, which was the same thing, was increased, just so did their labour generally increase also. Such a bill as this to abridge men's pleasures, and to hold out a kind of direct hint to them that they never could labour enough, was sufficient to Jacobinize a whole country. In proof of the assertion, that bull-baiting did not operate to brutalize men's minds, he had only to turn the attention of the House to Lancashire and Staffordshire, where that practice principally prevailed. Those counties were known to produce the best soldiers in the army, and the militia of Staffordshire were known to have been selected, from their good behaviour, to do duty about the royal person; a pretty good proof that bull-baiting did not produce such effects on the morals of the people as the puritans affected to deplore, but rather such as the Jacobins in France and England very sincerely lamented. It was mockery in men to talk of the sufferings of animals from the sports of the lower orders, while they themselves were doing something worse. To the difference between the jolly bull-baiting peasant and his demure gloomy censors, he would apply the words of the poet—

“Tom struts a soldier, open, bold and brave;

The right hon. gentlemen concluded with stating, that if the bill before the House should be adopted, he should, for the sake of consistency and the character of parliament, conceive it his duty to move for leave to bring in a bill to prohibit hunting, shooting, fishing, and all the sports of the field practised by the higher orders.

Mr. Courtenay said, he was surprised to hear his right hon. friend complain, that the time of the House, at this important period, was employed on such a comparatively trifling subject as bull-baiting; for he had proved incontrovertibly, that bull-baiting was the great support of the constitution in church and state, and that the generosity, courage, and humanity of the lower ranks of the community solely originated from this heroic and laudable species of entertainment, which had distinguished both the dogs and men of this country from the earliest records of history. His right hon. friend had also obviated all objections to this rational sport, by most ingeniously and philosophically proving that the bull (which seemed to excite so much pity and compassion), derived a singular pleasure from the exhibition; and there was no doubt of the fact, though many gentlemen seemed to smile at the assertion. Yet there was no reason to suppose that the bull, after he had been baited two or three times, from that philosophical principle of association so ably elucidated by Locke, might not enjoy great and triumphant pleasure from the consciousness of his own prowess, from the shouts and applauses of exulting multitudes, who beheld this noble animal bellowing, and tossing the ferocious dogs, who attacked him, into another element; a sight equally singular, picturesque, and enchanting: and which had been happily described by one of our Epic poets,

“Up to the stars the growling mastiffs fly,

The right hon. gentleman might have analogically elucidated this wonderful principle of association; the source of some curious properties of mind, and by which modern philosophers have explained many phænomena in the moral world. He should just mention one instance, probably familiar to many gentlemen, who must have observed a bear dancing to music in the street. It might be asked, how was this awkward and uncouth animal disciplined into this graceful agility? Solely by association. The mode was, by putting a hot iron under the hind feet of the bear, and holding him in an upright situation, and playing a tune on the fiddle; the pain made the animal move briskly about, and change his position as quick as possible. After being sufficiently drilled to these manœuvres, he was publicly exhibited as a dancing bear; and the burning pain became so associated with the music, that whenever a fiddle was played, the same impression was conveyed to his brain, and produced similar gesticulations, and correspondent motions in his feet. Some gentlemen had expatiated on the cruelty of torturing an animal merely for sport and diversion: he begged leave to differ from them; a bull might be baited, from a pure principle of humanity, to preserve his life; for it was evident, if he was not reserved for this entertainment, he would be consigned to the slaughter-house; and he would seriously ask those affected philanthropists, whether, if the bull had his option, he would not rather prefer being baited twenty times, to the being knocked on the head once?—The right hon. gentleman had also proved, that bull-baiting saved us from all the horrors of Jacobinism and fanaticism. Surely this was of infinite importance to church and state! he should therefore hope a sum of money might be voted, and a number of bulls and dogs purchased, and dispersed over the kingdom, that morality and loyalty might be every where disseminated in the most agreeable way; and that the lower ranks of the community might receive instructions and lectures on their duty, without the irksome attendance of listening to a sermon, or being catechised at a parish church. He would also beg leave to ask, how the ex-ministers (who had, with grief of heart, seen the death-warrant of the constitution signed by the peace), could now employ themselves if this bill passed. Cut off at once from all the “pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war;” in what a desponding situation must they be left, without something of a warlike sport, such as bull-baiting, to keep up their spirits! Why, they might querulously exclaim, like the French gentleman, when Louis 14th, by one edict, had forbidden gaming, and by another duelling, who passionately cried out, "How does his majesty think a gentleman can divert himself?" Besides, through the interest of a noble friend of theirs, a few ferocious Corsican bulls might be imported. The most formidable and the fiercest might be called Buonaparté; and, by the strength of imagination, he might be identified with the first consul, and baited by English mastiffs, and by this happy expedient, patriotism and diversion equally united. Why does man enjoy superior wisdom and sagacity, but to call out the inclinations and propensities of the brute creation. What a glorious sight to see a dog attack a bull! It animates a British heart;—

"To see him growl, and snap, and snarl, and bite,

"Win the bull's nose, and prove instinctive might."

Besides, if bull-baiting was given up, the characteristic of our British dogs, so classically celebrated in the Augustan age of literature, would be totally lost. Claudian says,—"Magnaue taurorum fracturæ colla Britannæ." Symmachus mentions seven Irish bull-dogs—"Septem Scottici canes," as then first produced in the circus at Rome, to the great admiration of the people. The city of Norwich anciently patronised this animating patriotic amusement, and furnished Richard the 2nd with three bull-dogs and a bear; and no doubt would rejoice at having this regal constitutional sport renewed. These dogs are also distinguished from others by a surly dignity of aspect, a genuine courage, and an unshaken and ferocious fidelity to their masters. They were indeed suspected by Henry the 7th of a tendency to the dangerous principles of republicanism and Jacobinism (but he was an avaricious tyrant, and an usurper); and this monarch ordered one of them (a bull dog) to be hanged, because it had the courage, most treacherously and disloyally to engage singly with its lord and sovereign the lion. But James the 1st, equally venerated for spirit, wisdom, and humanity, often displayed all the splendour, elegance, and magnificence of his court, to embellish and decorate the favourite festival; and the lords and ladies of that auspicious æra encouraged and promoted a divertisement intimately connected with the prosperity, happiness, and glory of the kingdom. He hoped he had said enough to induce the House to negative this dangerous and opprobrious bill; but if it unfortunately went to a committee, he would introduce a clause to exempt some sacred spot in Norfolk from its fatal operation, where bull-baiting might be exultingly exhibited, and where the ex-ministers and their friends might, with joy and gladness of heart, be delighted with this image of war, and enjoy otium cum dignitate, till they were again called by the voice of the people and their sovereign to guide the helm of the state, and restore the triumphs of their country, by pursuing the same salutary and glorious measures which had distinguished their councils and administration.

Colonel Grosvenor thought the lower orders of the people entitled to their amusements, as well as the higher. The higher orders had their Billington; and why not allow the lower orders their bull?

General Gascoyne observed, that in the county in which he resided, the practice of bull-baiting differed from that in Staffordshire, Shropshire, and Hampshire. In Shropshire, he understood, the bulls were ornamented with flowers previous to their being baited, and their horns gilt and decorated. He said, bull-baiting was so popular a sport, that a bull was found the most attractive sign at an ale-house; and an hon. friend of his had a bull that had raised a regiment of cavalry, and another of foot, amounting altogether to 1,300 men; insomuch that the bull was called the recruiting serjeant; and what was particularly fortunate, his friend boasted that the population of the country was by means of the bull increased in a much greater degree than the recruiting service thinned it. He was of opinion, that this was not a subject worthy the consideration of the House; and he could scarcely believe that those who supported him were serious. If there was any abuse of the practice, the legislature might enact a regulation particularly applying to it; but the existence of a partial abuse was no ground for destroying the practice altogether. He considered it an amusement which the lower orders were entitled to; and it was with regret he observed a disposition in many of the members to deprive the poor of their recreations, and force them to pass their time in chaunting at conventicles.

Mr. Wilberforce thought that the subject had been treated with too much levity. If the good effects which had been attributed to it were really produced by bull-baiting, why not move to have it rendered more general? But the truth was, every argument employed to defend the practice had been merely palliative. Mere opinions had been stated to prove that it was nowise hurtful to morality; but for his own part, he thought it fostered every bad and barbarous principle of our nature; and he was sorry that any one so respectable as his right hon. friend had been found to defend it. He was certain if that right hon. gentleman, or any other member, had inquired into the subject minutely, he would no longer defend a practice which degraded human nature to a level with the brutes. The evidence against the practice was derived from respectable magistrates. From such evidence he had derived a variety of facts, which were too horrid to detail to the House. A bull, that honest, harmless, useful animal, was forcibly tied to a stake, and a number of bull-dogs set upon him. If he was not sufficiently roused by the pain of their attacks, the most barbarous expedients were hit upon to awake in him that fury which was necessary to the amusement of the inhuman spectators. One instance of the latter kind he would state; a bull had been bought for the sole purpose of being baited; but upon being fixed to the stake, he was found of so mild a nature, that all the attacks of the dogs were insufficient to excite him to the requisite degree of fury; upon which those who bought him refused to pay the price to the original owner, unless he could be made to serve their purpose: the owner, after numberless expedients, at last sawed off his horns, and poured into them a poignant sort of liquid, that quickly excited the animal to the wished-for degree of fury. When bulls were bought merely for the purpose of being baited, the people who bought them wished to have as much diversion (if diversion such cruelty could be called) as possible for their money. The consequence was, that every art, even fire, had been employed to rouse the exhausted animal to fresh exertions, and there were instances where he had expired in protracted agonies amidst the flames. It had been said, that it would be wrong to deprive the lower orders of their amusements, of the only cordial drop of life which supported them under their complicated burthens. Wretched, indeed, must be the condition of the common people of England, if their whole happiness consisted in the practice of such barbarity! Such a supposition was a satire, not only on the name of Englishmen, but on the Creator who formed reasonable creatures with such barbarous propensities. Of all the arguments ever invented by Jacobinism to prove the wretched state of the lower orders, this surely was the strongest, if the only enjoyment of the common people of England was derived from the practice of bull-baiting. It had been said, that this practice contributed to keep alive the martial ardour of the nation. But had it not been proved, by experience, that the greatest, the most renowned characters, had always been the most humane? When we considered that the victim of this human amusement was not left to the free exertion of his natural powers, but bound to a stake, and baited with animals instinctively his foes, and urged by acclamation to attack him, must we not conclude that the practice was inconsistent with every manly principle, cruel in its designs, and cowardly in its execution? No man was more unwilling than he was to encroach upon the amusements of the lower orders; on the contrary, he wished to rescue them from the ignominious reproach cast upon them, that they were so ignorant and so debased as to be fit only to enjoy the cowardly amusement of tormenting an harmless and fettered animal to death.—But it had been stated, that the present bill ought not to be passed, without also preventing shooting, hunting, and every other attack on inferior animals. Suppose these diversions to be equally inhuman, would not the admission of this argument infer, that no vice was to be abolished because all of the same species could not at once be done away? But it was by no means proper to place the diversions of shooting and horse-racing on a footing with bull-baiting. Shooting afforded exercise to the body, and the birds who fell by it were subjected to no pain beyond immediate deprivation of life. In horse-racing, two generous animals, with scarcely any compulsion, exerted their speed against each other, and returned from the course with small abatement of spirits or vigour. But bull-baiting not only excited the natural passions of the animal for the amusement of the spectators, but also subjected it to the most inhuman cruelties, till it sunk under the pressure of its complicated miseries. It was easy to dress up a metaphysical picture in one's closet, till the author was led to admire the image of his own creation. But if instead of such refinements we attended to the voice of common sense, we should be convinced that no happiness could result from a practice so cruel, base, and unjust—that no pleasure could be derived from wantonly torturing the brutes which were given us, not for such barbarous purposes, but for our use and pleasure. Without such an amusement, the common people of England had surely a sufficient number of innocent amusements, in their festivals, their gambols, their athletic exercises. His right hon. friend, while picturing the happiness derived from bull-baiting, had forgot that it was confined to an individual, while his wretched family excluded from any participation of the spectacle, were condemned to feel the want of that money which he squandered away on such occasions. He had never heard a speech tending so strongly to make the people dissatisfied with their condition. It was not his wish to deprive them of their manly recreations, but he could not give this character to a diversion founded on cowardice and cruelty. Great writers had placed the summit of human happiness, not in picnics, but in the cottage of the peasant, surrounded with his smiling family. This was the happiness, and this the recreation, varied and combined with manly exercises abroad, which belonged naturally to the people of England; and he would not suffer them to be degraded by supposing, that like bull-dogs, they had an instinctive desire for this sport. One thing more he should take notice of, namely, the charge which the right hon. gentleman had made on him of jumping over the horse-racing. He was not himself a frequenter of horse-races; and though they were very frequent in the county which he had the honour to represent, it was not thought an indispensable duty in the representative of that county to frequent races. He repeated, however, that he did not think it so cruel to see two generous animals exert their powers against each other; and if there was any cruelty in horse-races, it was in the matches against time, which would have been a better theme for the right hon. gentleman's censure, unless he had that in reserve as a public amusement after bull-baiting should be abolished. On a comparison of the different sports, it would be found that none of them partook of cruelty so largely as bull-baiting. No man could be partial to it, except from an imaginary view; a real knowledge would silence all its advocates.

Mr. W. Smith declared, that he thought the right hon. gentleman, from being goaded by the terrors of Jacobinism, had run as wild as any bull that ever was baited. He denied that bull-baiting was necessary to the happiness of the people. If it were wished to keep them in a degraded and brutal state, it would be right to inure them to such spectacles. But he who had a just notion of their dignity, and wished to raise them in the scale of being, would try to cultivate their minds, to polish their manners, and to instruct them in the principles of morality and religion.

—Ingenuas dedicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros.

He never heard arguments of a wilder or more eccentric nature than those which had been urged in favour of bull-baiting. He thought it absurd to say that government were not entitled to interfere with any amusement of the people, provided it was found to be of pernicious consequences. If the common people of this country were capable of relishing no amusement but bull-baiting, they were arrived at a state of debasement beyond what he could have conceived. He was convinced this was not the case, but that the abolition of so inhuman a practice would be approved of by all ranks of people.

Mr. Newbolt denied, that those instances cited by the hon. member who opposed the bill bore any comparison with the practice in question. He did not consider the prohibition as drawing, in principle, any line of distinction between the rich and the poor; and he would support the bill, principally because the practice it went to suppress tended to disgrace the national character.

Mr. Frankland said, that all those who had argued in support of the measure, had entirely mistaken the principle upon which the amusement in question proceeded, as well as the motives and objects of those who engaged in it; and he deprecated unjustifiable appeals which were made to the passions of the House on the occasion. He contended, that if the amusement involved, in any degree, the practice of cruelty, it was not induced by those who participated in the sport for the sake of cruelty. In some points of view, the amusement of horse-racing might also be termed cruel; there was not a year in which numbers were not killed in that sport; but as horses were a lively and spirited animal, he was inclined to think the amusement in no sense a cruel one. So might it be said of stag hunting—the animal in that case, was fed and pampered previous to the chase, not with a reference to its future torture, but that it might yield the greater sport—the animal often, necessarily, lost his life in the chase—its heart was what was called broken: did gentlemen think that such a process could take place without producing great agony? The hounds often fastened on his chest, and tore him to pieces—and yet such a practice had entirely escaped the humanity of the legislature; nay, the practice was even regulated by legislative provisions. The principle on which this bill seemed to proceed would go to libel the most exalted characters in the country. Recurring to bull-baiting, he stated, that none of the cruelties imputed to the practice took place. The assumption that the practice of bull-baiting had increased, was false. The national character was, he thought, implicated in the present question. It was the encouragement given to such manly sports and invigorating exercises that made us what we were. He expatiated on the virtues of the English bull-dog. The people and the animals of this country were of a peculiar cast and character, both original and excellent in their kind; and animals, as we learnt from ancient writers, were often the best preceptors of men. On the same principle proceeded the maxim, that “wise men learned more from fools, than fools from wise men.” With respect to the penalties held forth by the bill, he thought them rigorous. The first time the legislature ever interfered with the sports of the country was in the time of Henry 8th, in consequence of which the people addicted themselves to sedentary and unmanly pursuits, which in after-times the legislature thought it proper to decry. So would it be in the present instance: the liberal and national sports of chuckfarthing and turnpenny would be adopted, and to these the people would be advised to give their days and nights.

Mr. Sheridan said, that one hon. colonel had shortly declared his opposition to the bill, by vindicating the rights of the lower

orders to their favourite sports; and had asked, if the fashionable world had their Billington, why the lower orders should not have their bull? But the hon. gentleman contented himself with exhibiting this short specimen of his eloquence; and just said enough to convince the House that he was in the right to leave off. An hon. general near him, too, had talked of the sport of bull-baiting in that part of the country where he resided; but in a manner not to illustrate the argument of the hon. member who spoke last, that it was a lesson of morality; for all that he stated in its favour was, that a baited bull made a good recruiting serjeant, but at the same time promoted idleness and drunkenness among the men, and profligacy among the women, to such a degree as made amends to the population of the country for the recruits decoyed away, by promoting a certain species of intercourse which he believed would hardly recommend the continuance of bull-baiting to the House as a moral institution. Another hon. gentleman considered the bill as one of those light and trivial subjects, which was not worthy to occupy the deliberations of parliament, and he compared it to certain bills of a local nature, respecting inclosures, and other disposal of property, which merely passed by chance, as members could not be got to attend their progress. But he would ask, what species of argument was this, coming from a right hon. gentleman who had been always so zealous to impress the country with a due respect for the sentiments of that parliament, whom he this night represented to be utterly inattentive to the disposal of property in distant counties—or what opinion were such arguments likely to impress upon the gentlemen of landed property in those counties? From the speech of the right hon. gentleman, it did not appear that he himself thought the subject of this bill one of trivial consideration. His oration smelt of the lamp; it evinced no inconsiderable share of study and research. “What,” said the right hon. gentleman, “will Europe think of the wisdom of this House, when, at a crisis so awful, it is occupied with deliberations on a subject so insignificant as bull-baiting? What will Europe say of us?” Why, whatever they say of us, they must say, that the right hon. gentleman, who seems to think so lightly of the subject, talks as much about it as any of us. But for the feelings of the right hon. gentleman on the subject of bull-baiting, he could account from the state of his mind in consequence of the treaty of peace concluded so much against his wishes. Deprived of the pleasure arising from the sanguinary combats between mankind, and no longer amused by the details of battles and of carnage, the right hon. member turned eagerly to the contests between brute animals; and enjoyed the war between bulls and dogs, as if the restoration of a branch of the Bourbon family was staked on the result. The right hon. gentleman, too, found out that bull-baiting was the only remedy for disconcerting the revolutionary plots of Jacobinism and Methodism; and he extolled the joyous, jovial, and elegant delights of this noble sport, as opposed to the morose and austere spirit of those who condemned it. But if the right hon. member thought the subject of such light and insignificant import as he professed, it would have better become him to treat it with ridicule, than with so much gravity. The right hon. member complained of the magistrates, and their promptitude to put down the favourite sports of the people, and this among the rest. Now there was nothing in which he (Mr. S.) could concur with him more cheerfully, than in condemning the injudicious severity with which the sports of the common people, in many counties were attacked indiscriminately by the magistrates. In the endeavours to suppress the sport of bull-baiting, however, he would give the magistrates every praise for their exertion, convinced that it was the most mischievous of all amusements, and most calculated to brutalize their manners. Some allusion had been made to a project to revive old English diversions in the country. He himself had the honour to be one who, in conjunction with an hon. general (Burgoyne), had formed that project; and he could assure the House, that not only bull-baiting, but every other species of cruel diversion, were expressly forbidden in that project; and the right hon. gentleman, in his zeal for condemning ancient sports, and civilizing the people of England, concluded his speech by threatening to bring in a bill to abolish horse-racing, shooting, fishing, and all other field sports of the higher orders, if this bill should pass into law. But this menace would not have much effect upon the House. Another hon. member had argued, that bull-baiting was not adopted for the sake of cruelty; but he owned he saw no difference that could arise in the fact from the motives of those who pursued this diabolical amusement, as it was called, since the sport arose out of the cruelty; and, notwithstanding the elaborate orations of both gentlemen, he must consider cruelty to brute animals as a crime, whether done for amusement, for sport or for gluttony; and therefore if there were not laws to prevent, if not to punish such cruelties, there certainly ought to be. He agreed that many of the most striking lessons to man were to be learned from animals, but it was from animals in their natural state and exhibiting their natural qualities. Man derived much of his knowledge from the animal creation.

"Learnt from the little Nautilus to sail,
"And spread the canvas to the swelling gale."
It was not by using craft to make an animal the enemy of another (not so by nature), that instruction was to be obtained; nor where one, trained by the artifices of man, attacked another tied to a stake, and deprived of the means of defending himself. What sort of moral lesson was it to the wife and children of the farmer, who sold his bull for the purpose of being baited, to see the poor, simple, harmless animal, which for years they had cherished as a favourite, and learned to look on with affection, tied to a stake, worried by dogs, and his bleeding tongue torn out of his mouth by the roots? But cruelty to the bull was not the only cruelty exercised on these occasions. What sort of moral lesson, for instance, was it to the children of the farmer, who brings his aged bull-bitch, many years the faithful sentinel of his house and farm-yard, surrounded by her pups, to prove at the bull-ring the staunchness of her breed? He brings her forward, sets her at the infuriated animal; she seizes him by the lip, and pins him to the ground. But what is the reward from his owner, amid the applauses of the mob, to his favourite animal? He calls for a hedging bill, and, to prove her breed, hews her to pieces without her quitting her grip, while he sells her puppies at five guineas a piece! Another enters his dog at the animal; his leg is broken in the attack. His owner lays a wager that he shall pin the bull near the lip. He calls the dog, cuts off his leg, then sets him at the bull, which he pins; and having thus won the wager, he is whistled back by his grateful master, who, while he licks his hands, generously cuts his throat. These were some of the hopeful lessons of morality which were to be taught by bull-baiting! It seemed it was a royal sport in the days of good queen Bess; but, though great the courage and prowess of those days, the conduct of our soldiers and sailors, in the late war, exhibited no great degeneracy, notwithstanding the melancholy decrease of this admirable school of morals and bravery. Though the sport should be dignified with king's plates, and gold collars for bull-dogs, he never could be taught to believe that courage would be learned from the exercise of cruelty. If he wished, under the mask of friendship for the people, to make them servile, he would teach them to be cruel. If he wished to induce them to submit to a system of government by barracks and bastiles, he would encourage bull-baiting. If he wished to make them submit to a "vigour beyond the law," he would recommend bull-baiting. If he wished them to see with apathy and unconcern their friends "killed off," he would teach them to inflict cruelties on animals, to oppress the weak, and to abuse their power and superiority; for those who were taught to abuse their own power, were the first to submit to it in others. It had been said, that the laws were already sufficient to prevent the abuse of the practice of bull-baiting. If that had been the case, there would not have been petitions stating the want of efficacy in the law. There were things which were nuisances, and yet the law was inadequate to the suppression of them. Some things were nuisances, because they were contra bonos mores—others were unlawful, because they were malum in se—others because they were malum in loco. Corydon and Phillis might do that in a shady retreat, which it might not be right to do in the pit of the opera-house. A man might walk about in his own closet without clothes on; but it would not do to lounge in Bond-street in the costume of our primitive parents. You might put birds and animals eyes out in private, no one could prevent you; but it would not do to have an exhibition of such a nature at the top of the Haymarket. The only question was, whether, if bull-baiting were abolished, there ought to be an end of all sports? He maintained the contrary: he could discover no cruelty in other sports. He knew that sportsmen uniformly wished to avoid wounding birds. If cruelty followed their sports, it was against their will; but bull-baiting was the only diversion that arose from a desire of cruelty.

If the old law upon this subject was worn out—if it had not teeth to hold, let the legislature set about pinning it down by a younger and more vigorous law. He trusted the gentlemen who opposed the bill would find themselves in a small minority; in his opinion, if they were not, it would be a disgrace to the House.

Mr. Dent replied. As for the petitions, all those which called for the suppression of this savage amusement, were signed by respectable persons in the neighbourhood of the place from whence the petition came. The solitary counter-petition was obtained by the influence of a young attorney on some of the lowest of the rabble of his neighbourhood. As for the lower class of people, they were sufficiently quiet, if let alone; and he never recollected to have heard a speech which was of a more Jacobinical tendency than the warm appeal to the vulgar prejudices of the rabble, which had been made that night. As to the cruelties which had been exercised in this horrid sport, he could prove that they infinitely exceeded what had yet been described; he could prove that persons had wounded the animal in the tenderest parts with knives, and then poured aqua fortis into the bleeding wounds, in order to provoke the beast to madness.

The question being put, "that the bill be now read a second time," general Gascoyne moved as an amendment, "that it be read a second time this day three months." The question being put, "that the said bill be now read a second time," the House divided:

Tellers.

|      |                         |      |
|------|-------------------------|------|
|      | { Mr. Dent .....        |      |
| NOES | { General Gascoyne..... | } 64 |
|      | { Mr. Windham .....     |      |

So it passed in the negative. After which it was ordered, that the said bill be read a second time upon this day three months.

Mr. Canning's Motion respecting the Cultivation of the Island of Trinidad. May 27. Mr. Canning rose, to bring forward his promised motion respecting the cultivation of the island of Trinidad, and said:—Mr. Speaker; circumstances, which I do not think it necessary to trouble the House with explaining, have prevented me from taking any part in the important discussions which have lately occupied parliament. But although, by these circumstances, and by the feelings arising out of them, I have found myself precluded from expressing, even by my vote, the opinion which I certainly have formed upon the general subject of the treaty of peace; yet, that treaty being once concluded, and having received the sanction of parliament, whatever may be my private opinion of the peace, there is but one duty, for every member of this House, and for every good subject of this kingdom, to endeavour, as far as in him lies, to make the best of the new situation in which the country is placed by it, to turn to the best account the advantages which are left to us; and in that view to push, as far as it is capable of going, the improvement of those valuable acquisitions, which, from among the numerous and brilliant conquests of the war, we have been fortunate enough to be able to retain.

I do assure the House, that it is with this view, and in this spirit, that I have presumed to solicit their attention to one of those two important acquisitions, the island of Trinidad. I will not deny or disguise that my attention was first and most forcibly drawn to this island, by the connection which one possible mode of cultivating and improving it necessarily has with a subject upon which I have, in common with a large proportion of the community at large, felt very strongly; I mean the African slave trade; the enormous increase of which, if the whole island of Trinidad should be to be brought into cultivation by imported negroes, must be such as to appal any man who looks at it, and such as must shock this House when it considers its own recorded opinions upon that subject. But though this was the first point of view in which I considered Trinidad, I should do great injustice to the cause which I have undertaken, if I were not to aver, that, in examining into the subject with this view, I have found reason to be convinced full as strongly that the cultivation of Trinidad, in the manner to which I have referred, is not more directly forbidden by the fear of that danger and that shame which would attend the enormous extension of the slave trade, or rather the creation of a new slave trade for this express purpose, than it is by every consideration of the security of the colonies, and of the true policy of this country, under the present circumstances of the world.

It will appear from what I have said, that if any gentleman came hither with the expectation of hearing a long discussion on the subject of the slave trade considered by itself, he will find himself, perhaps not disagreeably, mistaken. I have no desire, and it is not at all necessary for my object, to go into any such discussion. All that I wish to prove upon that subject I find already established by much more satisfactory authority than any reasoning of mine could afford, the votes of the House of Commons. I shall assume upon this subject nothing but what the House of Commons has affirmed and recorded. If any gentleman supposed that it was my intention to depreciate the value, or obstruct the improvement of Trinidad, he is equally mistaken: I wish to improve it more effectually, and to greater advantage than could be done by the old system; I wish only to prevent your throwing away the opportunity of an improvement essential not only to the immediate value of this one acquisition, but to the safety of all your old possessions in the same part of the world. Lastly, Sir, if any one could imagine that my object was to create embarrassment to the present administration by the proposition which I am about to submit to you, I know not how I can better refute such an imagination than by declaring, which I confidently and conscientiously do, that had the same opportunity, the same necessity I should rather call it, for discussing the modes of cultivation applicable to a new island in the West Indies, arisen under another administration, under the administration of those who possessed all my confidence, and, exclusively, all my attachment; of those who had the glory of acquiring Trinidad, instead of those who have had the prudence to retain it: I should equally have thought it a duty, unless the subject had been previously taken up by the government, or by abler hands than mine, not to let the first session of parliament, after Trinidad had become the property of the British crown, pass away without calling the House to the consideration of some such proposition as I have now the honour to submit to you. I trust this will be deemed a satisfactory answer upon this point. If not, I have no professions to make, I have nothing more to add, but that I do feel myself to be discharging my duty, and that, for the discharge of a duty, I presume, no apology is required.

I may perhaps hear it alleged that there is no necessity, or no justification for the interference of the House of Commons in the present stage of this business. As to the necessity of some such measure as that which I have to propose, the best way of proving it, perhaps, will be, to state shortly the course of the events and observations which have induced me to bring this measure forward. Not long after the signing of the preliminaries of peace, a paper was circulated, not only in the city of London, but throughout the Leeward islands, purporting to be a copy of the plan in possession of government, for the allotment and sale of the unclaimed lands in Trinidad; with such a description of the fertility and convenience of the settlement as was calculated to excite the cupidity of monied men, and to lead to the expenditure of a great sum of British capital on that speculation. I do not say that this plan was circulated by government, or with their knowledge; but from whatever quarter it came, it certainly agreed entirely with the papers which government have since produced to the House of Commons, or rather these papers are but an imperfect, though, as far as they go, a faithful abstract of the plan so circulated. About the same time a sort of notice was given in this House by the right hon. the chancellor of the exchequer, of an intention to raise a sum of money (no matter for what purpose—the purpose specified is now otherwise and unobjectionably provided for), by the sale of uncleared lands, the property of the crown, in the West Indies. Putting these two circumstances together, I could not but be struck with their coincidence, and I took the earliest opportunity that the meeting of parliament after the Christmas recess afforded, to ascertain, whether or no there did exist such an intention respecting the island of Trinidad, and whether parliament was to be apprised of the plan, and to have an opportunity of considering it before it was carried into execution? I received no assurance that such an intention did not exist; but I was distinctly told, that if such a plan was in agitation, it would not be thought necessary previously to submit it to parliament. It seemed to me that there remained but one course to pursue—to call the attention of this House to the subject; which I have accordingly done; and unless the House of Commons means to abandon its own pledges and duties altogether, it will not refuse to en-tain the proposition which I have to submit to its consideration.

As to the right of this House to entertain such a proposition, if it shall see it good, that surely is not easy to be disputed. Parliament has been called upon by the executive government to consider the whole of the treaty, by which, in compensation for many valuable restitutions, Trinidad is ceded to this country. Parliament has been invited to acknowledge its value, to congratulate upon its acquisition. It appears to follow, by a consequence scarcely necessary to be argued, that parliament has the right to ascertain the value which it acknowledges, and to deliberate how best to establish and improve the importance of that acquisition upon which it has offered its congratulations to the throne; above all, that it has a right to implore of the throne that this acquisition shall not be employed in a manner directly to contravene and render nugatory resolutions which this House has formerly passed, and wishes which it has expressed to the throne, and which the throne has graciously received. And if the necessity or the right exist at all, this is the stage of the business in which alone our interference can be effectual. Wait till the sale and allotment of lands in Trinidad is actually made, and the thing is past your power; the mischief is done—and you can only regret, fruitlessly, that you did not interfere sooner.

This brings me to state precisely the object of my present motion. My object is delay only: I wish to prevent the immediate, and, as I contend, the improvident disposal of the lands of Trinidad, in a manner that must completely frustrate the views of the House of Commons, until parliament shall have had an opportunity of examining and discussing the subject. I wish to keep the subject within the power of parliament. I do not propose to you to decide any thing now, one way or the other: I only entreat of you not to suffer it to be made impossible for you to come to the decision which may be right hereafter. I do not touch any thing that exists: I have nothing to do with the slave trade, as far as it is now carried on for the supply of our already subsisting establishments in the West Indies; I have no thought of invading or endangering the vested interests of the West India proprietors: just the contrary; I am persuaded I shall show that what I have to propose is calculated to strengthen and secure them. I entreat gentlemen, therefore, to put out of their minds the abstract question of the slave trade, and all the discussions and feelings which belong to it; I entreat them to consider this question in its true light, as a new question arising out of a new state of things in the colonial world, and as one which it would become us equally to consider, whether the old slave trade were to exist or to be abolished, or to be partially restrained. Whatever may be the fate of the existing slave trade, the question of creating a new slave trade for the cultivation of new land in a new colony, is fit matter for separate discussion; and the question of, whether this be the only, or the best mode of turning the island of Trinidad to good account? is one which it becomes us seriously to investigate, and to investigate now. When grants or sales have taken place, it will be too late. There will then be vested interests to set up, in bar of any decision upon the subject of this new slave trade; or those individuals who vest their property in Trinidad, in the hopes of the slave trade being confirmed to them, will have to complain that the contract of government is broken. I wish government to keep its faith; I wish the House of Commons to preserve its character; and this can only be done by pausing to examine, before Trinidad is hastily put out of their hands.

The object of the motion thus defined, there are naturally two distinct branches into which the considerations belonging to it divide themselves. First, how far is the House pledged not to adopt any measure that may tend to create a new slave trade, and how far is the cultivation of Trinidad, in the manner proposed, likely to interfere with those pledges? Secondly, what is the best account to which Trinidad can be turned, in every view of colonial and national policy? To prove what were the recorded opinions and pledges of the House, Mr. Canning desired that the resolution of the House of Commons, of the 2nd of April 1792, "That the slave trade ought to be gradually abolished," should be read; and also the address of that House, of the 6th of April 1797, praying, "That his majesty would direct such measures to be taken as should (among other things) gradually diminish the necessity, and ultimately lead to the termination of the slave trade;" together with his majesty's gracious answer to that address, "That he would give directions accordingly." [They were read accordingly.]—Before he proceeded to comment on votes of the House of Commons, it would perhaps be expedient, as there were many members of the House who might not have assisted at the passing of them, shortly to notice their history.—The first of them, the resolution of 1792, was moved by a right hon. friend of his (Mr. Dundas), who was certainly never supposed to be indifferent to the interest of the colonies, or to the utmost practicable extent of colonial cultivation. Yet such was the spirit in which this resolution was conceived, so far was the framer of it from having any view to the laying a new basis for the trade in slaves, by bringing new land into cultivation, that it was expressly stated by him as part of his plan, to appoint a commission to ascertain the losses which actual West India proprietors might sustain from being prevented from bringing uncleared land, already their private property, into cultivation; so strictly was it intended to guard against any increase of the slave trade by an increase of cultivation. The address of 1797 was as little the fruit of enthusiasm and wild speculation: it was moved by an hon. friend of his, now near him (Mr. Charles Ellis), himself a West India proprietor, and acting in this instance, as he was sure his hon. friend would readily acknowledge, as the representative and organ of the whole body of West India proprietors in parliament. The object of this address was, to give to parliament and the country the assurance that the West Indians themselves laid claim to the continuance of the slave trade only till such time as they should be able to continue their cultivation on the then existing scale without it; not to increase the slave trade beyond its actual bounds, still less to uphold the principles or defend the justice of it; but, on the contrary, to give a pledge of their desire gradually to diminish, and ultimately to abolish it, whenever that could be done consistently with those vested interests which they conceived to be guaranteed to them by the faith of parliament and of the country. Such was the object of that address; and the benevolence and ingenuousness of the character of him whom they selected to bring it forward, were undoubtedly the best securities that could be offered to the House for the sincerity of those who promoted and those who concurred in it.

—I appeal, then, to my hon. friend (said Mr. Canning), whether or not, on the principle of the address which he then moved, he does not feel himself bound, and not himself only, but all those whose sentiments he spoke, and all whose concurrence he obtained on that occasion, to vote in support of a measure, the object of which is not only strictly conformable to the spirit, but falls much within the letter of his address; which goes not even to diminish the old slave trade, but to prevent a fresh one from being instituted, more enormous in its extent, and more aggravated in its evils? I appeal to those moderate men who supported that address of my hon. friend, and the resolution of 1792, which I before referred to, who hailed that proposition (the resolution of 1792) as the first moderate practical measure which had been brought forward for the sanction of parliament, as equally remote from enthusiasm on the one hand, and from a cold-blooded, hard-hearted approbation of a trade, “to the horrors of which,” as they emphatically said, “no words could add,” on the other hand;—I appeal to them whether they can withhold their assent,—I desire them to tell to me on what principle they can withhold it,—from a proposition, which is moderate even in comparison with their moderation; which does not injure a hair of the head of the existing slave trade, leaves it to be abolished as gradually as they please, but only prevents a new and rival slave trade from arising, to cross and blast their benevolent intentions. I appeal particularly to those among them who, when the period at which the slave trade was to be made to cease altogether was under consideration, voted either for the year 1796, which was carried, or the year 1800, the longest period to which any man then ventured to propose prolonging its existence; with what face they can stand up and defend a plan for cultivating a new island with new importations; a plan which must make the beginning of the nineteenth century, not the period of the extinction of the slave trade, as they fondly voted it, but the era of its revival, of its new birth, the date from which its warmest and most anxious admirers may cease to fear for its mortality or decay.

I have said, that the motion which I have to propose goes on different grounds from any other that has heretofore been submitted to the deliberation of parliament. It certainly sets out with great difference of circumstances in this respect—that if there be consistency in man, those persons who have been the most violent opponents of every former measure for the restriction of the slave trade, are bound to support this; the moderate men, and the West Indians. To the West Indians, indeed, I have still other arguments to address,—those of their interest, which are manifestly in my favour; but for the present I am contented to appeal to their consistency. There remain, then, but two classes of persons from which I could apprehend any difference of opinion: the first a small, I hope, and select class, those who admire the slave trade for itself, who deem of it, as Cicero did of virtue, that it requires only to be looked at to be beloved.—“Quæ si videretur incredibilem amorem excitaret sui.” With men holding that opinion I can have no argument. It requires a degree of fellow-feeling to be able even to differ in discussion to any purpose. One must settle at what point the difference begins; but such persons must have their minds altogether so differently constituted, their sentiments, affections, and passions must be so unlike any thing that I can conceive, that I avow my incapacity to understand them, and my despair of making them understand me. To their opposition, therefore, I must make up my mind; but I trust to theirs only.—The other class to which I have alluded is one whose opposition I should be concerned to have to encounter; that of those with whom from the beginning I have cordially agreed in opinion respecting the necessity of abolishing the slave trade. I trust it will not be felt by such persons, that the proposition which I offer, because a modified is an unsatisfactory one. I know that in minds of a sanguine cast such a feeling is sometimes apt to prevail; that partially to redress a grievance is often erroneously conceived and represented as giving sanction and establishment to all that part which you leave as you found it; and that this feeling is sometimes even carried so far as to rejoice in any increase of the grievance, from the notion that it must ensure and accelerate the total remedy. But this doctrine is surely to be received with some qualification. First, indeed, it may possibly be true, where those who are to bear the ill, and those who are to administer the remedy, are the same persons.

Then I can understand an enthusiastic observer saying of those who are labouring under oppression, from which they might free themselves, but will not, "I am glad that they are made to feel still more; grind them harder still, and let us see if they will at length be roused to resistance." But is this the sort of case which we are now to consider? Is this the road by which alone we look to arrive at a remedy? God forbid! There is yet another consideration; that of degree. If the augmentation of evil would accelerate the remedy in such a degree as that the proportion of evil incurred in the whole would be less than if you had acquiesced in partial redress, at the risk of leaving what was unredressed to last the longer, there might be some ground for rejecting partial measures; but is not this at best a hazardous experiment?—and may not the augmentation of the evil be so great, in the first instance, as that no man would be justified in consenting to it on so precarious a hope of ultimately hastening the remedy. Let us see then what is the degree of increase to the slave trade which will be occasioned by bringing Trinidad into cultivation, according to the plan in the papers on your table?

The right hon. gentleman here entered into a statement, from the papers before the House, of the quantity of land remaining to be granted in Trinidad, in order to form some estimate of the number of negroes that would be required to bring it into cultivation. "There remained to be granted 2,720 allotments of land, of 320 acres each, amounting in all to 876,400 acres; of which near one half, or 420,000 acres, were stated to be fit for the cultivation of sugar. He particularized this, because the sugar cultivation was that which required so much the greatest proportion of negro labour, that it in fact might be taken as regulating the importation. From the same authority it appeared, that the estates already granted (by the Spanish government, for no grant had been made since the island came into the possession of the crown of Great Britain) were in number 400. The quantity of each estate was not specified in the papers on the table, but from authority on which he relied the more, as he had found it correct in every particular where those papers afforded the means of comparison, he was enabled to state that the whole amount of the land in cultivation was somewhere about 34,000 acres, or not quite one twenty-fifth of what remained to be granted. On the island, in this state of cultivation, were employed, according to his information, confirmed in this respect by the papers on the table, 10,000 negroes. The simplest way then of ascertaining the number required to cultivate the remainder, would be to multiply the number already in the island by twenty-five. The result was 250,000. This calculation, however (large as it might appear to gentlemen), was less than would be found to be the result of a comparison of Trinidad with the island of Jamaica. In Jamaica, in the year 1791, there were about one million of acres in cultivation, of which about 350,000 in sugar (the remainder in the minor staples, coffee, cotton, &c. and in provision grounds, &c. for the supply of the sugar estates); Jamaica at that time contained upwards of 250,000, perhaps nearer 300,000 negroes. The proportion of sugar cultivation being taken in each instance as the criterion of the requisite negro population, it would hardly be thought an exaggerated statement, if when Jamaica, for 350,000 acres of sugar, employed, say only 250,000 negroes, he considered only the same number as required for 420,000 sugar acres in Trinidad. In fact, he might assume a much larger number; and for the data on which he proceeded with respect to Jamaica, he desired to observe that he relied for the most part on the statements of Mr. Bryan Edwards (a gentleman, of whose memory he meant to speak with great respect, and of whose support to the present motion, had he been still living, he should have felt himself very confident, so much impressed was that gentleman with the conviction that the system of negro colonies had been pushed already to an extent beyond which it could not go without imminent danger). He took Mr. Edwards's statements, though certainly below the truth, in respect to the negro population, in preference to those of the report of the privy council, which would have justified him in a much larger calculation; both because Mr. Edwards's being lower, he was the less liable to a suspicion of exaggeration in choosing them, and because, being before the public, there was the better opportunity for every gentleman who wished it, to follow him in his deductions, and to correct him if he was wrong. 250,000, then, was the least amount of negroes required for cultivating the projected allotments of Trinidad. But was this all? Nothing like it. The question was not as to cultivating only, but as to clearing and bringing into cultivation, into sudden cultivation, if the whole were to be disposed of, according to the plan in contemplation, to the best bidder at one time. It had required a century and a half to bring Jamaica to its present state of cultivation. But was it to be supposed that at the present day, with such a command of capital, with the spirit of enterprise so much alive, Trinidad would be brought into cultivation so gradually? But in this gradual progression, what was the amount of the importations from Africa which had been required to cultivate Jamaica? Of this, for a certain portion of the time, for eighty-seven years, from the beginning of the last century, Mr. Edwards gave a statement, which he (Mr. E.) averred to be correct. In the year 1673, the negroes in Jamaica were 9,400 in number, within a trifle the same number that the papers on the table assign to Trinidad. In the year 1791 they amounted to 250,000, the number required for Trinidad. From the year 1700 to 1787, the numbers imported from Africa amounted to 610,000. In Jamaica, therefore, there had been required a recruit of 610,000 (without reckoning any thing for the years preceding 1700, or subsequent to 1787), in addition to the natural increase upon the island, to bring up a population of 9,400 gradually to 250,000. Add to this computation the immensely increased mortality from pushing the cultivation of Trinidad with the rapidity with which it would be pushed by purchasers anxious to turn their capital as quickly as possible; add the waste of lives in clearing new lands (the most unwholesome and destructive part of the agriculture of the West Indies), and from employing newly-imported and unseasoned negroes (another infallible cause of aggravated mortality); and if with these additions he were to assume one million of negroes as the lowest amount that would be to be imported from Africa before Trinidad was as effectually cleared and cultivated as Jamaica, he was persuaded that he could not be accused of exaggerating the calculation. One million of human beings to be swept from the face of the earth! And for what purpose?—to gratify what interest?—to comply with what necessity? There was no pretence of necessity; and the interests which had in all former instances been associated with the continuance and extension of the slave trade, in this instance were entirely the other way; he meant the interests of the established West India planters.

He had before said, that if he failed in his appeal to the consistency of the West Indians, who brought forward the address of 1797, he could successfully appeal to their interests. But he would not suppose that he had failed: he believed, he might say he knew them to be ready to redeem their pledge, to stand the test of that day's vote. He would, therefore, direct his argument respecting their interests, not to them, but to those gentlemen unconnected with the West Indies themselves, who had yet always made West Indian interests the plea and pretence for their votes in favour of the slave trade. This day afforded a test of their sincerity also. Was it indeed true, that they had always hitherto been compelled to give a reluctant consent to the continuance of the slave trade, only because they felt themselves bound in justice to take care that the vested interests of the colonists should receive no injury by a hasty abolition? Did they endure an evil they abhorred, only because its continuance was indispensably necessary for the protection of an interest which they regarded? What then would be their plea now? now that the interests of the established West Indian was to be prejudiced by the very same act that created an enormous extension of the evil? now that the only effect of increasing the slave trade by the cultivation of Trinidad would be, to raise up rival establishments to meet the old colonists in the market?—But, perhaps, such a rivalry was rendered peculiarly desirable by some change which had taken place in the state of the markets at home and abroad, by some dearth of West India produce, which must be remedied, by some sudden inflammation of West Indian prices which must be reduced by the necessity of raising a revenue from sugar beyond what it at present afforded! These would indeed be poor justifications for the abandonment of principles so broadly stated, and for the forfeiture of pledges so solemnly recorded. But what was the fact? Precisely the reverse in every particular. The quantity of West Indian produce in the home market far beyond the demand; the markets of Europe shut against us; the prices, in consequence, so low as to be almost ruinous to the planter; and the duties so far from being likely to flow into the exchequer in greater amount, that they were now obliged to be bonded. He did not mean to say that all this might not change and right itself in time; that the markets of Europe might not re-open, the glut find vent, and the prices rise; but he applied his argument to the now state of things, to the existing interests of the present race of West Indians, of those whose immediate interests had always been found powerful enough with the House to defeat all measures for the diminution of the slave trade; and he must ask, when those same interests were found in opposition to the increase of that evil, by what arguments they were to be prevented from having the same effect? Would you increase the slave trade, would you prejudice the West Indian interest, in order to feed a market already glutted, to lower prices already ruinous to the seller, and to swell a revenue which you are already obliged to bond? In truth, said Mr. Canning, there is now no pretence of interest, none of necessity, in favour of an increased cultivation of West Indian produce, at the price of an increased slave trade. If we consent to the increase of the slave trade for such a purpose at this moment, we do an act not only of voluntary wickedness, but of individual injustice.

It may be asked of those who have, at different times, rejected the plea of West Indian interest when urged in favour of the slave trade, how it happens that they now become the advocates of those interests? For this plain reason, that our hostility was always directed against the slave trade, not against the interests connected, or supposed to be connected, with it. And very happy I am, for one, that an opportunity has occurred of putting our sincerity, in this respect, to the test. For myself I can truly say, that if the greatest possible degree of affection and esteem for individuals be a tie of respect and regard for the body to which those individuals belong, there is no body of men to whom I am less likely to feel any thing like personal hostility than the body of West India proprietors, as there is none which contains individuals whom I love and value more highly. But when their supposed (or, as I should say, mistaken) interests came in competition with a great moral and political good, I did not give them the preference. True. But when I find them on the same side, shall it not be an additional incitement to me to endeavour to work that good which now involves, not opposes, the interests of that body of men?—Let us now apply the same test to those moderate men who have hitherto supported the West Indian interest and the slave trade together. As long as they went together, all was well. The slave trade was to be tolerated, because its ally, the West Indian interest, was to be supported. But the alliance is now dissolved: the West Indian interest points one way, the slave trade another. Which will you follow? No disguise; no equivocation now. It is not slave trade and, but slave trade or, the old West Indian interest that you must support:—slave trade in all its naked charms, without the cloak of a pretended West Indian interest to hide them. If, in this choice, you take that road which leads to the enormous increase of the evil which you pretended to deplore, and abandon the interests for whose sake alone you pretended, while you deplored, to endure it, what shall be said? What can be believed, but that your affected tenderness for the colonists was all mere hypocrisy; and that at all times, in all periods of the discussion, while regard for colonial interests was on your lips, the secret devotions of your heart were paid to the slave trade? Or will it be avowed, that at the time when these professions were made, we were, indeed, sincere in intending to act up to them, but that we did not then foresee the temptation to which we should be exposed; that we were prepared for common exertions of forbearance; we could have suffered a corner of an old island to lie waste, without thinking too much of the sacrifice to consistency; but that the present temptation is beyond our strength; the fine black mould and watered savannahs of Trinidad hold out incitements which flesh and blood cannot resist, and almost justify a breach of our bond, of which flesh and blood, God knows to what amount, must pay the penalty? Sir, I consider the acquisition of Trinidad in a different light. It seems to me as if Providence had determined to put to the trial our boasts of speculative benevolence and intended humanity, by putting into our power a colony where, if we pursue our old course, it must be purely for its own sake, without the old inducements or the usual apologies. This day is a day of tests: I trust we shall all abide the trial.

He now came to consider the second division of the subject. In a wider view, and considered as in relation to the general security and stability of our colonial system, and to the national policy of the country, how far would it be prudent to convert Trinidad at once into a sugar colony, to be cultivated by the same means with the others, subject to the same dangers, and partaking of the same weakness and insecurity? Was it possible to look at the present state of the colonial world without feeling considerable awe and apprehension? The struggle now subsisting in St. Domingo, whichever way it might terminate, could not but be productive of great evil and danger to our colonies; in the one event a great moral danger, if the negroes should not be thoroughly subdued; in the other case, of complete success to the French arms, a great military danger. In either of these events, what was the use to which it would be most desirable to have turned our new acquisition? Would the moral danger be best guarded against by having established a new negro colony, by immense importations from Africa? Would the military safety of Trinidad be best ascertained by a population from which, in the time of attack, you would have as much to dread as from the enemy; a population which, while you defended it with one hand, you must keep down with the other? He would not dwell upon these topics, because he was aware that they were too delicate to be agitated much at large in public discussion. But enough surely appeared to any reasoning mind, on the first glance at the present situation and prospects of the West Indies, to prove beyond doubt, that strength, not sugar,—that to fence and support, not to extend, with proportionate extension of weakness, our possessions in that quarter of the globe, was the obvious dictate of policy, was equally necessary for the preservation of the colonies, whether to themselves or to the mother country. In Trinidad, therefore, above all things, we ought to look for strength and solidity; we ought to make it, in the first instance, a strong military post, a naval station, a place of recruit and refreshment for our fleets and armies. It ought to be used not as a new venture upon a speculation already hazardous and overloaded, but to protect and ensure those which we have already at stake. Wealth, to be sure, was strength to a certain degree, inasmuch as it furnished the means of exertion; but to protect the existing sources of the wealth which we now enjoy was the first object, to widen the channel in which it was to flow might be a proper and desirable object hereafter. Strength once established, wealth would naturally follow; but if, with a blind and mistaken cupidity, we hurried on to increase the produce of our colonies, without previously adding to their security, the result might very probably be, to lose even that of which we are already in possession.

If, in looking to the state of the colonies a few years ago, and foreseeing the dangers to which they are now exposed, one had been to form a wish for that which should be most essential to their preservation, he knew not what more he could have desired than that which now the chance of war had thrown into their hands; an island, such as Trinidad, fertile in its soil, with opportunity of naval station, and so situated in respect to the other colonies, as to afford, under most circumstances, the means of quick succour and assistance; and, above all, not so far gone in the old slave trade system, but that a new mode of colonization might be tried there with fair probability of success. Had he formed such a wish, and had any person less confident in the wisdom of parliament than he was, remarked to him at the time, "You shall have what you desire; an island precisely such as you describe shall fall into your hands; but, mark my words, no sooner will you be in possession of it, than all your fine schemes of wholesome colonization will be abandoned; you will turn to your commercial dictionary, and there finding, under the head West India island, the word sugar, and under sugar the word slave, you will look no farther; sugar cultivation and slave trade will comprise the whole of your boasted policy, and Trinidad will be cleared and cultivated by labour from Africa, like all your other settlements, and brought, as quickly as possible, to the same state of wealth and of weakness that belongs to them." Had any man ventured to predict that such would be the only use to which an acquisition like Trinidad would be converted, he should have resented the insinuation as utterly unfounded. He should have abjured for parliament, and for the government of the country, so poor and vulgar a notion of policy as that of, under all the changes of moral and political circumstances, pursuing exactly the same system of colonial establishment, without reference to what might be required for new security under increased danger. "Government," he should have said, "will not be blind to the new circumstances of the colonies and of the world. They will see that internal strength is that which is wanting to their colonial system. They will endeavour to procure it by laying the basis, in their new colony, of a natural population, which is alone the great cure for all the evils that are suffered, and all that are apprehended in that quarter of the world." This was what he should have ventured to undertake for on the part of any government of this country; and this was what he now called upon the House of Commons to do their part towards performing, by interposing to prevent an immediate alienation of the lands of Trinidad.

If he were to be asked by what means he thought a natural population could be procured, he would answer, first, by not introducing an artificial one; by not pouring the population of Africa into the forests and morasses of Trinidad, to perish yearly, and yearly to be supplied by fresh importations. This system once adopted, it was hopeless to look for any other. Keep clear of this, and it was possible that the foundation of another system might be laid. The second means were also negative. Do not make large grants or sales to great capitalists. Look for your settlers among classes of men who will be induced to become residents in the island. Such might be to be found among the meritorious soldiers of regiments on West India service, among foreign corps, among free blacks and creoles in the other islands; to all of whom encouragement should be held out by grants of land, such as would enable them to subsist themselves and their families in a state of moderate independence. If it were objected that European labour was altogether incompetent to the climate; he answered, for the cultivation of the great staple commodities of West Indian produce, certainly; but not for raising vegetables; not for breeding cattle; modes of agriculture which might make Trinidad the source of health and comfort to the soldiers and sailors of Great Britain employed in the defence of the West Indies, and, in some measure, to the colonies themselves.

But neither were these all the materials for settling the island. There were, if he was not much misinformed, other materials peculiar to Trinidad. There was a race of labourers in the habit of resorting annually to that island from the neighbouring continent, to work for hire in the most arduous and fatiguing branches of colonial husbandry. They were called Peons; stout, active, inured to the climate, and capable (as was supposed) of being induced, by proper encouragement, to come over in still more considerable numbers; and, no doubt, if proper means of subsistence were afforded them, to settle themselves and their families in Trinidad. From this race might be created a hardy native militia, fitted, to a degree that European constitutions perhaps hardly ever attain, to endure the fatigue and difficulties of West Indian warfare. The right hon. gentlemen below him (the ministers) had better means than he could be supposed to have, of knowing how far the description which he had been giving of these persons was correct; but he had no doubt of it, and if true, there was a basis for creole colonization, which he should be extremely sorry not to have tried to the fullest extent. The advantages to be derived from it, under certain possible circumstances in the political state of South America, were incalculable; but such as in this place it would not be proper to dwell upon in detail.—There was, besides, another race peculiar (he believed) at this moment to Trinidad, native Indians, to the number (according to the papers upon the table) of about one thousand; a people whom, if it were from no better motive than curiosity, he should be sorry not to have carefully preserved, reliquiæ et danaûm, the remnant of nations among whom the sword, and the spit, and the rack, and the mine, had made such horrible ravages. These whom, by some unaccountable oversight, the Spaniards had neglected to exterminate, might, and would no doubt keep an increasing native population. One thousand, to be sure, was not a great number; but it was not contemptible, as a source of colonial inhabitancy: it was as large as the number of whites on some of the smaller islands, it was one-seventh part of the whole population of Trinidad (exclusive of negro slaves) when the island came into our possession, and it bore a proportion of almost one-seventieth part to the whole European population of all our islands put together.

Add to this, that the numbers of the sexes were pretty equal (the females rather the more numerous), and there was little reason to apprehend that this race might not be kept up and extended to a very considerable degree.

Now, Sir (said Mr. Canning), I do not say here is your colony established: but I do say, here are means and chances for the establishment of a guiltless, bloodless colony, which it would be highly perverse and criminal to throw away untried, from a blind preference to the old method of annual importation from Africa, with such accumulation of misery, and such risk of mischief as must attend them. Let me not be answered that all experience is against me; that there is no instance of a West India island having been cultivated except by negro slaves. I will not too hastily believe that there is any region in the earth on which Providence has laid that heavy interdiction, that it shall not suffice to produce its own inhabitancy, that it cannot be fertilized except by the blood of victims from another quarter of the globe. I deny the fact, that experience is against me. Has the experiment of a native population ever yet been tried, and failed? Never. Try it now—try it before you make its impracticability a plea for establishing a system of guilt and rapine, which, even if every other resource should fail, is detestable; and if it has not that excuse, if it is not tried in the last resort, is as wanton as it is shocking to humanity. That in this way you will not get as large a produce of sugar to swell the Custom-house entries of the next few years, I grant you. But are you to raise a sum of money, or to found a colony? Would you lay a foundation for the returns of a twelve-month, or for the greatness of an age? I hope, the latter. Nor, however, will Trinidad yield nothing in the mean time. Many of the means which I have pointed out are applicable to raising colonial produce in its common acceptation. But Trinidad has yet other facilities which make it sufficiently valuable, even if not a hogshead of sugar should be produced, nor the hand of a negro employed upon it. Look at its situation in respect to the Spanish Main. Is it possible that the court of Spain, in making such a cession to us, should not have considered well the policy of its present restrictions on colonial commerce, and of the encouragement to clandestine trade which arises out of them? Is it improbable that the result of such a consideration, aided by the suggestions of the government of this country, should be, to produce a freer intercourse and a more liberal system of commercial regulations; and in such case what advantages might we not expect from Trinidad becoming the emporium of British and South American commerce? There are yet other advantages which do not depend on foreign co-operation. It has been matter of constant dispute between the colonists and those who have in this country contended for limitations on the slave trade, whether or not such improvements might be made in the colonial agriculture, as would diminish the necessity for importations of labourers from Africa. The colonists have said, with some justice, that they would be willing and desirous that the fact should be ascertained; but that they cannot afford to hazard a year's returns in trying experiments. Here then is the opportunity of trying them at the expense, not of individuals, but of the public. Who knows what skill and machinery might do to lessen negro labour? The first consequences to the other colonies would be gradual improvement, by the silent operation of example, without the shock of innovation, or the risk of loss; the further and more enlarged consequences would be, a gradual abolition of the slave trade produced without any other interference, by a gradual diminution of the demand for slaves; a diminution, in a still greater degree, of the great and dangerous disproportion of blacks and whites at present in the islands; a saving of British capital, and an economy of human life. These are not slight advantages, nor would Trinidad be ill employed, if turned to this account only. But this I do not ask you now to decide. I ask you to pause, to allow yourselves time for deliberation. I ask you only not to decide that you will try nothing but slave trade. If in the end you must come to that, if you are determined to do so, should every thing else fail, Africa is always at hand: you can never be too late in your resort to the market for her miserable inhabitants. But you are not justified in resorting to it till you have tried, I do not say all the means I have suggested, but all that wiser and abler men, thinking deeply, and devoting themselves to the subject, can devise; and if tried heartily, depend upon it such means will not fail.

Mr. Canning concluded with saying, that he had now only to add, by way of explanation of a single paragraph in the address which he was about to move, that he had been desirous of providing against the only practical objection to which he could conceive his motion to be liable, by excepting from the general prohibition of grants or sales of new lands in Trinidad, such grants as government might wish to be able to make to those inhabitants of the colonies, restored by the late treaty to the French and Batavian republics, who were desirous of remaining under British protection. To them he would leave it open for government to make grants; but to them under condition of not cultivating those grants by negroes imported from Africa. He went on the presumption that they would be allowed, under the stipulations of the treaty, to bring their negroes with them from their present establishments to Trinidad. He would only further observe, that the restriction which the address went to propose, was only to keep the subject open until parliament should have had an opportunity of considering it fully, and to ensure that the government should lay it fully before them. He then moved, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, humbly to represent to his majesty, that, in consideration of the great importance of preventing the dangers and mischiefs which must arise from the excessive increase of the importation of negroes from Africa, if such importation should be permitted, without restriction into the island of Trinidad; and for the purpose of avoiding any color or pretext, by reason of new grants, to obstruct hereafter any regulations which, to the wisdom of parliament, may, after due investigation and deliberation, seem expedient; his majesty's faithful Commons humbly request his majesty, that he will not authorise any grants or sales of new lands in the island of Trinidad, without express condition (under penalty of forfeiting and making void such grants or sales), that no negro to be thenceforth imported from Africa shall be employed on the said lands, until opportunity shall have been afforded to parliament to make such provision as the circumstances of the case may be found to require, for the prohibition, limitation, or regulation, of the importation of negroes from Africa into the said island:—That his majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there shall be laid before this House, in the next session of parliament, an account of any such conditional grants and sales, as may have been made in the interval; and of the means which have been employed or provided, for enforcing the due observation and performance of the said condition;—And that his majesty will be graciously pleased further to direct, that there shall be laid before this House, so soon as the same can be prepared, such plan of regulations as to his majesty's government may appear most adviseable for promoting the cultivation or improvement of the island of Trinidad; in the manner the least likely to interfere with the wish expressed by this House for the gradual diminution, and ultimate termination, of the African slave trade, and the most conducive to the stability and security of the interests of the colonies, and of the West Indian commerce of this kingdom."

Mr. Sturges seconded the motion.

Mr. Chancellor Addington observed, that before he commented on the speech of the right hon. gentleman in particular parts, he could not forbear saying, that the motion now before the House was not strictly conformable to the expectation which had been formed from his notice; the motion although divested of some parts which he expected to find in it, was one that he could at this time assent to. If he was bound to decide for or against the motion, he should negative it, on grounds perfectly satisfactory to his own mind, and which he trusted would be satisfactory to the House, after he had explained them: as he was not bound to take that course, he should not take it, but he should adopt another more congenial to his feelings. The right hon. gentleman had observed that there was a rumour prevalent (but which, Mr. Addington said had never reached him), that there was an intention to make grants of land, or sales of land, belonging to the crown in the island of Trinidad; and he had expressed an apprehension that the cupidity of monied men would lead them to take advantage of it; and he said that the notice he had given at an early period was connected with this view of the subject. Upon that subject, he said, the uncleared land in Trinidad was not within his contemplation when he alluded to the advantages which [this country might derive from grants hereafter to be made. What he had said by way of notice upon that subject, related chiefly to the island of St. Vincent; upon that topic he had only stated, generally, that some means might thence be found to alleviate the pressure arising from the present charges on this country, by applying the proceeds of the sale of lands in St. Vincent's, and other islands in which there was much uncleared lands by certain grants hereafter to be made, under such regulations as, upon a view of the circumstances, might be deemed expedient: but the island of Trinidad was not then in his contemplation. He had long felt a thorough conviction, that it was a wise policy to increase, as much as possible, the White and the Creole population. With respect to the motion, he was sure he spoke the sentiments of several gentlemen in the House, when he expressed a regret that it should be made at this time. He knew there were some who thought that the subject as far as it related to Trinidad, might be taken as an insulated point; but that was not the way in which he viewed the subject; he thought it difficult to make a distinction between this particular part, and that of the general policy of the trade carried on by means of negroes in the West Indies, and therefore did not see how this question could be fairly discussed without entering upon the general question at large. And here he should observe, in passing, that it was a matter of some surprise to him, that a proposition of this sort should be brought forward so recently after the island had come into the hands of his majesty, although the general question upon the trade to which the proposition referred had been allowed to sleep for five or six years. The proposition now before the House, brought with it no recommendation, either to those who thought that the African trade ought to be immediately, or to those who thought it should be gradually abolished; for it was not essentially favourable to either under the present state of things in the West Indies. The House had declared that the slave trade should be abolished by gradual means; and if this proposition ranked under that general principle, he should not oppose it; that was a proceeding to which he was a party, and he adhered to the principle of that measure; it was one to which the faith of parliament was pledged; but this measure had no tendency towards the accomplishment of that object. He did not consider the faith of parliament to be pledged as to the time when the slave trade should be abolished; it was true, that parliament had stated a time when this would take place; but it was to take place by certain means, in which means the views of parliament were interrupted. It was to be accomplished by certain regulations of the trade itself, by introducing a new system into the West Indies: and then, upon the supposition that such system would be adopted, parliament had voted that the slave trade from the coast should be abolished in 1797; but as the system by which that abolition was to be accomplished was not introduced, the effect was not produced; and therefore, in reality, parliament had not forfeited its pledge to the public. He did not see that the present motion had a tendency to further this object; for it did not follow that the slave trade would be abolished, or even lessened, by confining a vote to the island of Trinidad. An attempt to prevent negroes from being imported from the coast of Africa into Trinidad, would be only to insure the carrying on of the trade in other quarters. What he meant was this: that there would be a considerably increased demand for the produce of the West Indies. The productive powers of St. Domingo had long been in abeyance. The demand of the continent would now be more than the present powers of supply of the West Indies could furnish. That must of necessity produce fresh cultivation. During the last eight or nine years, every thing in the way of trade, in this respect, was carried on by British capital and British enterprise, almost exclusively; and the effect of this on our commerce, and also on our maritime strength, was highly favourable to us. British capital and British enterprise were so great, that they would extend to all the islands belonging to foreign governments, as well as to our own. It was said by the right hon. gentleman that the markets were glutted with sugars, &c. But it was to be considered, that France and Holland had long been waiting in hopes of receiving supplies from their own islands. They would want more than they could have from that source. In that state of things, what was the condition of our merchants? They had been looking with impatience for an opportunity of carrying their supplies to the continent: there had not been a channel for our West Indian produce a great while by way of Hamburgh; but it did not follow that the demand for this produce would cease now: on the contrary, that demand would increase, and then our warehouses would find a vent; so that the glut apprehended would be done away. Then, he would ask the House, if it was true that, in the present state of the world, an increased supply of all markets with West India produce was to be produced only by British capital and enterprise, whether it would be wise to adopt this motion now or whether it was likely to contribute to the gradual abolition of the slave trade, to enter into this premature check upon the cultivation of Trinidad? With a view to the gradual abolition of the slave trade, the only view in which he could support it, this measure would actually do nothing. He objected to the application of any principle for the gradual abolition of the African slave trade, that did not apply itself to the whole of the West India islands. The right hon. gentleman wished that means should be adopted for the increase of the population of whites and creoles in the West Indies. Was it possible to accomplish this object by the present proposition? Would there not be great difficulties in making arrangements for those who had been fixed a great while at Trinidad, and those who might recently have arrived there? Besides, negroes might be brought to Trinidad from Barbadoes, St. Vincent, Montserrat, or other places; and it would be impossible to distinguish between them and those who might have been on the island previous to their importation. But there was another objection to the proposition; the effect of it would be to call for negroes from the different West India islands to Trinidad; because, without their assistance, it would be impossible to carry on the necessary trade there; and it would create a chasm in those islands, which could not be supplied but by means of fresh importations from Africa; therefore, the discouragement of importations to Trinidad alone would not answer the purpose in view; for, unless we could discourage importation into all the islands, it was useless to prohibit it in one. What security was there that the chasm which would be created by bringing negroes from other islands into Trinidad, would not be supplied by fresh importations into such islands. It might be asked, whether, according to the view which he entertained of this subject, he should wish to promote an importation of negroes into Trinidad? He hoped he had answered that question already; he could only say, that neither in Trinidad, nor any other island ought there to be an unlimited importation of negroes. He might be asked, what restrictions he had in view? to which he would answer, not such as were applicable to Trinidad alone, but that the true policy of this country extended to a consideration of all the islands. He entertained a hope, that the subject of the slave trade would be taken up in the course of the next session, and considered deliberately upon the principle of a gradual abolition of that traffic; but this he wished to be preceded by an inquiry instituted by that House. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that Trinidad, for the purpose of keeping it in a state of cultivation, would require an importation of 250,000 negroes. Now, according to the best information received by his majesty's government, such an importation would by no means be the effect of countenancing the principle against which the right hon. gentleman had spoken. With half the number of hands, the cultivated produce of that island was double that of any other; in Trinidad, the labour of forty negroes was more than equal to that of 100 in any other island, except Jamaica. The description which he had received of the peculiar advantages of the island of Trinidad had rendered the matter particularly interesting; so much so, that his majesty's government had determined, some time since to send out a commission for the purpose of making a minute survey. This task had devolved on men of great talents and enlightened minds; and whose opinion, after they had enriched their minds with the information which they now looked for would be extremely valuable. They were to make their report upon the subject, and by that report his majesty's government would be considerably guided. No grants had been made up to the period when the last accounts were laid before the House. Positive orders had been sent by government, that no new grants or sales of land in Trinidad should take place without further authority. He hoped that every public encouragement would be given to the population of the whites and creoles; and he could add, that it was the determination of ministers to advise his majesty not to make any grants of land, except for the purpose of providing the means to which he had alluded, until after the report of the commissioners. He could not be expected to pledge himself to lay before the House any plan upon this subject as arising out of the report of the commissioners; but he pledged himself, either to lay before the House his ideas upon the subject, or, what he should like much better, to concur with some other person in bringing the subject before the House. In the hope, that none of the evils which the right hon. gentleman apprehended would arise from a short delay he should conclude with moving the previous question.

Mr. Canning said:—If, Sir, the right hon. gentleman had contented himself with making only the latter half of his speech, I should cheerfully have consented to withdraw my motion; because, in the pledges and assurances of the intentions of himself and his colleagues, he has not only given me all that my motion asks, but more. I understand from him, not only that no grants or sales of land shall be made in Trinidad (except such as the address, which I had the honour to propose to you itself excepted), until parliament shall have had an opportunity of considering the subject, but that there is a fixed and serious determination on the part of the executive government, to revise and discuss fully, with the view to a final settlement, the whole of that great moral and political question, which has for twelve years been discussed in this House to so little purpose. With the hopes that are now held out to me of this attention being speedily given to the subject, and having the solemn word of the right hon. gentleman that the object of my motion shall be answered, I am not desirous of pressing it to a division. For the same reason I will not make any of those comments on the first part of the right hon. gentleman's speech, which I think it deserves. I will only observe, that if my motion has had the effect of producing the public declarations and pledges which we have just heard from the right hon. gentleman, I conceive it to have been highly beneficial. I cannot think it so ill-judged or ill-timed as he has endeavoured to represent it. And the right hon. gentleman must excuse me for saying, that it is in consequence of some insinuations and misrepresentations in that speech that I feel it necessary to persist in desiring that the address may be recorded on the Journals.

General Gascoyne contended, that it was necessary, for the support of our

West India colonies, that the slave trade should be increased instead of being abolished.

Mr. Wilberforce observed, that he was satisfied with the personal declaration of the chancellor of the exchequer, believing that he was sincere, and anxious to act up to his professions. Nevertheless, he could not be very sanguine when he considered what had formerly taken place in the House, or even remembered the conduct of the right hon. gentleman himself. The fairest prospects had been held out, and they had ended in nothing. The evil existed now in a greater degree than ever, and daily gained ground. He thought that some steps ought to be instantly taken to prevent the increased importation of negroes into the islands. The effect of threatening to abridge the traffic necessarily quickened it. The British importation of slaves had been much greater during the last three years, than at any former period. The insinuation thrown out, that he had seen with unconcern the immense trade in slaves to the conquered islands, was void of all foundation. He had bewailed the circumstance with the utmost bitterness. He was opinion that our government ought immediately to enter into a negotiation with foreign powers for the abolition of the slave trade. He should bring the subject before the House during the present session.

The previous question was then put and carried.

Debate in the Commons on the Clergy Residence Bill.] May 31. The order of the day being read for the House to go into the consideration of the report of the Clergy Residence bill, sir W. Scott moved the recommitment.

Mr. Simeon opposed the principle of the bill. Its grand scope and operation went, not merely to abrogate the salutary statute of Henry 8th, but, on the ruins of that act, to erect a new code of ecclesiastical law, of the most dangerous nature, inasmuch as it went to place an unconstitutional power in the hands of the bishops. The power proposed to be vested in the bishop of the diocese, of granting a dispensation from residence, had a tendency to place all the clergy under the control of the prelacy, and thereby virtually to render them the instruments of the crown. Whatever practical good could possibly result from the dispensation of residence was to be obtained by the existing canonical law, without any appeal to the bishop, which only rendered the inferior orders of the clergy dependent upon the diocesan. The difference in the value of money in the reign of Henry 8th and at the present period, might render an alteration of the penalties enacted for non-residence necessary; but surely this could not constitute a reason why the law itself should be abrogated. The difference in the value of money rather made in favour of the continuance of the bill, as the penalty, in its operation, was so much the lighter, in proportion as the value of money had decreased. The original aim of the statute was, to get rid of the corruption introduced by the lavish accumulation of pluralities granted by the pope. In those days, it was no uncommon thing for one clergyman to hold fifteen or sixteen different livings; nine livings were reckoned a mere trifle. The non-resident acts were therefore passed, as a corrective against the evil of pluralities. And in this view, in order that the evil might be more strenuously combated, the bishop himself was liable to be suspended from his function, if he did not strictly enforce residence in his diocese; the canon law, therefore, as it at present stood, was competent to every salutary purpose; and he saw no reason why it should be taken out of the hands of the law, and placed in those of the hierarchy. The House, if they agreed to the power of dispensation, would be legislating in the dark; and, by the passing of such an act, would give to the bishops a new and excessive political influence, which, in its operations, might materially endanger the government of the country. Great stress had been laid on the number of informations preferred against different clergymen within the last twelvemonth; and much declamation thrown away on the character and conduct of a certain person, who had recently started as a kind of reformer against the neglect and remissness of the clergy. He was ready to admit the fact; but what did it prove? — That the evil itself was prodigiously great and frequent, and that proportionably great and strong must be the remedy. Numerous as were the instances of informations lately laid by that person, he had not heard of a single one in which the penalty had been made the instrument of oppression: on the contrary, it was to be regarded merely as the enforcer of the existing law. If, then, penalties were found to be necessary, the House should not take a partial glance, but open its eyes to both sides of the question. One case, and but one, among all the instances which had occurred, carried with it the appearance of hardship, and that was the case of the rector of Bow church; but this he could not help considering, with all deference to the judgment of the eminent person who tried the cause, as a misapprehension of the law. He begged he might not be misconstrued, as putting his judgment against that of the noble lord who presided on that occasion; a more intelligent, upright, and enlightened mind never graced the bench. But still he was of opinion, that had the question been argued in the House of Lords, where it would have undergone more minute and laboured discussion, a different verdict would have been returned. The law provided penalties against wilful, but not unavoidable neglect of residence; and surely, where the parsonage-house was proved to be unfit for residence, the clergy could not be deemed, in law and equity, obnoxious to the penalties of non-residence. In Watson's Reports, it was expressly laid down, that in such case the clergyman would be indemnified from any penalty. He could never give his assent to a mingling of the sacerdotal and secular character. Nothing could tend more effectually to degrade the ministerial function. At the same time, he wished to be understood as not combating the limited right of farming, as far as was necessary to the support and comfort of the clergyman's household. But he saw no reason why any new law should pass on this head, as the existing laws made ample provision for the cultivation of the parsonage glebe, with the liberty of taking more land into cultivation, if the necessities of the clergyman's household required it. But, beyond this, he could not agree to the doctrine of a clergyman meddling with secular pursuits. By his ordination vow, he was expressly restricted from engaging in mundane occupations, in order that he might the more assiduously devote himself to the duties of his calling. What more could any man desire? Did they wish to see the clergy transformed into farmers; the parsonage-house into a magazine; and corn, turnips, and potatoes, retailed by the minister of the parish, instead of the pure and wholesome milk of the gospel? Was there a man in that House, who would wish to secularise the clergy to such an extent as

that? He wished the question, therefore, to stand on its true and proper basis, that of residence. As the House had proved itself jealous of its rights, and had recently come to a determination, that no clergyman could hold a seat in that House, and superintend the concerns and interests of the inferior orders of the clergy, he thought it incumbent upon them to be careful that they did not put the inferior clergy too much in the power of the bishops, and subject them to a degrading influence. It was one thing to have the liberty of doing a thing as a matter of right, and another to have the permission as a matter of courtesy. The existing laws of the country, were fully competent to the correction of abuses. Why could not the enforcement of those laws be left to a jury, without throwing additional influence into the hands of the bishops, by giving them the option of dispensation? With such a law as this before his eyes, no man would educate his son for the church. He wished to see the church firmly established upon the true basis of its original principles; and, therefore, he deplored the fate of those clergy who had to contend with all those sensations which enlightened minds must feel from their humiliated and impoverished state. His heart was rent whenever he reflected on the assertions of the learned civilian (sir W. Scott), that out of 11,000 benefices, no less than 5,000 produced not more than 50*l.* a-year. As often, then, as he adverted to this afflicting consideration, it was not the non-residence of the clergy that penetrated his mind, but the neglect that these deserving persons suffered, and the effect which that must have on society. In his opinion, government should apply 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* yearly in aid of queen Anne's bounty, to be divided among these deserving but neglected people. He was not sure of success in the opposition he had given to the bill; but he should be consoled with the reflection, that he had performed his conscientious duty to the utmost of his ability.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that the attention of the House was not so much called to compel the residence of the clergy, as to prevent them from being persecuted by informers. Numerous discussions had taken place, as to the best method of doing this; and the House at length agreed to suspend the existing law, until a system could be formed for effectually regulating those proceedings which had become a ground of complaint, and had been made an instrument of oppression. To effectuate this purpose, his right hon. friend had framed a bill. The measure had been called for by the House; and the question was, whether the House would not now entertain it? He apprehended, that, nothing short of a radical objection to the whole of the principle of the measure could be an adequate inducement for voting against the motion. He knew it to be matter of regret with his right hon. and learned friend who brought forward this measure, that he had not yet had an opportunity of bringing forward a measure for the improvement of the condition of the inferior clergy. As to any pecuniary grants that could be made to them, he believed there never was any thing applied by parliament more worthily than that would be. Taking the clergy as a body their conduct was such as called for the esteem of the country. This was a matter of great importance to the society in which we lived; and when this object was gained, we should then have gained a lasting security for our general happiness; but without that, he was convinced it would be impossible for our prosperity to be lasting. He felt this opinion so forcibly, that he would say, great as our wealth was at the present hour, great as our prosperity was as a nation, splendid as our military and naval glory had been, much as distinguished men had spread our fame, yet, unless we had a clergy possessed of competence, and superior to pecuniary wants and the inconveniences of indigence, the whole of our successes and triumphs would, in time, be trodden under foot, and it would be in vain for us to look for a long period of happiness. He approved of the bill as far as it went. He wished the provision, with regard to the clergy, extended farther than this bill professed to go. Future provisions might embrace considerations of increasing places of public worship, as well as increasing the salaries of some of the ministers of that worship. He hoped the House would go into the committee, and see what could be done with the bill.

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, he could not vote for going into the committee. He thought that some further provision should be made for the clergy. This, however, formed no part of the bill; and he could not consent to take from juries what had been in their hands for so long a period, and give the power which they exercised wholly to the bishops. The present measure was not an amendment of the statute of Henry 8th, but a complete repeal of it. He well knew that many of the bishops were pious and excellent men; but it was not merely to the present, but to future bishops, that this power was to be given; and to no set of them would he consent to give the power which was conferred upon them by the present bill. Why were not twelve jurymen as good judges whether an action ought to be maintained against a clergyman or not? Another ground of complaint against the statute of Henry 8th, was, that the penalty was not equal, it being the same upon clergymen possessing livings of 3,000*l.* and those of 100*l.* a year. To this a remedy might be applied; but if the bishop was to give a licence for non-residence, there was an end of the action. If these objects were to be remedied, why not bring in a bill to amend that act? He would admit that ordination, and various other ecclesiastical functions, ought to be placed under the control of the bishops; but did it follow, that the residence of the clergy should also be under their control? Who paid the clergy? The laity. If the bishop was to have the control over residence, it amounted to this, that the bishop was to decide whether a parish which paid 500*l.* a-year to a minister was to have one or not. He believed the bill was very unpopular amongst the clergy; they would rather the statute of Henry 8th should be amended, than be compelled to go to a bishop for a licence for non-residence.

The Master of the Rolls said, that no law could be so badly executed as that which was in the hands of common informers. The object was to take from them that discretion which they had abused, and to place it in the hands of those to whom it properly belonged, the venerable prelates. It was said, that the statutes had existed for two centuries and a half. He was as little disposed as any man to place untried theory, in competition with laws and customs of which they had experienced the benefit; but although the statute of Henry 8th had existed so long, they had not had above ten years experience of its effects; and when enforced it had only been so through the will and pleasure of a common informer. He could have no objection to substitute something instead of it; but was it not worth while, after witnessing its consequences, to try whether they could not go on without it? Even supposing that suing for penalties in a court of law, to enforce residence was an efficacious mode, yet it certainly was degrading. The object of the bill was to try whether the discipline of the church could be carried on by means of the constitution of the church. If it failed, they had it in their power to go back to the statute of Henry 8th.

The Attorney General wished the bill to go into a committee, that the clauses might be altered. If it came out of the committee in the same form as it went into it, he certainly should oppose it. It had been said, that many cases of great hardship had arisen in consequence of the power given to the common informer by the statute of Henry 8th, but he believed there was more clamour made upon this subject than the occasion warranted. It had been said, that the act of Henry 8th, even if enforced, would only compel the clergyman to reside upon his living; that it would not compel him to a faithful performance of the duties of his function; but this was only saying that the act did not do that which it never professed to do. The act professed to enforce residence, and no more. But gentlemen argued as if the act of Henry 8th took away the superintending power of the bishops over the residence and conduct of the clergy; it did no such thing. It would not be denied, that, the bishops had now by law the power of enforcing the residence of the clergy upon their livings; but it might be urged that the means by which the bishop could enforce residence were troublesome and expensive, and therefore could not be had recourse to. It was also to be observed, that the means of compelling residence under the act of Henry 8th was expensive to the common informer because there were no costs.

Mr. Windham said, that the object of this bill was partly to regulate the statute of Henry 8th by certain provisions. Now, he should have liked it better if it had tended to repeal that statute. Discretion was inseparable from all law. Now the discretion here was given to the bishops, and it was to operate on the inferior clergy: this was a discretion the least to be objected to, since it was in the nature of the discretion of a parent over his child. He therefore thought the discretion properly directed; and that the church should have the means of regulating its own concerns within itself. This had been the practice of ancient times, and was still the practice of other countries. He was a friend to the measure, because it tended to keep the discipline of the church within the church, and lodged discretion where it was right to lodge discretion. As to the point of enforcing the residence of the clergy, the question was, how far it was wise to do things by halves? It was admitted, that the statute of Henry 8th if enforced in full rigour, could only enforce the residence of the clergy; and therefore he would say, the provisions of that statute were worth but little; it reminded him of the power of the groom, who could lead the horse to the water, but could not make him drink when he came there. So here, by the statute of Henry 8th we would compel the clergy to come to their parishes, but could not compel them to perform the functions of their order: so that, by this statute, we had the disgrace of a restriction without any certainty of benefit.

The House then went into the committee, in which the bill underwent a variety of alterations.

June 9. Sir W. Scott, after lamenting the slow progress of his bill, said he had given it his best attention, and was anxious to learn the opinions of others. The bill was now much superior to the one formed according to his own crude conceptions. However, he should not press the bill farther this session in the hope that it would be revived at an early period of the next.

Debate in the Commons on the National Debt Reduction Bill.] April 14. The House having resolved itself into a committee on the acts relative to the Reduction of the National Debt,

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that he should at present do little more than move the four Resolutions which he held in his hand. He could not, however, forbear saying a few words respecting the principles on which they were founded. No man could feel more than he did the importance of the obligation we were under to preserve inviolate the system for the redemption of the national debt which was adopted in 1786. Of all the measures that were ever adopted by parliament, no one was more entitled to the admiration of the present age, or the gratitude of posterity. The leading features of the measure he had to submit was that of a consolidation of the public debt, and of the means to be adopted for the purpose of its reduction. It was impossible to look at the interest of the capital of our debt, without feeling a desire to discharge it, with the least possible pressure upon the public. It was impossible to look at the amount of the capital of that debt, without feeling the utmost anxiety, and an earnest desire to accelerate the period of its extinction. The amount of the taxes annually to be raised and permanent, was now about 30,000,000*l.* The capital of our debt 488,000,000*l.* The committee would recollect that two measures were adopted for the purpose of reducing our debt; the one in 1786, the other in 1792. The first was for the purpose of reducing the debt by the operation of a fund of one million at compound interest, to a given time, when the amount of it should be four millions. The other was for providing for the discharge of one per cent of every sum thereafter to be borrowed and added to the capital. By the first, it was provided, that at a given period, when the amount of the funds in the hands of the commissioners should be 4,000,000*l.* the interest of that 4,000,000*l.* should be at the disposal of parliament, and the plan of the former accumulation should cease. His proposition was, to prevent that pause in the operation taking place, and to go on with that fund, together with the interest to attach to it, with all the advantages and power of compound interest. With respect to the measure of 1792, the operation of that fund also for the discharge of one per cent of the whole sum borrowed since that period, he proposed to carry on with the other fund, for the purpose of the extinction of the whole debt. By the operation of these two funds, the probability was, that the whole debt would be paid off in 43 years and two months. That of itself would induce the committee to receive the plan with readiness, and examine it with alacrity. But this was not all: for the plan obviated the necessity which would otherwise arise, of providing 900,000*l.* taxes immediately, to provide for the operation of the one per cent fund of 1792, and also leave a sum little short of 1,500,000*l.* the difference of the interest when the 5 and the 4 per cents should be paid off, a measure which he believed likely to take place at no very remote period. He should now read his Resolutions. They were as follow :

1. " That it is the opinion of this committee, that the amount of the annual sums applicable, under the acts of the 26th and 32nd of his majesty, to the Reduction of the national debt, as the said sums stood on the 1st of February 1802, if consolidated into one sinking fund, with the additional sum of 200,000*l.* per annum, and continually applied at compound interest, but without the addition of any sums arising from annuities which may expire, or from savings of interest on annuities which may be reduced, would redeem the whole of the existing capital of the national debt, including the capital to arise from the loan of the present year, within forty-five years from the present time, and in a shorter period than the whole of the said capital would be redeemed by the separate application of the said annual sums respectively, together with the additional sum of 200,000*l.* per annum, as well as of one per cent on the capital to be provided for in the present year, and of any other sums which would, by virtue of the said acts, become applicable to the discharge of such capital.

2. " That the additional sum of 200,000*l.* per annum be granted to his majesty, from and after the 5th of January 1803, to be vested in the commissioners appointed under the said act of the 26th of his majesty.

3. " That it is expedient to provide that the amount of the annual sums applicable under the acts of the 26th and 32nd of his majesty, to the reduction of the national debt, as the said sums stood on the first of February 1802, should be consolidated into one sinking fund, with the additional sum of 200,000*l.* per annum, and be continually applied at compound interest to the redemption of the whole of the existing capital of the national debt, including the capital to arise from the loan of the present year.

4. " That any sum which may arise from annuities which may expire, or from savings of interest on annuities which may be reduced, shall be applicable to the public service, in such manner as parliament shall direct."

May 17. The House having again resolved itself into a committee on the acts relating to the Reduction of the National Debt, the first Resolution was read,

Mr. Boyd said, that, by the mode now proposed, an advantage would be gained over the old sinking fund of 115,000,000*l.*

Mr. Pitt said, that upon the best consideration he could give the subject, he was inclined to think it would be nearer 150,000,000*l.*

Mr. Tierney said, it appeared to him, that if the country were soon placed in a state of war, difficulties would arise; but that if we continued in a state of peace for forty-five years, the plan proposed would be productive of much greater advantages than the former plan. He wished that calculations might be made with different views of the subject, in order that they might be sure they were accurate.

Mr. Chancellor Addington contended, that though the plan would not be productive of immediate advantages, yet that the effect would be within a given time to promote the liquidation, and ultimately to produce the extinction of the national debt.

Mr. Pitt said, that the effect of the plan would be to improve and invigorate the sinking fund, and enable the country more effectually to support any struggle in which she might hereafter be engaged. The annual saving of 900,000*l.* must form a powerful resource against the exigencies of any future war. There certainly would be a period in which the debt would be less rapidly discharged, than by the old method; the progress in the beginning would be slow. The question then was, the time when the quantity of stock to be bought up, according to the present plan, would be greater than by the old sinking fund? From the best calculation he was able to make, that effect would begin to operate in about fourteen or fifteen years: 15 or 16 millions would then be in the hands of the commissioners, and be applicable to the public service in case of a new war.

The several Resolutions were agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in thereupon.

June 3. The House having resolved itself into a committee on the bill,

Mr. Bankes, after bestowing the highest praise on the establishment of the sinking fund, which he considered the greatest among all the proofs of high talents which Mr. Pitt had given, begged to make a few observations on the present plan, and particularly on the calculations of the comparative effect of the old and the new system. Some confusion had arisen with respect to the term "consolidation." The consolidation was, in fact, a thing of no advantage in itself, unless advantage was annexed to it by applying the sinking funds in a different way. The advantage of the present measure consisted in one thing only, and that was, the saving of one per cent which should have been raised on the loan for the present year, and on the capital borrowed on the income tax. Possibly hereafter this might be considered as a great disadvantage, as by it the public was placed more remote from the period when relief was to be afforded by the old system. All the advantages proposed by the new system, might, in fact, be coupled with the old, by which we should be manifestly in a better situation for a considerable time. In that case, there would have been an additional sum of near 900,000*l.* to operate in conjunction with the former sinking funds, till the old sinking fund of 1786 should have attained its maximum in 1808. The saving of the one per cent on the loan of the present year operated as a bonus on the measure; but he had great doubts whether it did not take from the general advantage of the reduction of the public debt. By taking all the stock at par, no advantage could be had under the consolidation for 38 years; and taking the 3 per cents and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cents at par, and the 4 per cents at 75, no advantage could be expected within 28 years. The old sinking fund would attain its maximum in 1808, and the new sinking funds, under the act of 1793, would reach an equality with it in 1825. There was no doubt that after reaching the equality the advantages would rapidly increase; but till then the public would suffer materially, as well by the privation of the benefits to be derived from the supply, after the sinking funds should have obtained their maximum, as by the interruption of the debt, and the suspicion which monied men might conceive of a departure from the established system of redemption; a suspicion which would render the measure destructive of public credit. The calculations on which the present measure was founded supposed, that taking the 3 per cents at 85, the new and the old debt would be redeemed in 43 years. By the letter of the acts, the debts would be redeemed in 45 years, and there was reason to suspect that these calculations so much relied on had over-rated it in taking the 3 per cents at 85; for in the circumstances of Europe there was little reason to hope that stocks would hold their present price for so many years. In six years the system established by Mr. Pitt would afford a sum applicable to the public service of the country, or to the reduction of taxes; a reflection of the most consolatory nature. If the advantages of the present system were coupled with the former, without any drawback, then indeed the measure would be beneficial; and a power and force would be given to the machine which would render its operation rapid and irresistible. Having thought the institution of the sinking fund of 1786 highly advantageous, and that of 1793 equally so; having thought that there was nothing on which the high character and fair fame of Mr. Pitt rested with so much stability, he could not consent to a deviation from them for a momentary advantage, which was to be attended with long and great privations. Conceiving all the advantage that would be derived from the measure to be nothing more than the saving of one per cent on the capital of the loan of the year, the saving by the reduction of interest, and the conversion of higher stock into stock bearing a lower interest, he could not persuade himself that the privations which it brought on the public would be compensated by the benefits which would result from it.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that his hon. friend had observed that the whole of the advantage of the present measure arose from the relief which it would afford to the public, by saving the imposition of taxes in the present year, to the amount of 900,000*l.* He did not think his hon. friend had examined the plan with his usual accuracy. What was the effect of the plan, as appeared from the papers laid before the House? That in a year when taxes to a larger amount than were ever before imposed in any one session there was a disposition on the part of the executive government to recommend a measure, the effect of which was, to avoid an immediate burthen upon the people to the amount of near 900,000*l.* and yet, at the same time, very much to accelerate the reduction of the national debt; and to leave parliament at liberty, in the year 1808, to apply 512,000*l.* the amount of the short annuities that would then fall in. It was also stated, that an additional consequence of that plan would be to leave at the disposal of parliament, in the event of paying off the 5 per cents, 1,500,000*l.* for the reduction of the public debt, or to relieve the people from taxes to that amount. Upon this point particular stress had been laid; and if at this period it should be the disposition of parliament to relieve the people from the burthen of taxes, they might apply the 512,000*l.* short annuities, and the 1,500,000*l.*; there would then be a relief to the people of 3,000,000*l.* and the relief of 900,000*l.* was, besides, immediate. It was not for him to presume how parliament would act in the year 1808; but such would be the state of things when the five and four per cents were paid off. Such were the recommendations of the measure, but was that the whole? His hon. friend had said, that the term "consolidation" was a term of deception in this case, which was certainly not so. The difference between the present plan and that of the sinking fund established in 1786 was this, that, in 1808, when a discretion was to be afforded to parliament of disposing of what was in the hands of the commissioners for the relief of the people in taking off taxes, it was proposed, instead of arresting the progress of this fund, that it should go on until, by the productive powers of compound interest, in conjunction with the other fund, it had worked the discharge of the whole debt; instead of resting at 1808, it was to continue its operation until the whole debt was discharged. What was the system of 1792? By that measure it was provided, that one per cent should be raised on every loan that should thereafter be made, in proportion to the sum borrowed, and which was to operate till the debt which it was calculated to redeem should be discharged, and the surplus to be at the disposal of parliament. The alteration now proposed was, that instead of this being at the disposal of parliament, it should be added to the sinking fund, and that both should go on until the whole debt was redeemed. It appeared under the old plan, supposing the 3 per cents at par, and the 4 and 5 paid off, that the old debt would be extinguished in forty-four years and four months from February last. Supposing the 3 per cents at 75, the whole debt would be paid off in 32 years and 10 months: that under the operation of the system of 1792, the debts incurred since that time would be discharged, supposing the 3 per cents at par, in 45 years and 7 months. Supposing the 3 per cents at 75, the whole of the new debt would be discharged in 35 years and three months. By the consolidated system now proposed, the whole of that debt would be extinguished in 31 years, that was to say, in four years less time than by the plan of 1792, and in three years less than the operation of the plan of 1786 would effectuate its purpose. Supposing the 3 per cents at 75, the effect of this consolidated plan would be, to extinguish the whole of the existing debt in 33 years and seven months; that was to say, the debt existing previous to the plan of 1786. The period allowed by the act of 1792 for extinguishing the debt since, was 45 years; and, if gentlemen would look at the papers, they would find that the effect of the consolidated plan would be, supposing the 3 per cents at par, not only to extinguish near 498 millions, but also to provide for the extinction of near 40 millions more; and, supposing the 3 per cents at 75, the effect of the consolidated plan would be, not only to pay off the whole of the present debt, but also to afford the means of paying off 44 millions. Now he would ask the committee, whether a measure, the effect of which was to afford immediate relief to the amount of 900,000*l.*, and to afford relief, if parliament should choose to avail itself of the opportunity in 1808, of bringing 512,000*l.*, and the 1,500,000*l.* in the manner he had already stated, to the relief of the public in taxes, without retarding the progress of the system of 1786 or 1792? Was this a departure from the system of 1786 or 1792? [Here Mr. Addington proceeded through the calculations in the printed papers.] This plan would extinguish the national debt in a much shorter period than the former plan, and afforded relief for the payment of 900,000*l.* taxes. It afforded means also for supporting the finances of the country, in the event of its being engaged in war.

Mr. Tierney observed, that, whatever hostility might exist between him and the author of the sinking fund, he had always admired the wisdom of that plan, as well as the ability with which it had been carried into execution. The right hon. gentleman should however take care that he did not destroy all that had as yet been beneficial in the operation of the sinking fund. He had considered all the advantages which he stated would be obtained by his plan, as fair gain arising from this change. This was an error; for the gain was in reality very little. If the stocks were taken at par, all that would be gained by the measure was 1,090,000*l*. If taken at 75, it would be only 790,000*l*. He did not wish to see a measure of this kind adopted by a sort of side wind. An enquiry ought to be instituted, to see whether this departure from a plan which had been generally approved was necessary. In his opinion, nothing could excuse it but the pressure of circumstances. With regard to the calculations, he believed they were drawn up with great accuracy; but it was not in the nature of things that they could be relied upon. Calculations of this kind might indeed be depended upon for four or five years; but what security was there that public events would permit the operation of the measure to go on progressively? It was not just to postpone paying any part of the public debt which had been contracted under the guarantee of the acts which created the sinking fund. In another war the sinking fund would be worth nothing. Monied men, finding they had once been deceived, would not be so ready to contract for loans again. No future scheme, therefore, could be expected to have so great an effect as that which was about to be abandoned. It might, perhaps, be allowable to take from the public creditors, whose claims existed previous to 1786, the advantages which they would derive from the application of the sinking fund; but it was unjust to take that advantage from those who had advanced their money on the faith of that plan.

Mr. Thornton said, that to depart from the ancient system, for the purpose of adopting the present measure, was in no degree a violation of public faith. His objection to the measure was rather of a political than of a financial nature. It seemed to him that we were only postponing our difficulties. He would rather see rapid advances made in the course of a few years hence, than a pledge given for futurity.

Mr. Boyd said, that a great part of what Mr. Tierney had said against the present measure, turned upon the distant period in which the plan would operate. He had never till now heard that the credit of the country, or the faith of parliament, was to be estimated by periods of time: he had never understood that there existed in this country such a spirit as led to occasion any difference in point of confidence, where the faith of parliament was pledged, whether it was confined to four years or forty; and the whole financial transactions of the country warranted the assertion. Had not many large sums been borrowed on long annuities of 60 and 70 years? And had they ever been under-estimated because of their long duration? No, the public credit of the country would always find its level, whatever the period of time might be in which that credit might have to operate. An hon. gentleman had alluded to something like deception having arisen from the terms "consolidated sinking fund." Not only no such deception had been practised, but none was ever intended to be practised. The plan stood upon too solid and broad a basis to require such assistance. Much had been said about the measure being calculated to throw upon posterity burthens which the present age should bear. This was not a correct state of the case. Not one single shilling would be borne by posterity which the present day did not bear. It was the object of the bill, to lay the same burthens equally on both, until the whole debt was discharged.

The bill then went through the committee, and was reported; and passed the House on the 11th.

Mr. Tierney's Finance Resolutions. June 17. Mr. Tierney rose to submit his annual Resolutions respecting the State of the Public Finances. He said, he wished them to be laid on the table, printed, and discussed on a future day.

The Resolutions were as follow:

FINANCE RESOLUTIONS.

1. That the amount of the public funded debt, on the 1st Feb. 1793, was 238,231,248*l*. exclusive of long and short annuities for lives, to the amount of 1,373,550*l*.; of which sums, stock, to the amount of 10,242,100*l*. had been purchased by the commissioners for redeeming the national debt, and the annuities, to the amount of 79,880*l*. had fallen in, and been carried to their account, reducing the actual amount of the debt on the 1st Feb. 1793, to 227,989,148*l*. and the annuities to 1,293,670*l*.; and that, on the 1st Feb. 1802, stock, to the amount of 39,885,308*l*. had been purchased by the commissioners, and stock, to the amount of 18,001,148*l*. had been transferred to them on account of land tax redeemed, and annuities, to the amount of 125,707*l*. had fallen in; reducing, on the 1st Feb. 1802

the actual amount of debt existing before the war to 180,344,792*l.* and the annuities to 1,247,843*l.*

2. That the total amount of stock created since the 1st Feb. 1793 (including the amount created by sums borrowed in the present session of parliament, and after deducting 20,493,003*l.* purchased by the commissioners for redeeming the national debt) on the 1st Feb. 1802, is 338,138,360*l.*; of which sum the interest on 7,502,633*l.* is payable by the emperor of Germany; and the interest on 22,348,000*l.* is payable by Ireland: And that annuities have been granted since the 1st Feb. 1793 to the amount of 550,460*l.* of which 9,791*l.* is payable by Ireland, and 230,000*l.* by the emperor of Germany.

3. That the total amount of the public funded debt (including the amount created by the sums borrowed in the present session, and after deducting 60,375,311*l.* purchased by the commissioners, and 18,801,148*l.* transferred to them on account of land tax redeemed) was on the 1st Feb. 1802, 518,483,152*l.*; of which sum 29,064,226*l.* is on account of Ireland and the emperor of Germany; leaving a funded debt charged on Great Britain of 489,418,926*l.*: And that the amount of annuities charged on Great Britain (after deducting what have fallen in) was, on the 1st Feb. 1802, in short annuities, and for lives, 543,300*l.*; and in long annuities, 1,015,410*l.*

4. That, under the heads of treasury, army, ordnance, barracks, and advances from Civil list (after deducting the surplus of ways and means of 1801) outstanding demands, as far as the same can be made up, remained to be provided for, on the 5th Jan. 1802, to the amount of 3,264,235*l.*: That the unfunded debt in exchequer bills, unprovided for, or provided for out of funds which have proved insufficient, was, on the 5th Jan. 1802, 13,744,443: That the debt of the navy remaining to be provided for, was, on the 5th Jan. 1802, 9,073,070*l.*; and, that the total amount of demands outstanding, navy debt and exchequer bills unprovided for, or provided for out of insufficient funds, was, on the 5th Jan. 1802, 26,081,748; of which sum 11,771,836*l.* has since been made good out of the supplies of the present session, leaving an unfunded debt of 14,309,912*l.* to which 5,000,000*l.* of exchequer bills, voted in the present session, being added, makes a total of unfunded debt hereafter to be provided for, of 19,309,912*l.*

5. That the total debt may be stated as follows; viz.

| Leaving a Total Debt charged on Great Britain exclusive of543,000 l. Short Annuities, and any farther sums necessary forwinding up the expenses of the War of ..... | 534,114,088 |

6. That the sum applicable to the reduction of the total funded debt was, on the 1st Feb. 1793, 1,427,143*l.*, and, on the 1st Feb. 1802, 5,809,330*l.* to which must be added 26,390*l.*, being 1 per cent on part of the loan of the present year; making a total of 5,835,720*l.* of which sum 5,587,399*l.* is applicable to the reduction of the debt charged on Great Britain, and, being appropriated by act of parliament to accumulate at compound interest, will redeem a sum equal to the amount of debt created since the 1st Jan. 1800, in about 16 years, supposing all stocks to be purchased at par, and in about 12½ years, supposing the 3 per cents to be purchased at 75.

7. That the annual charge incurred by the permanent debt, on the 5th Jan. 1793, was 10,325,866*l.*, including 1,000,000*l.*, applicable to the reduction of the debt:—That the annual charge incurred by the permanent debt created since the 5th Jan. 1793 (exclusive of interest payable by Ireland, and including the charge incurred by the loan of the present session, but exclusive of 48,000*l.* interest on deferred stock) is 13,557,600*l.*, of which sum 2,462,100*l.* is the 1 per cent sinking fund on the capital of the said debt, applicable to the reduction thereof; and that a farther charge of 497,735*l.* per annum is guaranteed by parliament in default of payment of the interest of certain loans by his majesty the emperor of Germany.

8. That the nett produce of the permanent taxes, existing previous to the war, was, on the 5th Jan. 1793, 14,284,000*l.*; and on the 5th Jan. 1802, 13,221,682*l.*: That the nett produce of the permanent taxes imposed since the 5th Jan. 1793 was, on the 5th Jan. 1802, 9,187,288*l.*: And, that the total amount of the permanent taxes was, on the 5th Jan. 1802, 22,408,970*l.*

9. That the total official value of all imports into Great Britain, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 19,659,358: and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 18,685,390*l.*: —That the total official value of all imports, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1802 (supposing the imports from the East Indies, of which no account has been made up, to be the same as in the preceding year) was 32,317,032*l.*; and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 26,964,036*l.*:—That the total official value of British produce and manufactures, exported in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 18,336,851; and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 14,771,049*l.*:—That the total official value of British produce and manufactures, exported in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 25,719,979*l.*; and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 21,631,050*l.*:—That the total official value of foreign merchandize, exported from Great Britain, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 6,568,346*l.*; and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 5,469,014*l.*:—That the total official value of foreign merchandize, exported in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 16,523,480*l.*; and, on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 14,104,700*l.*

10. That the total sum to be raised in Great Britain, in the year 1802, may be estimated as follows; viz.

The first Resolution being read, the debate thereupon was adjourned to the 25th.

June 25. The adjourned debate on Mr. Tierney's Finance Resolutions being resumed, Mr. Tierney entered into a defence of them, and, after a short conversation, the previous question was moved upon them by the chancellor of the exchequer, and carried.

Mr. Chancellor Addington's Finance Resolutions.] The following Resolutions were then moved by Mr. Chancellor Addington, and agreed to :

FINANCE RESOLUTIONS.

1. That the amount of the public funded debt was, on the 5th Jan. 1786, 238,231,248*l*. exclusive of long and short annuities, and annuities for lives to the amount of 1,373,550*l*. ; that, on the 1st Feb. 1703, stock to the amount of 10,242,100*l*. had been purchased by the commissioners for redeeming the national debt, and annuities to the amount of 79,880*l*, had fallen in, and had been carried to their account ; reducing the actual amount of the debt on the 5th Jan. 1793 to 227,989,148*l*. and the annuities to 1,293,670*l*. : and that, on the 1st Feb. 1802, stock to the amount of 39,885,308*l*, had been purchased by the commissioners for redeeming the national debt, and annuities to the amount of 125,707*l*. had fallen in, and been carried to their account, and stock to the amount of 18,001,143*l*. had been transferred to them on account of land tax redeemed ; reducing the actual amount of debt existing before the war on the

2. That the capital of the public funded debt created since the 1st Feb. 1793, as the same stood on the 1st Feb. 1802, together with the capital to be created by sums borrowed in the present session of parliament, and exclusive of 7,502,633*l*. 3 per cent stock, created by advances to the Emperor of Germany, is 351,125,730*l*. That the amount of long annuities, created during the same period is 320,461*l*. per annum, exclusive of 230,000*l*. annuity created by advances to the Emperor of Germany, which will expire in the year 1820. That of these sums, 22,348,000*l*. capital, and 9,791*l*. long annuities, are on account of Ireland, leaving a permanent debt, of 328,777,730*l*. charged on Great Britain. And that on the 1st Feb. 1802, 19,703,596*l*. had been purchased by the commissioners for redeeming the national debt : reducing the said permanent debt, created since 5th Jan. 1793, to 309,074,134*l*. exclusive of long annuities to the amount of 310,670*l*. per annum.

3. That the total amount of the permanent funded debt charged on Great Britain, after deducting the sum of 59,588,904*l*. redeemed by and the annuities fallen in to the commissioners, and 18,001,143*l*. transferred to them on account of land-tax redeemed, was, on the 1st Feb. 1802, 439,418,926*l*. together with short annuities to the amount of 543,103*l*. and long annuities to the amount of 1,015,410*l*.

4. That the sum annually applicable to the reduction of the national debt of Great Britain, in pursuance of the act passed in 1786, was 1,000,000*l*. being about 1-238th part of the capital of the permanent debt then existing ; and for 1793, was 1,427,143*l*. being about 1-160th part of the permanent debt existing in 1793, and may, for the year 1802, be estimated at 5,800,000*l.* being about 1-84th part of the permanent debt existing in 1802; which sum of 5,800,000*l.* is appropriated by act of parliament to accumulate at compound interest, until the whole of the existing debt is discharged; which, supposing all the stocks to be purchased at par, and no further sums to be transferred for redemption of land tax cannot be later than the close of the year 1843.

5. That the annual charge incurred on account of the permanent debt on the 5th Jan. 1786, was 9,297,000*l.* before any fund was created applicable to the reduction of the debt, and, on the 5th of Jan. 1793, was 10,325,000*l.* including 1,000,000*l.* applicable thereto; in which sum of 10,325,000*l.* was included, on the 5th Jan. 1793, the interest of 10,242,100*l.* capital stock redeemed, and the amount of annuities fallen in or unclaimed which had been transferred to the commissioners, making together the sum of 387,143*l.*; and that the said sum of 10,325,000*l.* was reduced on the 5th Jan. 1802, by reason of stock transferred for redemption of land tax, and by diminution in the charges of management, on account of sums redeemed by the commissioners, to 9,771,169*l.*; in which sum is included the interest on 39,885,308*l.* capital stock redeemed, and the amount of annuities fallen in or unclaimed, and transferred to the commissioners, making together the sum of 1,334,186*l.*

6. That the annual charge incurred on account of the permanent debt of Great Britain, created since the 5th Jan. 1793, including 924,199*l.* permanent interest and charge on loan of the present session, of which 48,761*l.* 17*s.* will not become payable till after the 5th Jan. 1806, amounts to 13,597,594*l.* per annum; of which 10,544,383*l.* is for interest, annuity and charges of management of such part of the said debt as was unredeemed on the 1st Feb. 1802; and 3,053,211*l.* arises from 1 per cent sinking fund on the capital of part of the said debt and interest of stock redeemed, and is applicable to the reduction thereof; and that a further charge of 497,735*l.* per annum is guaranteed by parliament, in default of payment of the interest of certain loans by his majesty the emperor of Germany.

7. That the annual charge on account of the permanent debt of Great Britain, on the 1st Feb. 1802 (including 924,199*l.* for interest and charges of the loan of the present session and 200,000*l.* now permanently added to the sinking fund) amounts to 23,568,763*l.* whereof 5,587,397*l.* is applicable to the reduction of the national debt. And that a further charge of 497,735*l.* per annum is guaranteed by parliament, in default of payments of the interest of certain loans by his majesty the emperor of Germany.

8. That the amount of the outstanding demands unprovided for on the 5th Jan. 1802, exclusive of unfunded debt, and of the anticipation of certain duties annually voted, was 4,514,351*l.*: that the surplus of ways and means for the year 1801 was 114,000*l.*; and 99,886*l.* remained unpaid and applicable to the public service on the grant to the queen of Portugal; reducing the amount of demands unprovided for to 4,300,465*l.*; of which 4,018,420*l.* has been provided for in the present session.

9. That the unfunded debt, exclusive of the anticipation in the usual form of certain duties annually voted, amounted, on the 5th Jan. 1793, to 8,925,422*l.* and on the 5th Jan. 1802, to 21,179,170*l.*; exclusive of the anticipation of the loan of 1802, and of 3,000,000*l.* advanced by the Bank without interest for the renewal of their charter, to be repaid in 1806; of which sum of 21,179,170*l.* 10,113,493*l.* has been paid off or provided for in the course of the present session.

10. That the nett produce of the permanent taxes existing on the 5th Jan. 1784, then amounted to 10,194,259*l.*; and that taxes were afterwards imposed to defray the expenses of the war ending in 1783, amounting in 1786 to 928,000*l.*: making together 11,132,000*l.*

11. That the nett produce of the permanent taxes existing previous to the year 1784, adding thereto about 938,000*l.* imposed as above stated in 1784 and 1785, and 137,000*l.* arising from the consolidation act, and from duties imposed in 1789, was, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793, 14,284,000*l.*; on the 5th Jan. 1794, 13,941,000*l.*; on the 5th Jan. 1795, 13,858,000*l.*; on the 5th Jan. 1796, 13,557,000*l.*; on the 5th January 1797, 14,292,000*l.*; on the 5th January 1798, 13,332,000*l.*; on the 5th January 1799, 14,275,000*l.*; on the 5th January 1800, 15,743,109*l.*; on the 5th January 1801, 14,194,589*l.*; and on the 5th January 1802, (including 1,275,544*l.* the amount of bounties paid on corn and rice imported, 14,497,226*l.*; which last sum, after deducting the duties arising from the consolidation act, and those imposed in 1789, exceeds the nett produce of the permanent taxes on the 5th Jan. 1784, together with that of the taxes imposed in 1784 and 1785, by 3,228,226*l.*

12. That the actual nett produce of the taxes imposed since the 5th Jan. 1793, amounted in the year ending the 5th. January 1802, to 9,187,288*l.*: and that the total nett produce of the permanent taxes in the year ended the 5th Jan. 1802, amounted to 23,684,514*l.* (including 1,275,544*l.* paid for bounties on corn and rice imported).

with 1798, of, 5,192,073*l.*; compared with 1799, of 617,400*l.*; and compared with 1800, of 1,833,360*l.*

14. That the official value of all imports into Great Britain, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1784, was 13,122,235*l.*; and on an average of six years ending 5th Jan. 1784, was 11,690,829*l.*:—that the official value of all imports into Great Britain in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793 was 19,659,358*l.*; and on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 18,685,390*l.*:—that the official value of all imports into Great Britain, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1802 (supposing the imports from the East Indies of which no account has yet been made up, to be the same as in the preceding year) was 32,317,032*l.*; making an increase as compared with 1783, of 19,194,797*l.* and with 1792, of 12,657,674*l.*; and on an average of six years ending 5th Jan. 1802, was 26,964,038*l.*; making an increase, as compared with the average of the 5th Jan. 1784, of 15,273,209*l.*; and with the average to the 5th Jan. 1793, of 8,278,648*l.*:—and that the real value of imports in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1802, supposing the imports from the East Indies to be the same as in the preceding year, may be estimated at about 58,800,000*l.*

15. That the official value of British manufactures, exported from Great Britain in the year ending the 5th January 1784, was 10,409,713*l.*; and on an average of six years, ending 5th Jan. 1784, was 8,616,660*l.*:—that the official value of British manufactures exported from Great Britain in the year ending 5th Jan. 1793, was 18,336,851*l.*; and on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 14,771,049*l.*:—that the official value of British manufactures exported from Great Britain in the year ending 5th Jan. 1802, was 25,719,979*l.* making an increase, as compared with 1783, of 15,310,266*l.* and with 1792, of 7,383,128*l.*; and on an average of six years, ending the 5th Jan. 1802, was 21,631,050*l.* making an increase, as compared with the average to 5th Jan. 1784, of 13,014,390*l.*; and with the average to 5th January 1793, of 6,860,000*l.*:—and that the real value of British manufactures exported in the year 1801, may be estimated at 41,770,000*l.*

16. That the official value of foreign merchandise exported from Great Britain in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1784, was 4,332,909*l.* and on an average of six years ending the 5th Jan. 1784, was 4,263,930*l.*:—that the official value of foreign merchandise exported from Great Britain in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 6,568,348*l.*; and on an average of six years ending the 5th Jan. 1793, was 5,468,014*l.*:—that the official value of foreign merchandise exported from Great Britain in the year ending the 5th January 1802, was 16,523,480*l.* making an increase as compared with 1783, of 12,190,571*l.* and with 1792, of 9,955,132*l.*; and on an average of six years, ending 5th Jan. 1802, was 14,104,700*l.* making an increase as compared with the average to Jan. 5th 1784, of 9,840,770*l.* and with the average to Jan. 5th 1793, of 8,636,686*l.*:—and that the real value of foreign merchandise exported in the year ending the 5th January 1802; may be estimated at about 15,750,000*l.*

17. That the number of registered vessels belonging to the British dominions, and employed in trade in the year 1789, being the first year in which the register act had taken full effect, was 14,310; their tonnage 1,395,172, and the number of seamen navigating the same 108,962. In the year 1792, the number of vessels was 16,070; their tonnage 1,540,145; and the number of seamen navigating the same 118,286; and in the year 1801, the number of vessels was 19,772; their tonnage 2,037,317, and the number of men 143,987;—being an increase of 5,462 ships, of 642,145 tons, and of 35,025 men, compared with 1789; and of 3,693 ships, of 497,172 tons, and of 25,701 men, compared with 1792.

18. That the total sum to be raised in Great Britain in the year 1802, may be estimated as follows:—viz.

19. That the gross receipt of the Permanent Revenue, after deducting re-payments for over Entries, Drawbacks, and bounties in the nature of Drawbacks amounted, in the year ended 5th January 1802, to ..... 29,220,536
 Estimated Produce, to the 5th April 1803, of the Taxes imposed in the present session of Parliament ..... 2,400,000

That further sums are applicable to the service of the year 1802, as follows:

|                                                                                                                        |            |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| Repayments from Grenada, Imprests, and Lottery .....                                                                   | 862,000    |
| And that the remainder of the Supply for the year 1802 is provided for by a Loan on account of Great Britain, of ..... | 23,000,000 |
| And a Loan for Ireland, of .....                                                                                       | 2,000,000  |
| And by Exchequer Bills, to be charged on Supplies 1803 .....                                                           | 5,000,000  |
| And expected additional Produce of Taxes that were deficient in 1801, compared with 1799 .....                         | 1,600,000  |
| Surplus of Ways and Means 1801, and Residue of Grants to the Queen of Portugal .....                                   | 213,886    |
| Interest of Land Tax contracted to be paid for by instalments .....                                                    | 25,000     |
| Arrears of Income tax .....                                                                                            | 2,500,000  |

Making in the whole the sum of ..... 66,821,422

20. That it appears by a report of a committee of this House in 1791, that the actual expenditure (including the annual million for the reduction of the public debt) on an average of five years peace ending the 5th January 1791, and including sundry extraordinary expenses for the armament of 1787, and for payments to American loyalists, and other articles of a temporary nature, amounted to 16,816,985*l.*

But the Peace Establishment was estimated by the said committee, at ..... 15,969,178

With which estimate the actual expense of the year 1792 nearly agreed.

In the above sum was included the Charge of the Public Debt, amounting to 10,325,000*l.* from which is to be deducted the Charge of Stock extinguished by the redemption of Land Tax on the 5th January 1802 ..... 540,000

That the additional permanent charge incurred by the debt created since 1793, exclusive of interest payable by Ireland, is ..... 13,597,594

That the additional charge to be incurred for increased amount of Exchequer Bills outstanding, is about ..... 140,000

Interest of money for satisfying increased Navy Debt, at 5*l.* per cent is about .... 270,000

That the additional charge incurred on the Consolidated Fund is ..... 390,000

That the additional charge incurred for a sum appropriated for the Redemption of the Public Debt, is ..... 200,000

And that the increased expenses of the peace establishment (exclusive of any charges to be incurred by interest on further sums, to be paid on winding up the expenses of the war, and any augmentation which may take place in the Naval or Military establishments, but allowing for increase of pay and other expenses) may be estimated at ..... 700,000

And also exclusive of 497,000*l.* interest on loans due by the emperor of Germany, and guaranteed by parliament may be estimated at ..... 30,726,772

21. That adding to the produce of the permanent taxes in the year ending the 5th January, 1802, the sum of 1,275,544*l.* paid for corn bounties, and the sum of 1,600,000*l.* being the estimated deficiency of certain duties in the same year, the income applicable to the peace establishment may be estimated as follows:

|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| Old permanent taxes .....                                                      | 14,497,226 |
| New permanent taxes .....                                                      | 9,187,288  |
| Further produce of taxes that were deficient in 1801, compared with 1799 ..... | 1,600,000  |
| Further produce of taxes, 1801 .....                                           | 864,319    |
| Taxes imposed in 1802 .....                                                    | 4,000,000  |

|-------------------------------------------------------|------------------------|
| Land and Malt, after deducting land tax redeemed..... | 2,060,000              |
|                                                       | <hr/> 32,208,833 <hr/> |

And that a further sum of 45,340*l.* arising from annuities, which will expire at the periods under mentioned, viz.

|---------------|---------------------|
| In 1805 ..... | 56,554              |
| 1806 .....    | 8,152               |
| 1807 .....    | 15,515              |
| 1808 .....    | 374,119             |
|               | <hr/> 454,340 <hr/> |

will then also be applicable, as well as such sums as may from time to time arise from the savings on the interest of stock, which may be reduced to a lower rate, and which, supposing the whole of the stocks to be reduced to 3 per cent would amount to 1,491,890*l.* which sums are exclusive of any allowance for the profit of a lottery, or for any participation of the territorial revenues of India.

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Money Bills.] June 28. His majesty came in state to the House of Peers, when the Usher of the Black Rod was sent to command the attendance of the House of Commons, who soon after appeared at the bar.

Mr. Speaker Abbot then addressed his Majesty as follows :

“ Most Gracious Sovereign :

“ It is my duty to present to your majesty the bills for completing the supplies which your majesty's faithful Commons have granted for the service of the year.

“ With heartfelt gratitude they acknowledge your majesty's paternal goodness and wisdom, which have already enabled them to make a large reduction of the public burthens, by the termination of a long and eventful war; a war just and necessary in its origin, conducted with energy, sustained with fortitude, signalized by triumphs surpassing the fame of our ancestors, and obtained in countries unvisited by their arms—and concluded at length by a peace, which has added new conquests to your crown, and given repose and safety to these its ancient dominions, whose Peers and Commons have now for the second year the happiness of being assembled in one United Parliament at the foot of your throne.

“ Thus circumstanced, your majesty's faithful Commons not only look forward with a sanguine hope that they may not soon be called to the hard necessity of augmenting the public debt by future burthens, but they have deemed it their duty to look back to the debt already incurred, and with the same characteristic spirit which first laid the foundation of an effectual system for the extinction of the national debt, they have proceeded to arrange and settle a plan for accelerating that extinction, by pledging the future application of their growing means to the accomplishment of the same great object.

“ At a time when their attention had been directed to these considerations, and when they have also found that taxes of unprecedented weight, though wisely imposed to meet the exigencies of such a war, might nevertheless be now prudently repealed, it has given the highest satisfaction to your majesty's faithful Commons to relieve those pressing demands which the general difficulties of the times had cast upon the provision assigned by parliament, for the support of your majesty's household and the honour and dignity of your crown: for this country has not now to learn, that its monarchy is the best and strongest security for its liberties, and that the splendor of the throne reflects lustre and dignity upon the whole nation.

“ These, Sire, are amongst the memorable events of a session thus far protracted; upon which we reflect with a conscious satisfaction, that to the discharge of great duties we have brought proportionate exertions.

“ And we now indulge the flattering hope, that we may safely apply ourselves to cultivate the arts of peace; arts long dear to your majesty, and congenial to the temper of your people, whose spirit of enterprise in foreign commerce, and internal improvement, unexampled in its exertions throughout the war, may now expand itself with redoubled activity; and by providing new sources of strength and wealth for this country, fix the stability of our own power, and at the same time promote the common interests of Europe, and of all the civilized nations of the world.”

The King's Speech at the Close of the Session.] After the royal assent had been given to the said bills, his Majesty made the following Speech to both Houses :

" My Lords and Gentlemen ;

" The public business being concluded, I think it proper to close this session of parliament.

" During a long and laborious attendance, you have invariably manifested the just sense you entertain of the great trust committed to your charge. The objects of your deliberations have been unusually numerous and important ; and I derive the utmost satisfaction from the conviction, that the wisdom of your proceedings will be fully proved by their effects, in promoting the best interests of my people throughout every part of my dominions.

" Gentlemen of the House of Commons ;

" The ample provision you have made for the various branches of the public service demands my warmest acknowledgments ; and my particular thanks are due for the liberality which you have shown in exonerating my civil government and household from the debt with which they were unavoidably burthened.

" Whilst I regret the amount of the supplies which circumstances have rendered necessary, it is a relief to me to contemplate the state of our manufactures, commerce, and revenue, which afford the most decisive and gratifying proofs of the abundance of our internal resources, and of the growing prosperity of the country.

" My Lords and Gentlemen ;

" As I think it expedient that the election of a new parliament should take place without delay, it is my intention, forthwith, to give directions for dissolving the present, and for calling a new parliament.

" In communicating to you this intention, I cannot suppress those sentiments of entire approbation with which I reflect upon every part of your conduct since I first met you in this place. The unexampled difficulties of our situation required the utmost efforts of that wisdom and fortitude which you so eminently displayed in contending with them, and by which they have been so happily surmounted. From your judicious and salutary measures during the last year, my people derived all the relief which could be afforded under one of the severest dispensations of Providence ; and it was

by the spirit and determination which uniformly animated your councils, aided by the unprecedented exertions of my fleets and armies, and the zealous and cordial co-operation of my people, that I was enabled to prosecute with success, and terminate with honour, the long and arduous contest in which we have been engaged.

" The same sense of public duty, the same solicitude for the welfare of your country, will now, in your individual characters, induce you to encourage, by all the means in your power, the cultivation and improvement of the advantages of peace.

" My endeavours will never be wanting to preserve the blessings by which we are so eminently distinguished, and to prove that the prosperity and happiness of all classes of my faithful subjects are the objects which are always the nearest to my heart."

On the following day the parliament was dissolved.

FIRST SESSION

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Meeting of the New Parliament.] November 16, 1802. This being the day appointed for the meeting of the New Parliament, the same was opened by commission, and the Commons being sent for to the House of Peers, the lord chancellor signified, that it was his majesty's pleasure to defer declaring the causes of his assembling the parliament, until the Commons had chosen a Speaker. He therefore desired them to choose a fit person to be their Speaker, and to present him there, for his majesty's approbation, on the following day.

Mr. Abbot chosen Speaker.] The Commons being returned to their House, Sir William Scott rose, and addressing himself to Mr. Ley, the deputy clerk, said :—It is with all possible deference to the House, and with the most entire consciousness of the proper modesty of any pretensions of mine, that I am anxious to seize the opportunity of addressing you upon the subject which has been recommended to our immediate attention. The election of a Speaker is the first function of this House in order of time, and is amongst its first functions in point of importance; for it is no less than to designate the person who is to guide the deliberations, to maintain the privileges, and to enforce the duties of this great representative body, of this great united country. What the talents are which constitute the qualifications for such an office, it is not easy to describe in adequate terms; they are such as might hardly be expected to exist in combination, if experience had not shown them to have existed in the numerous instances (some of very recent date) of those who have successfully performed the task—the arduous task—of communicating honour to a station itself most honourable. In adverting to the nature and species of the qualifications which the object of such a choice ought to possess, I need not premise, as the basis of them all, a true spirit of old English loyalty; in other words, an affectionate attachment to the person and family of our sovereign, and to the ancient and reverend constitution of our country. With an unconquerable hostility to the wild and desolating principles which have waged a rancorous war against the best and dearest interests of mankind, he must be expected to unite a love of rational improvement, and of temperate correction. To an enlargement of mind, capable of embracing the most comprehensive subjects must be added, the faculty of descending with precision to the most minute; to a tenacious respect for forms, a liberal regard for principles; to habits of laborious research, powers of prompt and instant decision; to a jealous affection for the privileges of the House, an awful sense of its duties; to a firmness that can resist solicitation, a suavity of nature that can receive it without impatience; and to a dignity of public demeanor, suited to the quality of great affairs, and commanding the respect that is requisite for conducting them, an urbanity of private manners that can soften the asperities of business, and adorn an office of severe labour with the conciliatory elegance of a station of ease. In looking around this assembly (enriched as it has been by the accession of talents from another country), it is impossible not to feel a satisfaction in observing, that there is no considerable number of persons in it, whom the House would pronounce equal to the demands, various and important as they may be, of the station I have ventured to describe—and that in this dignified number are to be found, as well gentlemen who have not been bred to the study and practice of the law, as those who have; for with all the partialities I may be supposed to entertain, I feel my full portion of national pride in avowing, that, splendid as the talents are which that profession has exhibited to parliament, they have been fully rivalled by those which other educations and other habits of life in this favoured country are in the course of producing to its notice and admiration.—Amidst such copious materials for a happy selection, it might be difficult for the House, if it acted upon its mere sense of supposed merit (however reasonably founded), to name an individual, without feeling that it might have occasion to suspect (and suspecting to regret, the loss of other abilities, possibly superior to those which had attracted its choice. But it is the good fortune of the House at this crisis, that it is not left to act upon the mere sense of supposed merit; for it has the experience of tried worth to guide its determination. Many of us who had seats in the last parliament, will recollect, (and with every feeling of gratitude for past and of sanguine expectation of future services), that there is a person to whose nomination that experience has set its authentic and deciding seal—I mean the right hon. gentleman who filled that office in the two last sessions of that parliament, and filled it in a manner which is justly described in the highest terms of possible praise, when I say, that it consoled that House for the loss of those eminent gentlemen, who, in the same office had commanded so large a portion of its veneration and applause. To him who stands distinguished by the suffrage of general applause, it would be presumptuous to apply the suffrage of particular commendation, otherwise I should be tempted to use my own language in expressing the sense which every member of that House entertained, and in so doing, to claim on their behalf from new members some confidence for the propriety of that sense—respecting the manner in which, by a happy mixture of industry the most severe, of knowledge the most exact, of attention the most minute, of private civility the most attractive, and of an observance of public decorum the most correct, that right hon. person performed the duty, and sustained the dignity of his high office. It may be more proper for me to content myself with observing, that, in the judgment of all, he fully realized all the hopes which were held out to that House in the eloquent panegyric which introduced him to their choice; and that he is now proposed with these additional advantages, that he professes a confirmed experience of the duties of his office, and parliament possesses a no less confirmed experience of his entire ability to discharge them. Under the impression of these sentiments, I move, "That the right hon. Charles Abbot do take the chair of this House."

Mr. H. Lascelles said:—In rising to second this motion, I feel strongly impressed with the importance of the subject under deliberation. The choice of a Speaker must at all times be a matter highly interesting to this House, as upon that choice must greatly depend the regularity and dignity of our proceedings; but under the present circumstances of the country, it behoves us in a peculiar manner to place in that situation a person of ability, integrity, firmness, impartiality, strongly attached to our happy constitution, strenuously inclined to support the rights and privileges of this House, thoroughly acquainted with its rules and orders, and, in the present increased state of parliamentary transactions, of experience and assiduity in business. If at all periods these qualities have been adverted to in the choice of a Speaker, they are become peculiarly important at the present conjuncture, since not only the fate of this kingdom, but of Europe, may be involved in the future deliberations of this parliament. The difficulties that attend this office are great; the duties of it require unremitting attention. The known conduct and pursuits of the right hon. gentleman who has just been named for your approbation, appeared to me, previous to his being chosen Speaker by the last parliament, to point him out as a proper person in whom to confide this honourable office: but we have now more than confidence to depend upon—we have the experience of part of the last parliament. I consider his conduct, during the short period he filled the chair, as highly honourable to himself, and advantageous to the public. I should feel desirous of enlarging upon my view of the merits of the right hon. gentleman, were I not fearful that my expressions might ill convey the sentiments of respect which I entertain towards him as an individual, and as a public character; but I have the satisfaction of thinking that I cannot more strongly express these sentiments than by seconding the motion.

Mr. Abbot said:—I conceive it to be unquestionably the highest honour that an individual can possess, to be deemed worthy to be recommended as a person duly qualified to fill the high and important office now the subject of discussion. But, however flattering such recommendation may be, from the terms of kindness in which it has been conveyed, it is impossible for any man who contemplates its extent and magnitude, not to feel a just apprehension of his own abilities; and the experience of the last session fully convinces me, that I ought to be doubtful of mine. The duties of a Speaker are not merely confined to the rules and orders of the House, or to daily and ordinary occurrences. Once placed in the chair, he immediately feels the necessity of an extensive mind, to enable him to investigate the extent of his duties; of a steady resolution to maintain the privileges of the House, as connected with the liberties of the people; and a vigilance which there may exist various occasions to exercise. It is true, that much light is thrown on his duties by the Journals and recorded transactions of the House: from them he most undoubtedly derives much instruction; but in doing so, he must there also learn a fact, in every page most strongly elucidated, that neither the most profound knowledge, nor the most indefatigable industry are of the smallest avail, unless he possesses in the fullest extent the confidence of the House, in my mind the sole criterion which can or ought to induce any one to accept so high and important a trust. Having thus stated my sentiments, I am wholly at the disposal of the House, and ready to obey its pleasure in whatever way they may please to determine.—Mr. Abbot being conducted to the chair in the usual form, said:—Placed for a second time, by the indulgent favour of this House in the chair, I feel myself irresistibly impelled to express to them my warmest gratitude; and in the expression of that gratitude, I hope the House will do me the favour to judge me, more from the conduct that I shall pursue, than from any thing that I can possibly express by words.

Lord Castlereagh said :—Sir, it is with the highest satisfaction that I rise to congratulate you on being once more called to the high and important station which you have before filled with so much credit and honour to yourself, and satisfaction to the House. If, Sir, there could have been the smallest doubt of your possessing the confidence of the House during the last session of parliament, that doubt must now be most unequivocally effaced by the unanimous choice which has this day been made of you to fill again that high and distinguished station; a choice which will reflect as much honour on the House itself, as it must add to the gratification of your own personal feelings. I cannot sit down without adding my own congratulation on the subject.

The House then adjourned. On the following day, Mr. Abbot was presented to the Lords Commissioners, and approved of.

The King's Speech on Opening the Session.] Nov. 23. His Majesty opened the Session with the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"It is highly gratifying to me to resort to your advice and assistance, after the opportunity which has been recently afforded, of collecting the sense of my people.

"The internal prosperity of the country has realized our most sanguine hopes. We have experienced the bounty of Divine Providence in the produce of an abundant harvest.

"The state of the manufactures, commerce, and revenue of my United Kingdom, is flourishing beyond example; and the loyalty and attachment which are manifested to my person and government, afford the strongest indications of the just sense that is entertained of the numerous blessings enjoyed under the protection of our happy Constitution.

"In my intercourse with foreign powers I have been actuated by a sincere disposition for the maintenance of peace. It is nevertheless impossible for me to lose sight of that established and wise system of policy, by which the interest of other States are connected with our own; and I cannot therefore be indifferent to any material change in their relative condition and strength. My conduct will be invariably regulated by a due consideration of the actual situation of Europe, and by a watchful solicitude for the permanent welfare of my people.

"You will, I am persuaded, agree with me in thinking, that it is incumbent upon us to adopt those means of security which are best calculated to afford the prospect of preserving to my subjects the blessings of peace.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"I have ordered the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you; and I rely on your zeal and liberality in providing for the various branches of the public service; which, it is a great satisfaction to me to think, may be fully accomplished without any considerable addition to the burdens of my people.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I contemplate, with the utmost satisfaction, the great and increasing benefits produced by that important measure, which has united the interest and consolidated the resources of Great Britain and Ireland. The improvement and extension of these advantages will be objects of your unremitting care and attention. The trade and commerce of my subjects, so essential to the support of public credit and of our maritime strength, will, I am persuaded, receive from you every possible encouragement; and you will readily lend your assistance in affording to mercantile transactions in every part of my United kingdom all the facility and accommodation that may be consistent with the security of the public revenue.

"To uphold the honour of the country, to encourage its industry, to improve its resources, and to maintain the true principles of the Constitution in Church and State, are the great and leading duties which you are called upon to discharge. In the performance of them you may be assured of my uniform and cordial support; it being my most earnest wish to cultivate a perfect harmony and confidence between me and my parliament, and to promote to the utmost the welfare of my faithful subjects, whose interests and happiness I shall ever consider as inseparable from my own."

Debate in the Lords on the Address of Thanks.] His Majesty having retired the King's Speech was read by the Lord Chancellor, and again by the clerk at the table. After which,

Lord Arden said;—My lords, the pleasure with which I have heard his majesty's most gracious speech, excites me to rise for the purpose of moving your lordships to answer it in a suitable address. We know, my lords, by personal feeling and observation, that the prosperity of our manufactures, and commerce, the abundance of the necessaries of life, the heartfelt felicity of the people, the ardour of their loyalty to his majesty's person, and their attachment to the constitution, are fully equal to that encouraging representation of them which has been given in the speech from the throne. Of the present condition of Europe, it is difficult to think without deep anxiety. There is not a power on the continent between whose interests and ours certain relations do not subsist. The order of dominion cannot be there indefinitely changed, without endangering the security of Britain. However much, then, may have been conceded to imperious necessity; whatever of the mere pride of arrogant pretension we may have been induced to wave for the sake of peace; though we may have reluctantly abandoned allies, who had no longer the power nor the will to make a stand for their own political existence; yet there are limits, beyond which it is forbidden by just policy to extend this plan of conduct. We cannot, therefore, but approve his majesty's resolution to keep the vigilance of his government awake to the changes in the arrangement of continental power. Such vigour of preparations as may be requisite to give due authority to that vigilance will be neither disagreeable to the nation at large, nor inconsistent with the warmest wishes of the members of this House. We can cordially sympathise in the sense of the happy effects which have already ensued from a union that has concentrated the energies, and usefully simplified the administration of these kingdoms. The supplies which, in such a state of affairs, to a government so beneficent, from a country so flourishing, may be wanted, a people so loyal will not be easily persuaded to deny. His lordship then moved an address, which was an echo of the speech from the throne.

Viscount Nelson said:—I will not deny myself the pleasure of seconding an address with the purport of which my wishes zealously coincide; nor am I willing to omit this opportunity of expressing my satisfaction at the prosperity of these kingdoms, and my approbation of a plan of government, which proposes to maintain the ancient dignity of the country, in the system of Europe, though without any hot-headed sacrifice of the benefits of peace. War has not exhausted our resources: our national industry has not been slackened; nor has it been frustrated of its rewards. The prosperity which the country enjoys, is such as would render us inexcusable were we to sacrifice its honour. Unsuccessful, so far as we were directly engaged, in the war of valour, of martial force, of military talents, France may, perhaps, hope to gain more by that of artifice, of circumvention, of equivocal faith: but British strength of understanding and rectitude of intention, ever have been, and I hope in God will ever be, more than an equal match for every less candid and ingenuous art. I, my lords, have, in different countries, seen much of the miseries of war. I am therefore in my inmost soul, a man of peace. Yet would I not, for the sake of any peace, however fortunate, consent to sacrifice one jot of England's honour. Our honour is inseparably combined with our genuine interest. Hitherto there has been nothing greater known on the continent than the faith, the untarnished honour, the generous public sympathies, the high diplomatic influence, the commerce, the grandeur, the resistless power, the unconquerable valour of the British nation. Wherever I have served in foreign countries, I have witnessed these to be the sentiments with which Britons were regarded. The advantages of such a reputation are not to be lightly brought into hazard. I, for one, rejoice that his majesty has signified his intention to pay due regard to the connection between the interests of this country and the preservation of the liberties of Europe. It is satisfactory to know, that the preparations to maintain our dignity in peace are not to be neglected. Those supplies which his majesty shall for such purposes demand, his people will most earnestly grant. The nation is satisfied that the government seeks in peace or war no interest separate from that of the people at large; and as the nation was pleased with that sincere spirit of peace with which the late treaty was negotiated, so, now that a restless and unjust ambition in those with whom we desired sincere amity has given a new alarm, the country will rather prompt the government to assert its honour, than need to be roused to such measures of vigorous defence as the exigency of the times may require. My professional education will plead my excuse for the imperfect manner in which I deliver my sentiments; but I should not have done my duty if I had not, even in this plain seaman-like manner, seconded the present address.

The Marquis of Abercorn said, it was common to declare in that House, at all times, and under every circumstance, that the present was the most tremendous crisis in which the country had ever been placed; but if ever such a declaration could be made, otherwise than as a mere figure of speech, the moment in which he was speaking might correctly be so described. Our national character, our fame, our credit with the rest of Europe, and, above all, our future security, depended altogether upon the firmness and spirit of the government. His lordship adverted to the extraordinary aggrandizement of our ambitious and inveterate enemy, and the danger that might befall this country, if a vigilant eye was not kept upon our rival, and such measures pursued as were best calculated to turn aside every mischievous attempt to undermine our power and lessen our greatness. He declared his readiness to support, as far as he was able, those ministers, be they who they might, who would adopt that spirited system which the exigency of the times rendered indispensably necessary. After an elaborate eulogium on the merits, virtues, and integrity of Mr. Pitt, the marquis begged their lordships to reflect, that it was not the views of ambition, the acquirements of territory, or the increase of national power, that he was desirous of recommending to their attention; but a more rational and a more moderate object, the preservation of the united empire such as it then was. We still remained a great and a free people, the happy subjects of a beloved sovereign. He did not wish to be considered as the advocate for war; he spoke rather as the friend of peace when he urged the necessity of being able to repel insult or aggression. Much had, in former sessions, been said of our being left at a certain period of the war without allies; for his part, he thought that the happiest circumstance of the war; but, in fact, if a renewal of hostilities should be unavoidable, it would be found that we had allies more powerful than France could hope for. The chance of events was our ally; scarcely any change could take place in another war which would not be a loss to France and a gain to Great Britain. He hoped that the unanimity of the House that night would convince all Europe of the unanimous determination of the people of the united kingdom, to support and maintain their weight and importance in the scale of nations.

The Earl of Carlisle expressed the satisfaction which he felt at the change which had taken place in the sentiments of ministers, as conveyed in the Address. He congratulated the House and the country on the tone in which that Address was conveyed, which he hoped would have the happy effect of inspiring public confidence. As to the terms of the peace, he entertained but one opinion of them; and that opinion he had expressed when those terms were submitted to the House. Dr. Johnson, having been asked his opinion of Ossian's Poems, answered, that they were poems which might be written by any man, any woman, or any child; the same opinion might be advanced with greater certainty of the peace. He had watched the present administration from the first concoction of it—it was weak in its formation; and on that account he entertained very little hopes that it would gather energy in its progress. He wished to know, then, what had been done? Why, Piedmont had been annexed to France, with other important places, and yet ministers sat quiet spectators of the aggrandisement of that country? The effect of this indifference was felt over all the country. It inflated those who exercised the government in France, when they found that the administration of this country did not hold the string in their hand to pull them down again to a proper level. When the French troops were collected to embark for the West Indies, that would have been a proper time to have convinced the rulers of France, that, however disposed the cabinet of this kingdom was, to listen to peace, they were determined that the best means of securing the continuance of it was to prevent the execution of such a measure, which could not fail to strengthen the power of France, and to lead to an opinion that we were disposed to accept of peace on almost any terms. The Address, however, met with his cordial approbation; and he was heartily pleased with the spirit and tone which it breathed.

The Duke of Norfolk cordially approved of the Address; it was such as became the dignity of that House, and could not fail of having its due effect on the country at large. If, however, the change in the minds of ministers arose from any hopes of a disunion between France, and any of the continental powers in amity with us, he wished to have it understood that he did not vote for the Address under that construction. He was sorry that any allusion had been made to an event which was at all times to be lamented, however weak in its origin, and feeble in its progress (alluding to the affair of colonel Despard); that affair had made a great sensation in the country, and he wished that ministers would not follow the example of their predecessors in magnifying such wicked attempts; but that they would bring these men to trial, that they might be punished according to their crimes, without wounding the constitution.

Lord Grenville said:—I perfectly agree with a noble lord who preceded me, that the new parliament has been assembled at a period pregnant with events of the greatest importance to Europe, and to mankind at large. At no convocation of parliament was the curiosity of the public more strongly excited. All men, doubtful of the principle and policy of the present ministry, were anxious to learn whether we were to have peace or war— anxious to know whether we were ready to truckle to France, or about to defend ourselves against the daring encroachments of that government. The interests and happiness of Europe were nearly destroyed by the inordinate ambition of the French government, which was extending its power and authority to the total subversion of the liberties of mankind. Were we, therefore, to view with silent indifference this deplorable subjugation of Europe on the one hand, or meet with manly fortitude the perilous consequences of war? I am for the religious maintenance of our national character and glory, against all the artful contrivances or combinations of France; and I cannot recommend the adoption of a better policy for the attainment of that end, than a laudable vigilance and an exemplary activity for the general interests of Europe. The speech from the throne meets, in several sentences, with my hearty concurrence. It may be reduced to three propositions, with every one of which I most heartily agree, because every one of these propositions tend to censure the present men in power for their want of capacity, and want of vigilance. The speech expresses satisfaction at the opportunity of resorting to the advice and assistance of parliament. By this observation the ministers evince their wisdom, and it is one of those sentences which deserves the approbation of both Houses. If, however, ministers had been in a state of vigilance and activity since they last met parliament, how came it to pass that France had been suffered to invade the rights and overturn the liberties of various states on the continent? If ministers had conducted themselves with manly fortitude—if they had been actuated by the true spirit of Englishmen—if they had felt for their own honour and the national dignity, they would not have looked on with a censurable indifference: they would have demanded satisfaction for a breach of treaty—they would have checked the violence and rapacity of France, and thus have saved, perhaps, the liberties and independence of several states, once important in the scale of Europe. These remarks form two propositions. Was any attention paid to the machinations of France between the signature of the preliminaries of peace and that of the definitive treaty? No. Did not France, during that interval, dispatch a powerful fleet to the West Indies, without the smallest intimation to us on the subject? Did not she then take measures dangerous to our interest as a maritime power? Did she not, in the plenitude of her rapacity, take possession of the valuable settlement of Louisiana? Ought not that measure alone to have aroused our jealousies on account of our influence in America and the West Indies? We saw also Europe prostrate at the feet of France, and, in the insolence of conquest, her territories plundered, and her liberties destroyed. Ought we not at that alarming period to have demanded retribution? Had we then boldly stood forward in the cause of liberty, France would have receded from her desperate measures. Had we invoked her justice with arms in our hands, we might have saved Europe from the tyranny of the French republic.—What occurred after the signature of the definitive treaty? Did France conduct herself with moderation? Did she give any testimony of her wish to render peace permanent? No. The ink was scarcely dry with which it was signed, the wax scarcely cold with which it was sealed, when France, in violation of the treaty of Amiens, began to add territory to territory to the republic. Piedmont, one of the most beautiful parts of Europe, in complete defiance of justice and public faith, felt the griping hand of rapacity and ambition. Had Great Britain at that time, in concert with Russia, remonstrated against these aggressions, France would not have ventured upon this wanton exercise of power. With that cunning which has characterised the French government, Piedmont was at first occupied as a military position. This plan was adopted in the contemplation of the act of aggression which followed. They concluded a treaty with the king of Sardinia, our old and faithful ally. After this, they congratulated themselves on the success of their scheme. “Now we are safe!” said they: “Now we can fall upon our victims like birds of prey!” and soon published a decree, by which they threw off the mask, and added Piedmont to the French republic. The treaty was signed by the king of Sardinia, when a prisoner in his own capital. Notwithstanding the deplorable state to which he had been reduced by the treachery of France, he insisted, that he should not be obliged to act with hostility against Great Britain. This was another proof of the integrity and honour of the king, who therefore merited our best attentions. On a proposition having once been made to him by the French, that he should exclude the English from his sea-ports, he indignantly rejected it; and thus proved, that his fidelity to our interests was not to be shaken by adverse fortune. This, however, was the very man whom we afterwards abandoned! When we had signed the definitive treaty, we had not signed at the same time an admission on the part of France to her right of occupancy of Piedmont—we had not surrendered our right of interfering for the preservation of the liberties and independence of the other states of Europe. As there was evident danger from the possession of Piedmont by the French, we ought to have checked their ambition in that memorable instance of injustice and depredation. Mark the rapid progress of the aggressive spirit of France. The definitive treaty was signed in March, and ratified in June. In August, France took upon herself to regulate and remodel the several states of Europe. As our ministers made no remonstrance, it may be presumed, that they gave their acquiescence to the encroachments of the French. The ambition of the latter was not very easily gratified; for, in their predilection for new-fangled doctrines, they were resolved to overturn and new-model the constitution of the German empire itself, and this attempt engaged their attention so early as the said month of August, some very few months after the signature of the definitive treaty. Still, however, our ministers viewed the passing scene with indifference. In the height of their pacific disposition towards the French, they never made the smallest attempt at complaint or remonstrance for these daring encroachments, which threatened the total subversion of the liberties of Europe. These acts, particularly the last, were direct violations of the treaty of Amiens. In the terms of pacification, another old and faithful ally had been forgotten, if not sacrificed—I mean the House of Orange. We had looked on with criminal indifference, while that illustrious House, always warmly attached to Great Britain, was robbed and plundered by the French government. I well remember when this question was once agitated in this House, that the noble marquis (Cornwallis) who had concluded the treaty of Amiens, rose up with honest warmth, and asked, if any man could for a moment believe that the house of Orange, so deserving of the protection of this country, would not be amply indemnified for the losses which it had sustained? Notwithstanding the manly remarks of the noble marquis, all passed away in silence. Instead of a manly interference, our ministers sunk into a state of submission to the will of France. These transactions bring the conduct of administration down to the month of September, when it appears they viewed the aggressions on the part of France with the same apathy which had marked their precious direction of affairs. The third proposition to which I formerly alluded, was that in which his majesty's speech recommends an augmentation of our forces. This was certainly not very pacific; but the eyes of ministers were at last opened; they see the necessity of vigour and watchfulness. This proposition receives my hearty concurrence, because it is the strongest censure of the ministry. It proves that none but idiots or madmen, in the critical state of Europe, could be induced to a reduction of our naval and military forces. We were now, however, called upon to consent to an augmentation of those very forces; and there was no doubt but that the caution was founded in prudence and necessity.—On the retrospect of affairs, I cannot help expressing my astonishment at the absurd conduct of ministers. We have now obtained peace, and yet, instead of the boasted reduction and savings which we were taught to expect, we are to have a speedy augmentation, with all its consequent expenses. Is the aspect of affairs more alarming now than in October 1801, when our secretary for the foreign department signed the preliminaries of peace? Yes. Who has produced this dilemma? His majesty's present ministers. Every step of their conduct since has been a proof of their total incapacity to govern a great nation in times of difficulty and danger. They can form no judgment of the future, from a comparison with the past. They are men of weak understandings, and completely unfit for the situation in which they move. But they now see their error, and tell us that we must be watchful of the conduct of France. If, however, we are to expect any real good, there must be a total change of men and measures. The political career of the present men in power may be termed a series of ignorance and disgrace. In our madness for a hollow peace, we had sent out orders to surrender all our conquests to the enemy. Why not wait for the confirmation of peace by some sincere and indubitable act of the French government? Why surrender Martinique, &c.? I would not have disbanded one man, or dismantled one ship. But a report is prevalent, that ministers have sent out orders not to surrender the remainder of our conquests. Why not have issued the same orders in time against the surrender of Martinique? I rather wish than expect, that the orders for retaining the Cape may reach that settlement sufficiently early to answer the end proposed. Malta, I believe, is still in our hands. I hope we shall not expose ourselves to the scorn and ridicule of Europe by its surrender. This country has now the happiness to hold that important place; and its commanding interest in the Mediterranean is too great ever to be abandoned by a wise and vigorous government.—From all these considerations, I can have no confidence in the present administration. Respecting the internal situation of the country, I have forbore to say one word. I do not wish to excite needless jealousies and alarms. The more judicious and vigorous a government in dangerous times, the more safe is the community at large. But lately, instead of acting on the defensive, instead of watching the operations of France with an eager solicitude, we have been aiding France against ourselves. History records, that our ancestors, in order to induce the Saxons or Danes to desist from the resolution of the invasion of this country, gave them large sums as bribes. What was the consequence? They applied the money thus obtained for the purchase of ships, ammunition, &c. with which they made a grand effort, and thus subjugated this country. Our present conduct was somewhat similar. We surrendered Martinique, &c. as a bonus not to violate the peace. Let us add Malta to the bribe, and the price of peace will be complete. We shall then, perhaps, experience a similar attempt against our liberties and independence by the daring ambition of the natural and avowed enemy of Great Britain. The whole conduct of our ministers has tended to the increase of the strength of the enemy. France has been continuing a system of conquest and aggrandisement which is now coming home to our own doors. Is any man so absurd as for a moment to imagine that she will be more favourable to Great Britain than to Piedmont, Switzerland, &c. What claim have we to her partiality? It is a lamentable fact, that whether you do or do not maintain the relations of peace and amity with France, she is now at war with you. You have no hope of salvation, but by a strong system of defence. Europe is at this time sunk in distraction and despair; but the energy and spirit of Great Britain may arouse the states of the continent to a glorious struggle for their liberty and independence. If, however, there be any hope, it is to be found in measures of decision and firmness—in a bold and animated tone, held by a leader of courage and capacity—not by any of the men now in power, but by him to whom this country, to whom Europe, looks up at this awful hour for the preservation of their dearest rights and liberties.

Lord Pelham said, that was not the proper time to go into a detail of the nature and extent of the intended augmentation of the force of the kingdom; he hoped, therefore, that his silence upon the subject would not be construed into an assent to the construction that had been put upon that part of his majesty's speech; but thus much he would say, that no sudden or great augmentation of the troops was intended, nor did there appear any thing in the state of Europe that made such an augmentation necessary.

Lord Carysfort said, he was sorry to learn from the noble secretary of state, that they were not likely to be gratified with that essential augmentation which the critical situation of the empire required. It was undoubtedly a serious thing to engage in war, but there might occur circumstances which might make such a measure unavoidable. His lordship drew the distinction between peace and war being considered as experiments. War, he admitted, to be an experiment, because the events of a war were uncertain; but peace, he contended, was not an experiment, but a matter of certainty. He gave his hearty assent to the address.

Lord Hobart complained of the injustice of a noble lord, late one of his majesty's ministers, in censuring the king's present servants on account of the dismemberment of Germany, when he could not but know that the treaty of Luneville was made during that noble lord's administration, and that Germany was brought into its present condition by circumstances which were not subject to the control of any ministers. It was enough for him to say, that the indemnities in Germany were not considered as of sufficient importance to prevent our making peace. The noble lord had charged his majesty's servants with incapacity; it did not become him, to say one word in answer to such a charge. He would however, say, that the present ministers did not seek their situations. They were called upon to take them in a moment of great and accumulated difficulties. He therefore only desired, that the present administration might be judged by its conduct. If France had extended her dominion over the greatest part of the continent, it had been under her power long before the noble lord retired from office; and if that noble lord had not been able to prevent such aggrandisement, he had no right to charge the present ministers with misconduct. But that noble lord could not charge the present ministers with incapacity, without at the same time criminating himself for having relinquished his post.

The address was agreed to nem. diss.

Debate in the Commons on the Address of Thanks.] The Speaker stated, that he had been in the House of Peers, where his majesty had delivered a most gracious speech.

After the King's Speech had been read from the Chair,

The Hon. Mr. Trench rose and said, that in prefacing the proposition he meant to submit to the House, for an address to his majesty expressive of thanks for his gracious speech, it was natural that, feeling the importance of the present period, he should allude to the state of our commerce, agriculture, and revenue, and to our relative situation with foreign powers. It was to be expected that, in addressing the first parliament which had assembled since the accomplishment of that measure by which the legislatures of Great Britain and Ireland were united, and the resources of the empire consolidated, he should speak to the consequences of that happy event. First, then, as to our internal resources; he was happy to understand that every branch of our manufactures, and every department of our revenue, was in such a state of prosperity as to afford the most satisfactory cause of exultation. Wherever we turned our eyes, the vigilant attention of government, the successful industry and the steady loyalty of the people, were obvious. Every where was found ample reason to congratulate ourselves, and experience had shown that the predictions of those who had opposed the peace stood on no better foundation than those which so confidently foretold that the war which was concluded would produce the ruin of the country. Although peace had been productive of such fortunate consequences, and although its continuance was devoutly to be wished, yet he strongly approved the declared policy of ministers, to place the empire in such a situation as should render it superior to the apprehensions of war; and if that alternative should become necessary for the maintenance of our honour and security, in such a situation as to protect us from the consequences. He was aware that it would be extremely absurd to maintain, that the spirit of encroachment upon the independence of other nations, which the French government had in so many instances manifested, did not present just grounds of alarm and jealousy; but whether we should interpose to check that spirit, without any concert with other powers, and what degree of concert might be necessary to interpose with effect, was a subject which required a minute consideration of a variety of important circumstances. Whatever resolution might be taken, or whatever the event, it was material to preserve our resources; and under the auspices of our present ministers that object had been particularly attended to. Every one must applaud the economy they had uniformly preserved, and the pacific disposition they had uniformly manifested; but if they should not be permitted to pursue that line of policy, it was desirable that full provision should be made for such an establishment as should enable them to encounter any obstacle. The country looked for such an establishment, and was ready to endure the expense, because they saw it was necessary. The state of the continent was one to which he could not look without anxiety; but with regard to this country, he saw nothing to create despondency. With reference to Ireland, he was enabled, from his local knowledge, to describe the change which the Union had effected in that country. Its manufactures, commerce, and agriculture were rapidly improving. For this the inhabitants felt they were indebted to the provident care and attention of the united parliament, and to the active exertions of ministers. This conviction had the most salutary effect on the Irish, particularly the loyalists, whose attachment to England, in the most perilous times, remained unshaken, and had restored many of its deluded people to their reason, and to the sober habits of industry. He could not forbear to pay his tribute of praise to those who had a share in his majesty's councils, for their unremitting endeavours to promote the interests of his country. They deserved his confidence, and they possessed it. The hon. member concluded with moving an address which, as usual, was an echo of the speech from the throne.

Mr. Curzon expressed his complete concurrence in the sentiments of the hon. mover, to which he did not conceive it necessary to add more, than to observe, that he felt himself fully satisfied with the state of the country, and with the loyal, orderly, and pacific dispositions which, with very few exceptions, the people had universally manifested. However, from the increased strength of France, and the extended line of coast subject to her power, he thought it wise to support the establishment proposed, and he was the more readily disposed to accede to that proposition, from understanding that it would not be attended with any material addition to the public burthens.

Mr. Cartwright perfectly agreed in the opinion of the hon. mover of the address, that the best way of rendering the blessings of peace permanent was, to be prepared for any exigency; and when the conduct of the French government was considered, and when the character of the man by whom that government was administered, was taken into account, caution and preparation on our part became essentially necessary. With such considerations in view, ministers were highly culpable in so precipitately disarming; nothing so sudden had occurred on any former peace, when it could have been done with more safety; so reduced was our naval force at present, that we had not, in case of the renewal of hostilities, a sufficient fleet in commission to protect our ports, while the French government, taking advantage of the peace, seemed to devote its chief attention to the augmentation of her navy. After this country had consented to the cession of the Netherlands to France, and to yield to her the absolute control of Holland, it was inconsistent with the pacific and prudent policy which ministers professed, to have presented such a remonstrance respecting Switzerland, as rumour described: however he might deplore the sufferings of that brave people, he could not approve of such an interference on our part; it was a foolish unnecessary provocation to war, or must be attended, as it had been, if rumour could be credited, with a pusillanimous retraction. Considering all the circumstances of the empire, the state of Europe, and the prodigious talents of the man who wielded the power of France, he could not help regretting that he was not met by the exalted abilities of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt), who was now unfortunately absent. He was sure the country would go with him in lamenting the loss which the public interest must sustain from the absence of that illustrious character.

Sir John Wrottesley said, that conceiving the situation of the times extremely perilous, and that the imprudence of the present ministers led in a great measure to that situation, he could not forbear to censure those ministers. The period which had passed since the conclusion of peace had been productive of many important events; but he much feared, that amongst them could not be reckoned the improvement of our commerce and revenue. It seemed that ministers now began to see the ambitious spirit of France; recent events were, indeed, sufficient to convince the most incredulous, that peace was not so secure; that the French government was not so pacifically inclined as was not long since confidently stated. Within a short time, that government was seen arrogantly dictating to the Emperor, annexing Parma to her already overgrown territory, and audaciously interfering to deprive the gallant Swiss of the right of establishing their liberties, an act that ranked among the most atrocious that modern history presented. It was, indeed, stated that ministers remonstrated against this proceeding. If ministers did so, he trusted they would lay a copy of that remonstrance on the table of the House, and that it would appear to be such a one as the nation could be proud of, even though it had not produced the desired effect; for Switzerland was now over-run by above 40,000 French troops, and its best patriots were consigned to the dungeon, condemned to share the fate of Touissaint. In such a state of affairs, he most ardently wished that those abilities could be called forth which lately directed the administration of our government; that those talents which once preserved the country, might again come forward to save it. The occasion was not less pressing, and, judging from experience, he was encouraged to hope, that the known disinterestedness of that right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) would not at this crisis desert him; that when his country was in danger, he would attend to the call of his countrymen.

Mr. Pytches said, he had never heard or read any speech from the throne that would more properly assimilate to a salmagundi. It was composed of such a mélange of ingredients and taste, so much of every thing, that it was hard to say which was predominant. In one place it spoke of the rapid increase of commerce, manufactures, and connexions, as the happy results of peace; and in the next, it intimated a propensity to violate peace, as the only mode to promote that prosperity. That sentiment seemed to be approved by some gentlemen who had spoke on this question; but he hoped no man would come forward unfeelingly to call for the support of that House on the renovation of war. Melancholy prophesies were set forth upon trivial occasions; and the country was now prepared to expect that peace was extremely doubtful. He had not the most distant idea, however, that the French government had any hostile intentions towards this country, nor was it consistent with the dignity of Great Britain to express such an idea; but if it was conceived, that on the part of France any violation of the treaty of Amiens had taken place, let them be politely and gently reminded of the circumstance, and he had no doubt but the matter would be rectified. He believed it would be allowed that every man's duty was, to make his own existence comfortable; so it was with nations. Dr. Johnson had said, that the sensation of fear was given us for our protection against danger, and upon this ground, he presumed, was founded the frequency of alarm. No nation, he believed, in this respect had more of the woman in its feelings than Britain, for she was constantly pregnant with apprehensions, and daily delivered of bastard alarms; and those who professed to attend with the greatest solicitude for her safety, instead of infusing salutary cordials and administering wholesome warmth, healed her in a manner to produce all the cold qualms of a mischievous abortion. We were told in the speech that peace was uncertain, and that war was deprecated; but as to the result, we were left to think for ourselves. We were taught to understand, by the supporters of the address, that we were menaced with new dangers, and that nothing would ward off the blow but ruinous and depopulating war. To such a principle he could not assent, so long as it was avertible by fair and honourable expedient; and as to that heterogeneous composition called the speech, he reprobated it as a piece of bad machinery, and servile adulation which every good monarch should execrate and forbid: as the offspring of vassallage, which ministers kidnapped and occupied as an artifice to pledge the House to their measures.

Mr. Fox—Sir; I should not have risen so early in the debate, if it had not been for some expressions that had fallen from gentlemen opposite, which render it necessary for me to enter into an explanation of my reasons for giving my cordial support to the address. There is, I confess, one expression in his majesty's speech, referring to the blessings which are to be found in the union with Ireland, to which I cannot assent. I, for one, who disapproved of that measure when it took place, desire most distinctly to be understood, as not by my vote of this night giving any sanction to it. There is another material part of the address, to which, though I cannot conceive the least objection, yet as it is explained by the hon. mover, would be extremely objectionable indeed. It is stated by him that his majesty recommends, and that we approve, the idea of extending our military establishments. Sir, his majesty's speech relates to no military establishment whatever, but that which is best calculated to give security to the kingdom. Those who, when the question is brought forward, shall be of opinion that large military establishments are necessary for the security of the kingdom, will state their reasons; and those who with me think that small establishments are better adapted, not only for the continuance of peace, but for the better enabling us to renew war, should it be necessary, will have the same opportunity of expressing their sentiments; but till the question is before the House, I see no reason why we should give an opinion one way or the other. One hon. gentleman seems to think his majesty's speech of too pacific a nature. He says, what! are we to hold this pacific language towards France, when she has done every thing in her power to irritate this country? Instead of such observations as these, I should have expected that he would have given us some particulars of the irritations he alludes to, and have shown us that we ought to have taken some steps to resent them, which his majesty's ministers have neglected. Another hon. gentleman is of opinion, that something of a more warlike tone might have been desirable in his majesty's speech, and he states, at the same time, that our manufactories are not in the condition which has been so sanguinely described. For myself, I shall give no opinion on the subject. I hope the hon. gentleman is mistaken; but whatever be the case, of this I am certain, that there is only one wish in the House and the country, that our internal situation should be such as by the speech it is described. Undoubtedly there are circumstances in the state of Europe which cannot fail to excite considerable alarm; but I hope there is no reason to be alarmed about the prosperity of our manufactures and commerce. Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that they had suffered decay, I hope no one can for a moment conceive the absurd idea that we could better our commercial and manufacturing interests by plunging again into war.—With regard to the objections to the address, they will be considered in a different way by different sides of the House. Those who defended the treaty of peace, will defend it still on the same principles which induced them to give it their approbation, and they will naturally view the objections to the address as frivolous and inconclusive. Those, on the other hand, who contended that they would not have made peace on the terms which the treaty contained, will be anxious to break a peace which they would not have made, and to renew a war which they wished to continue. But it may be said, that war would not now be renewed on the same principles on which it was formerly prosecuted, and that new causes of war had occurred since the treaty of peace was concluded. I cannot appeal to the House, for the decision took place in a former parliament; but I can appeal to many gentlemen who now hear me, to consider what the principles were on which they approved the peace, and whether any thing has taken place since the treaty was concluded which would authorize them to give their vote on the present occasion for breaking the treaty and recommencing hostilities. Supposing war to be renewed, gentlemen would do well to reflect in what manner hostilities would be conducted. Supposing a determination were taken to renew the war, it is obvious that our means of annoying the enemy would consist simply in retaking the places which by the treaty we had agreed to cede, or in retaining those still in our hands. Now, Sir, I say distinctly, that to violate the treaty of peace for such an object as this (and under the present circumstances no other object could be obtained) would be to place the ministers of this country and the members of the last parliament who had approved of the treaty in a situation to excite the ridicule of all Europe. The continuance of peace, I do contend, is infinitely desirable; I feel its importance in the strongest manner. Adverse, however, as I am to the renewal of hostilities, I do not mean to assert that no circumstances may have followed the peace which would fully justify ministers in refusing to comply with its provisions. I am not ashamed to avow an opinion for which I have not unfrequently been exposed to ridicule, and now explicitly to declare, that I consider the preservation of national honour to be almost the only legitimate cause of war. This doctrine I hold on the plain principle, that honour is directly and inseparably connected with self-defence. If it can be proved to me that the national honour has been insulted, or the national dignity disgraced, I will without hesitation declare my opinion, which is, this would be a fair, legitimate cause of recommencing hostilities. I must, however, hear a very strong case made out, before I can give my vote for replunging the country in those disasters which a calamitous contest had produced, and from which we were so recently delivered. Though I contend that honour is the only legitimate foundation of war, I do not mean to deny that other circumstances may come in aid of its force. In the present circumstances of Europe, I see no ground of war, so far as this country is concerned. There never was a period when every consideration of the soundest policy more strongly suggested the propriety of cultivating the continuance of peace. Without referring to the calamities of the last ten years, I ask gentlemen, fairly, whether in pursuing this policy, the country ever had more fair play? There are some persons who affect to entertain a dread of the French navy; but it is hardly possible to believe any one serious in indulging any alarm on this subject. As to the acts of the French government indicating a spirit of hostility to the interests of this country, I shall at present say nothing. They are not now before the House, and may be better animadverted on at another time if any real ground of complaint actually exist. It is my firm conviction, that there is on the part of the French people, as well as the French government, a strong desire to restore their commerce to new activity, and their manufactures to new life; and this, I believe, is the field in which, if any contest is to be carried on betwixt the two countries, they wish the dispute to be conducted. Of the result of such a rivalry we have very little room for apprehension. We have got so much the start of them, that we must take the lead; and, if they had the start of us, our superiority is so great that we could not fail speedily to overtake them. In this contest we should be certain of victory, and every intermediate step in our progress would only afford new facilities for increasing our superiority, and augmenting our improvement. It would be absurd, indeed, to pretend that this fair prospect will not be marred; but of this I am perfectly convinced, that it must be a very strong case which would justify the recommencement of hostilities, instead of employing our resources in cultivating the arts of peace. Is there a man in this House, or in this country, who, after the disasters which have been sustained during the progress of a wild and destructive contest, would again renew a contest with France, without any support but that derived from the co-operation of a few German princes, whose troops might be subsidized to engage in our cause? I trust that so extravagant a project will not again be adopted. If, contrary to every suggestion of expediency and every dictate of policy, it should be embraced, it requires little political sagacity to foresee that the result will be incalculably disastrous. The first and grand object which we ought to have in view is security; but there can be no true security which is not upheld by honour: there can be no true dignity which is not supported by character. An hon. gentleman, however, finds a new ground of war in the character of the French government. He is surprised to find it not so friendly or conciliating as he expected at the time the treaty was concluded. Did the hon. gentleman really expect that the French government was henceforth to entertain towards this country no feelings but those of friendship? Did he imagine that we might expect from it every interchange of civility and kindness, that our government would find in it a powerful and disinterested ally? If such were the hon. gentleman's ideas, I confess myself at a loss to know on what they were grounded. There was certainly nothing in the language employed at the time when the merits of the treaty were under discussion, to countenance this supposition. The very reverse was the impression which every part of the discussion was calculated to inspire. By those high in office a very different prospect was held out to the House and the country. A noble lord opposite (Hawkesbury) made use of a remarkable expression, when describing the situation in which the peace left us with relation to the other powers of Europe. He said that the continent was in "a very unsatisfactory state," a sort of language by no means calculated to suggest any ideas of friendship or cordiality on the part of the French government. The immense aggrandisement of French influence and French power is doubtless a subject of deep regret, and no man laments it more than I do. It must be lamented by every Englishman, and this very aggrandisement is with me a grand cause of accusation against the late ministers, by whose obstinacy and misconduct it was obtained. But, Sir, let gentlemen who hold this language reflect, that with the knowledge of the continent being in the state which the noble lord described, the treaty of peace received the approbation of the House and the country. Who was not aware that the power of France was increased to a degree which naturally excited jealousy on the part of this country? Who did not take this into his contemplation when called upon to give his vote on the merits of the treaty of peace? No one pretends that this was not known; but, knowing this, seeing this, stating this, it is impossible for any rational man to deny that these causes for war, drawn from the state of the continent, which were now so much insisted upon, were known at the time when the treaty of peace was sanctioned; and to hold them up now as grounds of renewing the contest betwixt the two countries, was equally impolitic and unjust. There indeed remains a question how far the state of the continent, in consequence of intermediate events, was more unsatisfactory than at the time when peace was concluded. These acts, whatever their nature may be, are not now before the House, and therefore I shall not now speak to them. A great deal has been said about the disposition of the people of this country in favour of a renewal of the war. This I have no hesitation in affirming to be completely false. Of all the fictitious crimes which ever were imputed to the people of England, and certainly they have often been accused of crimes of which they were incapable, even in thought, I pronounce this to be one of the most groundless. The origin of this calumny it is not difficult to trace. It arises from the coalition of some newspapers, who affect to hold out this as the real disposition of the people. Their motives for such representations may be various. They may wish to gratify spleen, or to increase their circulation, by contriving something to excite the curiosity of their readers. I do believe in my conscience that the people of this country are, at this moment, as eager to cultivate the blessings of peace, as at any former period. Mankind have been too often sacrificed to the ambition of princes, and to the intrigues of parties; but if the publishers of newspapers are to be the means of plunging the nation again into a destructive contest, it will be the most base and ignoble cause in which a people was ever engaged. But we are told that a most considerable body in this country are strongly actuated with a desire that the war should be renewed. The class to which I allude, are the commercial interest in all the capital trading towns throughout the country, but more especially in the metropolis. To this representation I am not disposed to give my assent: the merchants in this country are too liberal and too respectable a body of men to have any wish to replunge their country into all those calamities, from which she has just begun to emerge, from any hope of gain arising from contracts with government, or from any of the other means of emolument which spring out of a state of war, and which to one class are the sources of aggrandisement, while to the community they are pregnant with misery. If, however, the fact be as gentlemen represent it, I should feel disposed almost to wish the reverse of those ages of splendid achievements which distinguished the history of antiquity. If human beings are to perish to gratify any passion of our nature, I should rather that their blood should flow to gratify the romantic ambition of an Alexander, than to fill the coffers of a cold calculating body of unfeeling merchants. Let us not be accused, Sir, of a wish to renew those disasters which for ten years have desolated Europe, to open afresh those wounds which have so long afflicted suffering humanity; let us not disturb the peace of the continent when our interference can produce no beneficial effect. When there is not a single power ready to second our efforts, let us not by a rash step forfeit those blessings which are indispensably and eternally connected with a state of peace. Great enterprises, which might in my opinion with much more propriety be styled rash actions, are flattering in prospect, but disastrous in the result, spe læta, eventu tristia. We are now in a state of domestic tranquillity, of flattering internal prosperity, and when our commerce as far as the nature of human affairs justifies anticipation, may become daily more extended.—There is another point on which I shall make one or two observations. At the commencement of the late war, the House, and I believe I may add the country, were as it were hurried into the contest by the expectation that the struggle was one which would not be arduous during its continuance, or protracted in its duration. Fatal experience has, however, demonstrated the fallacy of such anticipations. I hope, Sir, we shall not again be hurried into any new war on the expectation of its only lasting one campaign. If we again engage in war, it is surely important to weigh well the nature and consequence of such a step, and I trust that ministers will feel this importance before they give up the certain benefits of repose for the uncertain chances of war.—With respect to the present administration, it is almost unnecessary for me to say, that I have no sort of connexion with them. I thank them for having made peace, and I hope they approve the treaty which they formerly concluded. If we have made peace, I trust it is in the true spirit of peace. I do not mean to accuse them of any design of concluding a treaty under peculiar circumstances, and afterwards availing themselves of some change to refuse a compliance with its conditions, to undo all that has been done, to retain and retake all the settlements which were previously agreed to be ceded. The power of France is unquestionably too great; but it is not increased to such a degree since the peace was concluded as to justify a rupture. The interference of France in the German indemnities is a subject of complaint. Did ministers not know, Sir, that there was an interference naturally to be expected? By not being parties to the treaty of Luneville, did we not know that France would interfere in the subject of the German indemnities, and what reasonable ground of complaint now exists? The language of the late ministers was explicit: they told us that it was not for the interests of this country to treat in conjunction with Austria. She had consulted her separate interests, and we were freed from our engagements. As we were unwilling to share in the advantages, we had no right to complain of consequences easily foreseen, and of effects easily anticipated. France, as might have been expected, did interfere in the arrangement of the German indemnities, and Russia has been induced to join in the same object. I do not mean to go into any minute illustration on this subject. I content myself with a general observation, which is, that this interference is in some points of view not unfavourable to the interests of this country, as they may be collaterally affected. I have only to conclude with expressing my ardent hope, that peace is the first object of the government, as I am convinced it is the strongest wish of the people.

Mr. Canning said, he concurred in the approbation given to the address by the hon. member who preceded him, but with a variation upon some points of opinion. The first object was, to know what line of conduct he might be deemed to support in the vote he was about to give. Whatever some bold men might think proper to assert, in maintaining that war was the remedy for the evils that surrounded us, all must concur, or at least a great majority, in approving the system of preparation which ministers were adopting. The hon. gentleman who spoke last seemed to doubt the expediency and necessity of our increasing our naval and military establishments. But whether the House was ultimately to sanction them, he considered as matter for future discussion; and gentlemen were pledged by the present address, to support them no farther than the circumstances of the country might require. He, for one, gave the ministers credit for the peace they had concluded; but by doing so, they had not done every thing; all was not done, if every thing was conciliation on our part; all was not done, if we gave our rival to understand that we were ready to submit to insult, and were not disposed to take advantage of any ebullition manifested in the country in favour of standing up for the rights of other nations. The speech from the throne had not alluded to any of those notorious transactions on the continent which occupied so great a portion of the public attention, and only exhorted us to repose confidence in the wisdom of his majesty's councils. If, however, the interference of those councils in some foreign proceedings were really such as had been represented, they, in his judgment, afforded no great grounds of confidence in their future wisdom. There was no man, for instance, who did not sympathize in the sufferings of the people of Switzerland, and rejoice in the gallant example of spirit and love of independence which they exhibited. They must be peculiarly so to Englishmen, who knew not how soon they might be called upon to exercise the same virtues. It was, however, to be hoped, that our government did not instigate that unfortunate country to resistance; and if our interference was such as public notoriety proclaimed it, certainly no remonstrance was ever so unwise. He thought it of importance to know by whom and to whom that interference was made. It was evident, that the feelings of all ranks of people in this country were in unison with those of the Swiss: but a wise administration should not suffer itself to be led or influenced by such feelings on every occasion; and if our remonstrance was precipitate, it did injury instead of good. The blow was then already struck. We had no alliance on the continent to back our interference—Austria was quite unprepared or unequal to the attempt, and we could not expect to call armies with the same facility that men might call a coach from a stand. Our interference, therefore, was ill-advised and unnecessary if it was made, and could not be attended with any moral or political good whatever. The Swiss were already conquered, and the business was done. Did the ministers accompany their remonstrance with a declaration, that if it should be ineffectual, a war would be the alternative? Upon this subject we had no official communication. In some cases there was nothing more proper than secrecy, but he was not disposed to approve of it as applied to the people governed. There should on all such occasions be a communion of sentiments between the king and his people. When the preliminaries of the late treaty with France were under discussion, we were congratulated by persons in high situations, on the circumstance that our intercourse with the continent would in future be relaxed, if not suspended; but that, at the same time, it was our determination no longer to submit to insult or encroachment. Such was then the impression, and now we had a right to know upon what system we were going; whether we were to interfere in the internal affairs of the continent, or whether we stand alone, mindful only of our own concerns, dis-severed from those of the other powers; or pay, like our ancestors, a due regard to the general interests of Europe. Some thought that we ought to stand or fall by ourselves; others (Mr. Wilberforce) that we were "too honest" for any kind of interference. For his part, he could not much admire that superabundance of honesty which some gentlemen were content to state in their places, and others, perhaps for different purposes, in popular harangues to assemblies and their constituents. The addresses and speeches to which he alluded, though they could not be regularly quoted in that House, must have made a strong impression on the public mind; and the country ought not to be suffered to run riot in the expectation of peace, while a system was pursuing, which must have a tendency to lead us into war.—With respect to the reliance to be placed on the general measures of administration, he professed himself a friend to recruiting an exhausted army and a dismantled navy in the face of an imposing adversary; although, unquestionably, some late proceedings left us to retrieve and repair, instead of keeping what we had. The incorporation of Piedmont with France was accompanied by the disbanding of our army; and the allotments of Germany was, perhaps, the effect of the dismantling of our navy. All our foreign acquisitions were, in fact, given up at the time that we should have kept the proportion with our adversary, of ship for ship, and man for man. Any contest that we could have now, was acknowledged to be not so much for power as for honour; but the worst method of upholding the latter, must be to let down the national spirit. He, for himself, had no disposition to go to war at present; but, from some speeches that he had heard delivered by persons in authority, he was to infer, that a decay of the national spirit was the cause of making peace. This, however, was a position which he was ready to deny: on the contrary, he maintained, that there never was a period when the people were more ready or more able to continue the war with vigour. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) seemed desirous of tracing all the difficulties of our situation to the late administration. He, on the other hand, contended, that the state in which they left the country, on retiring from office, was the reverse of being calamitous. He was ready to go through all the circumstances, point by point, and could scarcely restrain his indignation when it was asserted, that nothing but a desperate effort of patriotism could have induced any other set of gentlemen to succeed them. It was indeed true, that the country was then left involved in an extensive war, and that a war with the neutral powers was then in its commencement; yet, notwithstanding all this, there perhaps was never a situation which afforded more temptation to the wishes or ambition of those who were proposed to succeed them. An armament had already been proposed to meet the exigencies of the neutral war, and to bring it to a successful termination, and that armament effectually and gloriously put an end to it. The same administration had prepared and sent forth the Egyptian expedition, the success of which so materially contributed to the peace. He was very far from wishing to disparage the present ministry; yet it was but justice to say, that they succeeded to office with this great advantage in their favour, that, as the expeditions were crowned with success, they were in a condition to claim the merit of it; whereas, had they failed, they would not have been liable to any responsibility. As to the finances, he must remark, that all the supplies of the year had been previously provided for, the internal tranquillity was secured, and the remnant of party in a great measure disbanded. He said thus much, in justice to a set of men, to whom there was reason to ascribe the salvation of the country. Nothing could, therefore, be more desirable than the succession obtained by the present ministers. It remained then to consider, what reliance was to be placed on administration for their political conduct since their accession to power. There were only two points which struck him—the neutral war and the peace that they had concluded; but they were left by their predecessors the means of putting an end to the one, and its success naturally led, in its consequences, to the accomplishment of the other. With a view to this question, he would look how this country stood in relation to Russia. We had dispatched thither a very able minister; but immediately afterwards we found it a party to the plan of the German indemnities. In a short period, subsequently, Russia showed a disposition to interfere in preventing the annexation of Piedmont to France, and Piedmont was probably lost to the king of Sardinia in consequence of our refusal to join in the Russian interference. Thus far as to our grounds of reliance on ministers for their conduct in the neutral war. He next came to review their merit in concluding the late treaty. It was to be observed, that the House, by approving of that treaty, was not bound to it in all its parts. It had indeed been discussed, but never debated in its terms. The approbation given to it was not on the ground that the terms were advantageous, but on the idea held out that the peace would be durable. If, indeed, he had reason to conclude it would be lasting, he felt no disposition to quarrel with the terms. These were examined, but not canvassed; and the country hailed the event with acclamation, in the hopes that it would be permanent. The disposition of France was then taken upon trust; but how was it now manifested in the present state of Europe? And let it be remembered, that the people might have acted otherwise, if they had known what was to happen. He was willing to agree to any thing which would add strength to the strength of the country; not so, however, to that which would strengthen rivalry, which would at length be turned against us when matured and invigorated—a rivalry—"qui auctum et reconditum promeret." France only waited for a favourable opportunity of showing that her emulation was not that of commerce, but extermination; and if it had not burst forth before, it was only because the means were wanting. He wished not to speak against a system of preparation, but must condemn any thing that tended first to lull the people, and afterwards suddenly call upon them for vigorous exertion. He wished at once to excite a steady conduct, a persevering courage, and a disposition to take, not a little and contracted, but a great and comprehensive view of every interesting subject. He was an advocate for our having a ready, productive activity, not only capable of meeting particular emergencies, such as those of Switzerland and Malta, but to meet every danger to which we may be exposed—a vigilant, waking activity, diffusing itself over every part of Europe.

Lord Hawkesbury observed, that the honourable members who had discussed the question now before the House, had all agreed to assent to the address, but upon grounds that were different, some of them opposite, to each other. He could not agree with the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Fox) in some points that he had stated, nor with his right hon. friend who spoke last in others. He agreed in many of the sentiments which had been delivered by Mr. Fox; but he did not agree with him, that the events which had happened since the signing of the preliminary treaty, might not, in the opinion of many persons, create a material difference in the relative situation of the two countries; for certainly France did not then stand in the situation in which it stood now. In stating this, he did not mean to enter at present on the question, whether it was wise in his majesty's ministers to conclude the peace on the terms in which it was concluded, nor to enter into any comparison between the events as they stood then, with the events that have happened since the peace. He had said, at the conclusion of the peace, that it was right then to close the account of the war, and that, with all the conditions upon which it was made, it would be wise to look always on the farther encroachments of France with jealousy and watchfulness; and he had said also, that much might depend upon the chance there was of success in endeavouring to stop it. He wished not to apply this to the present case; but the distinction which that observation was intended to convey, was material. His right hon. friend had asked, what the system was on which ministers had acted, and whether they had relinquished the system on which they had concluded the treaty? To this he answered, that they acted now precisely on the same system as they acted when the definitive treaty was concluded, and that the principle which was then avowed, was the principle which would govern them; it was a principle which was perfectly clear, intelligible, and practicable. That principle was stated by the hon. gentleman opposite with perfect fairness—it was, that as far as respects the interests of this country, the peace was made on terms that were honourable, in as much as it preserved the integrity of the British dominions; and it was added, at the time of the discussion of that treaty, that, as far as it respected the state of the continent, many things were left under circumstances that were unsatisfactory, and ministers had expressed regret upon that occasion. The principle on which his majesty's ministers justified themselves then was this: that to continue the war for continental objects, without the prospect of continental support, would be absurd; and that consequently it was better to take the chance of peace than the chance of war—that if we were to have the alternative, it was desirable for us to try peace, when, in continental objects, our expectations had ceased.—This was the principle on which ministers then acted; it was the principle on which they now acted, and on which they would always be ready to act and to justify themselves. His right hon. friend had alluded to some general topics, and referred to the opinions of other persons as to the system which ministers ought to pursue, and who did not agree with ministers. But he had mistaken some sentiments which were uttered by him (lord Hawkesbury). It was stated, as if something was said on the discussion of the definitive treaty, that it was the policy of this country to abstract itself from the continent. That was not the principle then avowed; but he remembered having said something very different himself on that occasion. He had said, it was not the system of this country to abstract itself from continental concerns, and attend exclusively to its own resources and internal affairs; he should have thought, if some respectable persons had not expressed a contrary opinion, that the case was too clear for any doubt to be entertained upon it. He owned, that to a country so large, and territories so extensive, commerce so great, and interests so complicated, it was impossible to apply, with good sense, the principle of abstracting itself, and to attend to mere internal policy of its own, distinct from all concern with the affairs of other states, upon all occasions. Those who should ever attempt to guide the affairs of this country upon a contracted system, would soon find it a policy which they must abandon, or sacrifice the real interests of this country. He might object to this system on a more large and extensive principle than any that he had hitherto mentioned; but it was not his intention to be diffuse in what he had to submit to the House: he knew that he might allude to what had been the practice of his majesty's ministers; that was a subject on which he felt more delicacy than otherwise he would have difficulty in the detail. He thought, however, that the affairs of states, like the affairs of individuals, took their course from the circumstances and importance in which they stood. States that were in size and consequence of a subordinate kind, had to follow a rule of policy different from that which would be a wise one to a great and important state. Inferior or subordinate states, like inferior and subordinate individuals, had to look chiefly to maintenance and support, often little more than preservation of existence. But individuals of rank and station, of high condition in life, had the support and assistance of others to attend to; the concerns of others, and interests of others to consider, and, in some cases, to provide for. So in states. Great and powerful states had to look to many things besides their own immediate and internal interest; both policy and justice required that they should attend to other objects; for the interest of a great and powerful state was often combined with those who were inferior to it, as well as in endeavouring to set some limits to another power; and therefore it was to him a matter of surprise, that any person of an enlarged understanding should suppose that it could, under any circumstances, be the interest of this country to pursue an abstract system, unconnected with any part of the affairs of the continent. This, he presumed, would be an answer to that part of the speech of his right hon. friend, which tended to imply, that the policy of his majesty's ministers was that of an abstract insulated nature. But still there might be circumstances that ought to govern them. It was fresh in the recollection of all who heard him, that this policy of attending to expediency had governed this and other states in the concerns of kingdoms—one of a recent date; it was the case of a nation, not much less than that of France itself in point of territory at the time—more populous than several of the then independent states of Europe; and yet that vast nation had been blotted out of the map of Europe, as an independent state. It must be obvious that he alluded to Poland. Upon that occasion, there was in that House and in this country, but one feeling; and yet it had been held, not only by ministers, but also by a considerable body of those who opposed them, that this nation ought not to go to war on that ground. He did not believe that any considerable body of men blamed ministers for their conduct on that occasion. Why? Because whatever pretence it might furnish afterwards for continuing a contest that might be inevitable, it was unadvisable at that time, however desirable; because it was impossible for us to have interfered, with any chance of success without continental support. Another transaction was to be found in the history of Europe, which was more immediately connected with the direct interest of this country on the subject of continental policy: it was that of the conduct of William 3rd, under all the good qualities of that prince and his admired general policy, and when the political system of this country was established on the wisest footing; he meant the great point by which the ambition of Louis 14th appeared on the death of the king of Spain on the war of succession. It was then declared by William to be the policy of this country, under all the circumstances, not to interfere alone in that question, so as to involve us in a war, without continental support; and this was the opinion of a prince, who, from his education and habits, was certainly prone to an interference in continental affairs. In a word, it was his opinion, that without continental support this country ought not to interfere in continental concerns on the ground of expediency; but this was a totally distinct thing from any abstract insulated policy. It was a policy founded on the reason of the thing, arising out of circumstances over which we had no control. With regard to the circumstances of the present moment, and what would have been wise for his majesty's ministers to do, that was, as he had said already, a question of more delicacy than difficulty for him to speak upon. He should, however, speak in general terms upon that topic. He would say, that the conduct of his majesty's ministers was governed by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, by a due consideration of the value of the objects, of the then peace, and of the state of the continent at the time. Putting the first point for a moment out of the question, many observations might be made on the state of the continent. It might be well worth consideration, whether, if they thought that the objects themselves were such as would deserve the renewal of hostilities, and we were determined to take that course, it was probable, at this moment, we should have any effectual support? This was a point which must be governed by a variety of considerations; and he had no difficulty in saying, that although, after a war such as that which had been closed with the magnified state of France, peace was, under all circumstances, desirable, yet he should have rejoiced, and he believed that every reflecting man in the country would have rejoiced, if, by a wise, temperate, and firm conduct in the other powers of Europe, a barrier could have been put to farther encroachment; but, at present, from points, some of which had been foreseen at the time of making peace—he meant particularly some questions as to the indemnities, which must give to France advantages in all continental discussions of this kind—many evils arose which were unavoidable. It was not necessary for him, at this time, to consider the question of indemnities; though there was much injustice, yet perhaps something of the kind was inevitable. It was a system of indemnity, so called, and nothing more. But so it happened, that the moment the discussion was opened, France had it in her power to hold out immediate advantages to some states which made them less vigilant than they should be over the general interests of Europe: so that in this respect a system was established which was not to the interest of this country. He had, however, cautioned the House on this point: yet most persons agreed, that the present circumstances did not warrant a renewal of the contest: but what was most material to be considered was this, if continental connexions must be had with a view to such a renewal of hostilities, if it should ever become necessary, by a hasty and a premature renewal we should lose all the advantages of a well-concerted system. This was not a point on which he wished to hold out any expectation to the House; he could not with propriety do so if he had any grounds for it; but the House would feel the propriety of the principle which he had laid down as a rule to guide this proceeding. If we had only a desire for the continuance of peace, this principle was correct; it was likewise correct even in the event of hostilities being unavoidable. He wished to be most distinctly understood, as maintaining the opinion, that under the present circumstances of this country and of Europe, if peace can be maintained, consistently with honour to ourselves, under a proper defensive system, it is, under all circumstances, better than a renewal of the war, even connected with a consideration of all the events which have happened. His right hon. friend had stated some words of his, used on the discussion of the definitive treaty, respecting the national spirit of this country at that time. Now, he did not state the sentiment in the insulated manner mentioned by his right hon. friend; yet he did state then, and he believed now, that if a sufficient case were made out of injustice to us, and not only of injustice, but also with a reasonable expectation of success, the spirit of the people was fully equal to any contest in which we might be engaged; yet, that after ten years war, carried on so extensively, the spirit of the people did require, in some degree recruiting; and therefore, under all the circumstances, peace, if made with honour, it would have been wise to make, even on terms less advantageous than might have been expected at the first year of a war. But this did not apply exclusively to this country; it was applicable to the whole continent of Europe, which consequently required recruiting, to give a chance of success in the contest, an object deserving great regard. He was one of the last men in the country to hold out desponding language. He thought he had a manifestation of public sentiment upon this occasion, as upon other occasions, which proved, that if a renewal of hostilities became inevitable, however desirable peace might be, the spirit of the people would be fully equal to the contest. With regard to the allusion of his right hon. friend to a supposed transaction by which the honour of this country was committed, he could say, that no step had been taken which committed or forfeited the honour of this country. He would correct the statement of his right hon. friend on another point, for he seemed to have gone upon an idea, that the resistance of Switzerland, was instigated by this country, or that after the commencement of that resistance, his majesty's government interfered and held out encouragement to that resistance. He thought it important to say, that no part of this event was instigated by the government of this country. Two hon. gentlemen who spoke early in the debate, seemed to look at the present situation of Europe with dissatisfaction. They had stated that some events had taken place which might have been foreseen; they seemed to distrust the firmness and sufficiency of his majesty's ministers to conduct the affairs of the country at the present crisis; and they accompanied this observation with a reference to the abilities of a right hon. gentleman, who was prevented by indisposition from being in his place this day. In every thing they could say, with reference to the abilities and the services he has performed to his country, he will find no person more ready than myself to agree with them. I certainly approve of the measures of that right hon. gentleman. I have proved it by voting for them; but it is not always in the power of the greatest abilities to command success. The events which happened toward the close of that administration is a proof of it; and therefore I felt the more surprised, when my right hon. friend stated circumstances as if the condition of this country was at the time of the close of that administration, the most flourishing, the best calculated for the continuance of war, or for the making of peace, that was ever known. With regard to that event, I know that no motive did actuate him (Mr. Pitt) in quitting office, but a sense of duty—a matter of opinion on a great and important question. But does my right hon. friend recollect the state of this country then, with a great combination of almost all Europe against us. Does he recollect the dismay felt as to various events, when the present ministers succeeded to that administration? I allude to the question with the Northern powers, which led to the battle of Copenhagen. It is well known, that other powers were strongly attached to what was called the neutral code; and even after the battle of Copenhagen, and the death of the emperor Paul, no point could be attended with more difficulty than that question was. With regard to the expedition to Egypt, no man applauds that expedition more than I do, or thinks, that, under all the circumstances, it was not the wisest disposition that could be made of our force at the time; but to state it as my hon. friend has done, as one in which the event was uncertain, considering the comparative force of the French, the difficulties which our force had to encounter, and the whole of the detail of that expedition, I own astonishes me. If my right hon. friend consults the military officers employed in that expedition, he will find it was not at the commencement of the present administration an event that had any certainty about it. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that our military force has been imprudently disbanded, and our fleets dismantled; but the truth is, that never in the first year of a peace was the establishment so considerable as it is now, and particularly the navy, nor was there ever a period in which the navy of France was so reduced. My right hon. friend states, that what he looks to, is not the terms of peace between the two countries, but the animus. Now if we look to the animus alone, and are not to have peace until we were satisfied upon that particular, we never should have had peace at all. I think it is manifest, from the terms of the three last treaties of peace concluded with France, compared with their conduct, that at the very time of signing, they meditated a breach of them. The animus is therefore out of the case. To preserve peace, and to give to the country an opportunity of improving its great resources, will be the policy of ministers; but they cannot look to the events which have lately happened, without calling on the House and on the country, to entertain a spirit of watchfulness. Our policy has been, and will be, to resist unjust demands made by any foreign power, and to preserve peace as long as we can, consistently with that policy.

Mr. Windham:—I do not rise to make any observations upon the general doctrine advanced by the noble lord so far from thinking it unsatisfactory, I shall be content with even less than it holds forth. My purpose in rising is, to offer a few words upon the general state of the country, and upon the address. Considering the speech from the throne, and the address, which is its echo, as the speech and address of the minister, our situation is alarming indeed, when, on the very first day of a session, we are told of insults and strides on the part of France, which require extraordinary jealousy and precaution; but if these things have not been foreseen, if this be the first impression which government has had of them, then are we lost indeed! It seems that an hon. gentleman's powers (Mr. Fox) have lost all their energy when touching upon the French revolution; the character of his mind has also lost all its feeling. At its commencement he told us there was nothing extraordinary in the French revolution, that there was nothing so simple and easy in a state as a change from one form of government to another. The ship (said he) is in stays; she is now on a tack, but you need not be afraid, she will sail safe into port without falling foul of you. This was his language in the beginning of the revolution. But when this, "stupendous monument of human wisdom" was raised, then he thought it was of importance to us; for in these great edifices, if the foundation be not good, and the walls be not perpendicular, they may fall and spread ruin wide around them. At the beginning, it was as innocent a thing as ever came into the world; it was one of those things that become vicious by ill treatment; and yet, when grown up, it has destroyed all before it, as well that which did not, as that which did offend it. Those that lay in its way, and those who did not wilfully resist, it alike overthrew. We may, indeed apply the words of Shakespeare, as an image of his conduct — 'You beat the blind boy, and the blind boy beats the post.' Since the peace, France has conquered Piedmont; she has conquered even the hon. gentleman's old friend, the duke of Tuscany; and yet, he says, she is only a commercial rival. I should be glad to know how long the two countries are to go on in this way of commercial rivalry? Has France no power to engage in any other sort of rivalry? Is any man prepared to say, that she has not? What, after country has fallen upon country; when messenger comes in upon messenger, as in the last scene of a tragedy, to announce some new calamity; and these events so rapidly follow each other, that the news is stale when a day old, is it for the hon. gentleman to rise and say, that France is only a commercial rival! When I say that the country betrays every mark of dissolution, when I represent it as going the way of all flesh, and when I am asked, why I think so? I am disposed to ask those who doubt me, why they think otherwise. That I think is the more natural question of the two, and I illustrate it thus: suppose a man for some years in another world should inquire of a person recently arrived from this, about the state of this family of Europe; he would be told, that of the twenty nations which he formerly knew, there were only four or five remaining in an independent state: that Flanders was annexed to France; Prussia, though nominally independent, entirely under her influence; Spain, her vassal; Portugal, at her mercy; Genoa, in name and reality, the property of France; Switzerland just fallen; and Modena, Parma, in short, the whole of Italy, all gone: that Austria was so feeble she dare not move a step, and the whole of Germany partitioned and divided; would not such a person, if an Englishman, after being told all this, pause before he put the question upon the fate of England? Would it not be more natural for him to suppose that it had shared the fate of the rest, than that it should have survived such general ruin? This, then, is the case, as matter of mere calculation upon the number of states; but how much more strong does it become, when, in addition to the number of fallen powers, it is considered that the infection is of that nature, that the more it has destroyed, the more able it becomes to destroy more. The cases are precisely the same. The proof, then, is not upon us to shew, that we have not perished, but upon the others to show why we have not. It is merely a question of Cocker, namely, if in a given time France has destroyed so many powers, in what length of time will she be able to destroy the remainder? But the case is stronger still; for not only has she the same force to destroy, but she possesses it in an increased proportion, which is inversely as the resistance; so that France goes on to the attainment of her object in a ratio compounded of these two quantities, her power to destroy, which is equal, and the quantity of resistance, which is constantly diminishing. See then at what rate France has gone for the last six months, and you will find at what rate she will go in future. This is that compound increasing rate which I have mentioned, unless it be said that she moves only at that rate in time of peace, which enables her to take an extraordinary start; a case which I shall leave to others to explain. But it may be said, that the peace will stop it. As well might it be said, that the conclusion of the last century could stop it. Take out the map of Europe, and measure not leagues, but climates and degrees, and see how much France possesses in Europe. Russia is a power of great extent, but nothing to France in population. France, including her own people, and those under her immediate influence, has the use of a population of between fifty and sixty millions, amounting to half the population of Europe. She has been always a more populous country than this, as her population amounted to twenty-four millions; but formerly there existed circumstances which counterbalanced this excess of population. Now, however, that counterbalance is destroyed, and we have the whole of her population against us, together with what we have lost and she has gained upon the continent. With respect to the nature and situation of territory, it may lay remote and detached, as that of Russia, which extends into the north of Asia, and so cannot be brought into effect. The population may also be timid and feeble, like the Asiatics, with whom we have been fighting; but is that the character of the people of France, or of the nations whom she has overthrown? Looking at this I must exclaim with Macbeth—

“Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud, Without our special wonder? You make me strange,
Even to the disposition that I owe,
When now I think you can behold such sights,
And keep the nat'ral ruby of your cheek,
When mine is blanch'd with fear.”

Such is the feeling with which I look at this part of our relative situation. Look now at the other side. The first effect of the peace was a reduction of our expense, and a great saving; as if our wealth was expected thereby to grow faster than the power of France, and consequently improve our situation; and with this view the reduction of our naval establishment, after the treaty of Amiens was so rapid, as to place us in our present perilous situation, to say no worse of it. This prospect of gain is, however, likely to fail us; for if they see that they keep us between high and low armaments they may do away all our savings, just as a man might spend as much on journies to Hounslow or Windsor as on one to Edinburgh. But if we are to weigh gold against the sword, and commerce against continental politics, and if trade should go on in a prosperous course will that satisfy the statesman? I shall always give merchants credit for their good wishes to the country, but on a question of this kind, they are not the best authority, as being interested parties. The merchants look to present gain; but they may be bad guardians of the country in relation to its future prosperity, just as tenants of church lands, who have short interests, are inattentive to their future improvement. I shall not, however, go into the detail of trade on this subject, but content myself with a general view which may be more correct. I ask then, by what rule or law of nations all trade shall centre in our ports, and France possess imperial power? I wish it to be considered, that France remaining as she is, may destroy its source, and break it up at once by a new war. France acts upon this ground; and with this view she has taken great naval and commercial stations in all parts of the world. She has proceeded as an engineer in the time of Louis 14th would have proceeded, choosing what fortresses it would be advisable to destroy, and what to keep and improve. In this spirit she forms her commercial establishments in every part of the world, and hangs every where upon the sources of our wealth. That these will soon grow up, is what no man can dispute. France may then prescribe to us in our commerce, and cut and carve out our trade with other nations as she shall think proper. This is the rivalry in which the hon. gentleman, as a declared supporter of the peace, sees no danger. He appeals to the trader, and not to the trade; the present trader may approve, because he may have an interest, but the ultimate system may be ruined. To say that France may not hereafter injure our navy or our trade, possessing as she does, such naval and commercial stations, no man can venture; and as our navy and our trade helped each other up, so they may help each other down. If, however, it should be asked, of what importance is this danger of rivalry in trade at a remote distance? to that I answer—we must consider that we are running a race with a wolf, who, though we may not be able to run him down, may turn short upon us. Now it may be said, to what does all this lead? To this I answer—it leads to a just sense and view of our internal situation, which is the source of all manly resolution and prudent conduct. In the alternative of peace or war, we cannot understand the reasons for the one but in the other. The reasons for war we have now found out in the peace. We are like the testy old bachelor, who took a wife, and exclaimed, “Aye, aye, now that I am married, I have found out what is the matter with me.” So with us, we have now discovered the reasons for war in the peace. We have always talked of these two states, as if, because they are opposite in their nature, they must have opposite effects; that if war was bad for the country, peace must be advantageous. There may be danger in both states. You may be so unprosperous in a war, that it may not be in your power to make peace. This was nearly the case of the last war, which was unsuccessful in relation to some of the objects assigned to it. In my view of it, however, it was not unsuccessful; for what I say is, that we are in a better situation than if it had never been undertaken. It has not, however, enabled us to make peace with France with safety, and in that view it has been unsuccessful, and left a cause for much anxiety. France is now of great power, with the means of increasing it. I suppose then that we thence understand our situation; that we are engaged with a rival who means our destruction, and to make its accomplishment the last of her Herculean labours. When the hon. member talked of the pacific disposition of France, and deprecated the wars of princes (but not one word about the wars of the first consul), I thought he had brought over some friendly remonstrance; for, says he, in what has France violated the treaty of Amiens? I did not think that any casuist would argue that there are not grounds for war exclusive of the treaty of Amiens, and that it is only a question of prudence. Now, if he had said, that, whatever might be the ambition of Buonaparté, the public opinion in France was pacific, and would control his design, this would be a security; but, in contemplating that “stupendous monument of human wisdom, the name of the people in that free country has never been once mentioned by the hon. gentleman. We see, then, that his ambition is not restrained by public opinion; and hence it has been able to make such havoc. But, so far as public opinion goes, when I consider the language and addresses presented to the first consul, as demonstrative of it, I must believe the accounts of well-informed people, who have lately returned from that country, all of whom assert, that the great sentiment there is the destruction of England, to which they ascribe all the ills that they have suffered; an idea which they have been taught to cherish by those who have so often inveighed against the late “unjust and unnecessary war,” as they have styled it.—Now, to come to the chain of commerce, credit, and capital; although the changes have been rung upon these three things as distinct, upon a nearer view they may be comprehended under the head of commerce singly, and it is at this that France aims. See, then, what she has done to attain it. Since the peace she has built thirteen ships of war, six of the line and seven frigates; and she has imported 10,000 ton of hemp, which is equal to a year's consumption of the British navy in time of war. Never was there a greater expedition than that which she sent to St. Domingo; and all this she has been enabled to do by British credit, and partly by British ships. Added to these, she is now preparing another expedition from Holland. We heard much at the time of the peace of the poverty of France, and her inability to engage in such undertakings; but we now find that she can avail herself of British credit to accomplish them. It was then argued, as if we might go on in our commerce quietly and unmolested; but she now sees that she can break up our system whenever she pleases. On the other hand, we also begin to understand our situation. Men who wished to stop these results have been called men of blood. disturbers of the Western family. A surgeon may advise an amputation without being a man of blood. The patient may wish it without being a man of blood. A kind sympathising husband and father may recommend these experiments without being monsters. No; those are the monsters, who, when the fond mother had by an exertion of her tenderness summoned up resolution to suffer an operation upon her child, and to comfort and encourage it by her presence, could revile her and say, see that unnatural mother holding her child while a barbarous surgeon mangles its tender limbs. Now, one does not like this language from the mother of revolutions. One does not like to hear this pious horror recommended by a revolution, with twenty others in its belly; a revolution which is like a certain piece of fire-work, that bursts in its ascent, and showers down a multitude of others. There is something in the boasted title of pacificator so ludicrous, that it excites contempt. It is like the cant slang so much in use with smugglers, robbers, and gypsies. With such people, smuggling is called a "free trade," "skipping a hedge," "moonshine," and "running away at night." I remember a set of thieves in Suffolk, who called every sort of plunder of the revenue, "hiding." So when the first consul marches 40,000 men into Switzerland, he calls it "settling their affairs." When he invaded Egypt, in breach of treaty with the Porte, he called it chastising the rebellious pachas. If any oppose his measures, they are called disturbers of the peace; but his soldiers and partisans are all supporters of order. The Romans, too, had something of this language — "Ubi solitudinem faciunt pacem appellant." We are a little cured of the mania in this country, which was only an octave higher, when we were told, that those who advised the war were men delighting in blood, while those who opposed them were lovers of peace. Not being in an official situation, I am not sufficiently informed to advise particularly; but on such a question, I think we should weigh well in what situation we shall be when the war shall come upon us, for come it will, and sooner than I wish to say. I think it would be the wiser way to anticipate the blow; but this is more than is necessary for me to enter into, as that is for ministers to determine. We should not, moreover, let out of our hands any of the means which accident or precaution has left in them for another war. I admit this may lead to a war; but, taking into consideration our hope of advantage from war's delay, and the chance of our being in a worse situation by its speedy commencement, I have no hesitation to declare for the latter; and so little chance is there of the peace improving our situation, that we are not authorised to purchase delay upon such terms. Now, one of these terms has been alluded to, namely, co-operation upon the continent; a hope, whimsical enough, when the treaty of Amiens is allowed to be a renunciation of the continent. But if it be a little unreasonable to hold this language, and to entertain these hopes, it is surely still more unreasonable to say, "formerly we interfered for your advantage, and struck the first blow, when we were farthest from the danger; now, when the danger is close at hand to us, do you begin first." If we are waiting for a co-operation on such terms, it will never happen. We should begin and set the example. Had we done so, we should now see in Europe a vigour and energy that do not at present exist. The Italian republic would not have been erected, Piedmont would not have been annexed to France, nor would Switzerland have been over-run. None of these could have happened, not even the settling of the indemnities, as it is called, or, properly speaking, the partitioning and dividing Germany among the partisans of France, in furtherance of her ambition, and the destruction of the German empire. It might, Sir, also have had its effect even in France; new circumstances might have taken place, a new combination might have arisen in that country, outraged and indignant at last by such rapacious and inordinate ambition. But no power upon the continent will or can be expected to stir till they hear Great Britain declare herself, till they see her in a state fairly and fully to co-operate with them. The hon. gentleman, while he has been preaching unconditional cowardly submission to France, has been holding up the point of honour; this is a popular tone, which, however, I will take much lower than he does. I could have wished, indeed, his principle had been lower, and his practice higher. Sir, I put the point of honour out of the question very much. I will not push it to a wild, extravagant, chivalrous excess; for national honour, when rightly understood, is, generally speaking, nothing more than national interest. In general there is nothing dishonourable in giving up this thing or that, when it is not disadvantageous to the national interest. But there is another point which seems not to have entered into the hon. gentleman's contemplation; I mean the point of national safety. Sir, if France is to be suffered to continue this career; if she is to be permitted to extend this system of aggrandisement and encroachment unopposed; if we are to look upon it with apathy, and mark its progress with base and cowardly indifference, what can we expect but that, when she has attained these objects of her ambition upon the continent, she will immediately fall upon and attack us? It is on that ground that I say, retain those things which we have still in our possession, as arms in our hands for defence and protection. Sir, no man is more an advocate than I am, in all ordinary and quiet times, for the nation's placing a just confidence in its representatives, and in his majesty's ministers. But circumstances of an extraordinary nature may arise: occasions of uncommon magnitude may occur, in which the nation should deliver its opinion, not by force, not in the way recommended by the lovers of revolutions, but by the expression of the sentiments of the enlightened part of the community. Such circumstances have arisen, such an occasion presents itself now. Sir, I doubt whether it would be in the power of any administration to save the country from ruin, without the close and strict co-operation of the country itself, founded upon a deep sense of the difficulties by which we are surrounded; a deep conviction of the dangers to which the country is exposed; difficulties and dangers, such as they have never experienced before. Unless the tide turns, unless the current runs the other way, unless the breeze springs up, we cannot expect, by our sweeps, to be carried off the rocks. The country must aid the government. Do we want arguments? Do we want appeals to any or every class? To the generous—to the liberal—to the patriotic—to the high minded, we have arguments for all. The interest of posterity, the grand and noble feelings of our natures, all call upon us loudly, imperiously. I would appeal, Sir, to that party, for which I cannot be suspected of having much affection—I mean the Jacobins. I would appeal to them. Bad as my opinion is of them, I do not suppose them all to be made up and compounded of wicked elements. Many may be led away by inflamed representations, by exaggerated statements, by too highly-coloured pictures, by heated imaginations—many may be led away by their very virtues. To the Jacobins I would appeal, not as lovers of social order, of good government, of monarchy, but as men of spirit, as lovers of what they call liberty, as men of hot and proud blood—I would ask them if they are content to be put under the yoke, and crushed by France? I would say to them, that France might annihilate our monarchy, our aristocracy, destroy our church—all good events in their estimation; but after she had effected this, what would she do? They would pass under the yoke of men who would treat them exactly in the same way in which they had treated those whom they had destroyed. I would put it to them, whether it was consistent with their spirit to be made such instruments and engines? I would persuade them, that this species of revolution would put us into the hands of France; a state of liberty which they would not wish to see realized, because it would be a situation in which they would become nothing. To another class of persons, the inactive and the inert; to those who think only of their own interests, who console themselves with the idea, that trade will last long enough to make their fortunes; to such men, if there be men of that description, I would say, what security have you that these hopes will be realized? I would ask them, what security they have that the change will not come on so rapidly as to crush them on a sudden? Sir, we must not argue from any thing that has before happened. We are in the metaphysics of politics, as we were before in the metaphysics of jurisprudence. Formerly, certain points were taken for granted. We knew that there must be gradations; that as the oak was a hundred years in arriving at its maturity, it must be a certain period in going to decay. But this knowledge will be of no use to us under the present circumstances. The evil may overtake us rapidly, suddenly. We must therefore be aut Cæsar aut nullus—we cannot stand still. If they reduce us to the situation in which Spain is, or even Prussia, if they get us into a state in which we cannot stir, what must we expect will be our fate? To that situation of insult and danger, to that precipice are we rushing with hasty steps. In the wild vagaries of their hatred, it is impossible for us to know what they would do, should they get us into their power. Do not let us be sure that we should be treated upon the footing of the most favoured nation. Sir, this country has risen to its present state, not so much by its soil or its situation, as by the energies of its people; but these energies, this vigour, they will not suffer to subsist if they should ever be able to command them. Let us not suppose that they would not crush us, if they could ever get us down. What would they care, though the island should not be half so productive as it is? They would have satisfied their hatred; they would have satiated their vengeance; they would have crippled our energies, broken our spirit, and reduced our firm and manly bodies to shrunk and shapeless skeletons. To men of the description I have mentioned, I would address such arguments as these. But at all events I would have the country declare its mind, that we may be prepared whenever that period comes, when the alternative of war shall be deemed better than a continuance of servile submission, and when we shall think it incumbent upon us to change the timidity of the flying hare, for the courage and attitude of the indignant lion. Sir, I hope that in such a case we should find the country true to its ancient character. If the people catch at first nothing but an enlightened rational fear, we may hope it will soon be followed by manly spirit; but never can we hope to save the country, but by making them sensible of the full extent of the danger—it is with a view to this that I hope ministers will form and shape their own conduct. If they show by their measures that they mean to expiate the sins they have committed, I, for one, shall heartily and openly applaud them. Whether they will raise their minds to such a height—whether they will expand in the trial and burst, I know not; but at least I trust they will do their duty; at least I hope they will not suffer themselves to descend with execration to posterity; that they will not consent to be handed down as the Augustuli who have precipitated the country to its ruin.—Sir, there are many points which I have touched but lightly, others that I have not touched at all. But farther opportunities will be furnished me for discussing them. It is, indeed, a deep sense of the calamities of our situation that has induced me to trespass upon your time so long. A deep sense that the country is going down—that it is almost settling in the water—that the power of France is growing fast round us—that we are dying by a complication of disorders, both chronic and acute; by disorders, some of which are less rapid in their operation than others; we may be cut off by a blow at once. From such an effect may we be defended by a sacrifice of that system, an abandonment of those principles, upon which his majesty's ministers have acted, feeling, as they must do, that we have this complication of diseases! Sir, I trust the country will express its feelings, founded upon its reason; it cannot be blind to the danger—it cannot be ignorant of the causes that have produced it. This, Sir, is my advice; it is an admonition which belongs to the situation in which we are; for fatal, indeed, would it have been if the address had been suffered to pass without any such observations being made as those I have found it necessary to submit to you. I could have wished they had come from a person of more weight, for made they must be. Sir, unless the House see the danger as I see it, unless exertions and sacrifices be made such as we have never seen before, unless we abandon all those low-minded and ignoble ideas, the country must be inevitably hurried on to its ruin. I recollect, with peculiar force, the last dying quiver, the last words almost that dropped from the great lord Chatham before he fainted in the House of Lords. I was present at the melancholy scene.* His last words (they were coarse and homely, but, coming from such a man, they derived, perhaps, a peculiar vigour even from their coarseness), his last words, when some submission was spoken of—a submission trifling when compared with what we are called upon to make at present, — were, “ sooner than consent to such a measure, I would pawn the shirt off my back.” Sir, that expression, with the weight and authority of such a name, conveys what I feel upon the present crisis.

Mr. Fox, in explanation, said, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has throughout his speech misrepresented my meaning; but as he did not quote my words, I have not an opportunity of pointing out the particular instances of misrepresentation. I never said that the power of France was not formidable; on the contrary, I said that no man in England could feel more strongly, or regretted more, that aggrandisement. I do feel it, and I charge that aggrandisement upon the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, as a calamity for which they are gravely responsible to their country. That right hon. gentleman and his colleagues have contributed more to augment the power of France, than any member of the House of Bourbon, or any general of the French republic. I did not say that I was for peace on any terms, and purchased by any submission. I recommended peace as most consonant to the true honour and to the true interests of the nation.

Mr. Windham—I certainly did not intend to misrepresent the hon. gentleman. I did not quote his words; I spoke only of the general tenor of his speech, and tendency of his opinions.

Mr. Chancellor Addington: — Sir, I cannot hear it said, that we are running rapidly the race of ruin, and that we are hurrying to destruction, without making some observations upon such expressions. I will not for a moment allow myself to think that opinions so disheartening, so discouraging, so incompatible, and so unworthy of a just comparison of the situation of France, much as I lament that situation, with the situation of Great Britain, are entertained by many men. The right hon. gentleman has said, that his majesty's ministers have committed sins which they ought to expiate: The hon. gentleman opposite me has expressed a hope that we shall act in such a manner as not to repent having put an end to the war, by such a peace. Sir, I rise not to be the apologist of that transaction. If I am a delinquent, I am a hardened one; for I never reflect upon the share I had in restoring peace to my country, but with the most heartfelt satisfaction. Nay, I do not scruple to add, that even if encroachments or insults offered to the country, should again lead to hostilities, still that calamity will not destroy that satisfaction; for I should know that I had done my duty, and that I had no cause to reproach myself with subsequent events. The right hon. gentleman has said, that any man who had died fourteen years ago, and should be restored to life now, would not be able to know Europe in its present state. No man looks with more regret than I do at that situation; but at the same time no one recollects with more pride the general system of policy which this country has adopted during that eventful period. But I would ask, whether the policy of France, fourteen years ago, did not justify our entertaining a jealousy of her? I wish to know whether, except in Holland and Portugal, the influence of France upon the powers of Europe was not always greater than ours? Not that I mean to say her influence was so great as it is now; but though she has extended her territories, would it not be shallow reasoning to say that she has extended her influence in the same proportion? If we look back to the history of the country and the continent for the last century, we shall see a series of conflicts and negotiations, the consequence of the aggrandisement and encroachments of France. After the spirit manifested by Louis 14th, did king William enter into war singly? Did we enter into war singly at subsequent periods—in the year 1734, and during the Seven Years war? At what period of our history did we place ourselves in a state of hostility to France, to avoid those evils now stated by the right hon. gentleman? Surely he cannot have taken the pains to investigate the subject, which I should have thought he would have done. He has alluded to the supposed reduced state of our establishment. Sir, I am surprised to hear this brought forward as an accusation against us. The fact is, that the army is double now what it was in the year 1784, the year after the peace; and that no reduction has taken place in the establishment of the infantry, except in the disembodiment of the militia. There has, indeed, been a reduction in the cavalry; but the amount of that establishment is still double what it was in 1792, the year before the commencement of the war. Our naval establishment amounted in 1786, to 115 ships of war: it amounts now to 207. In 1792 we had 18,000 seamen employed; we have now 46,000. We had, in the former period, 23 sail of the line in commission; we have now 35. There is another point upon which gentlemen have expressed a doubt, which I am happy to be able to convert into a certainty—I mean with respect to the effect of the peace upon our commerce, manufactures, and revenue. Our foreign export trade for the year 1801 was 23 millions. Our export trade from the 5th Oct. 1801, to the 5th Oct. 1802, has amounted to 27,500,000*l*. With respect to the revenue, this has been a year of unexampled produce. I was thought to be too sanguine, when I took the growing produce of the consolidated fund for three quarters to the 5th April 1803, at 4,500,000*l*. I am happy to state, that in two quarters it has amounted to 3,800,000*l*. The floating debt, which was 38,000,000*l*. has been reduced to 23,000,000*l*. and on the 5th January next, the outstanding floating debt will be little more than 14,000,000*l*. including the 3,000,000*l*. advanced by the Bank for their charter, which must be repaid; and 4,500,000*l*. navy bills. The right hon. gentleman has dwelt upon the difficulties and dangers in which he supposes us to be involved: but he has not vouchsafed to tell us, how a state of war is likely to remedy those evils. I believe he will find it difficult to satisfy this House, that a state of war will best conduce to our internal safety. Sir, the principle upon which his majesty's ministers advised the conclusion of peace was, that in the then state of the continent, no reasonable hope remained of being able to abridge the power of France; that it would not, therefore, be unwise to husband our resources, in order that if we should again unhappily be called upon, we might either be able to co-operate with effect with the continental powers, or furnish the means by which they might be called into vigorous action. I must contend, therefore, Sir, that the country closed the contest with honour, preserving its constitution, the integrity of its empire, and making, besides, some valuable accessions of territory. To renew the war, upon such grounds as we have heard stated by the right hon. gentleman, would be to renew it upon the grossest inconsistency. Sir, I have remarked a strong disposition in many persons to charge the government with acting upon too pacific a system. This imputation results from an unwarrantable suspicion, and I think I may say that my declaration is entitled to as much credit as their suspicions, as long as there is no proof that they are well founded. I aver then, that in no one instance has the honour or credit of the country been committed by his majesty's ministers. Under the present circumstances, I look at the state of the public opinion and feelings with very different ideas from what I should do if I coincided in sentiment with the right hon. gentleman. Sir, I do in my conscience believe that the nation anxiously wishes for the continuance of peace, but is not afraid of war—it hopes the best, but desires to be prepared for the worst—that it will not suffer any unworthy compromise of its honour; but that it will not permit any impassioned feelings and exaggerated representations to bear down what is due to prudence. There can be, there is no disposition to lay the country at the feet of France. But I do see a disposition in some men to work upon the feelings of the people, to inflame their passions, to rouse their resentment, and by these feelings to force the two countries into hostilities without any definite motive. This is a danger against which I wish to guard the country and the House. I am convinced that the great body of the reflecting community will afford their support to his majesty's ministers, if they show that they will watch over any infringement of the honour of the sovereign and the country; but that they will not suffer themselves to be led by impassioned feelings into the calamities of war. Sir, I have no hesitation in confessing, that I consider war as a dreadful evil. But dreadful as is that evil, I shall never hesitate between the alternative of the sacrifice of our honour and war.

Mr. Thomas Grenville said, that his sentiments, with regard to the present address, exactly coincided with those of Mr. Windham. The chancellor of the exchequer had opposed to solid reasoning nothing but minute statements. He had begged the question. His details of the revenue were no answer to his right hon. friend's arguments. The chancellor of the exchequer had affected to look upon the makers and approvers of the peace as equally pledged to its maintenance; but for his part he thought they were to be regarded in a very different light. The approvers of the peace had only approved of it on certain assurances being given them that it would produce certain beneficial consequences. These assurances, however, had completely failed; and therefore they were no longer bound to persist in their support of it. The fact was, that the treaty of peace had not been properly discussed: he did not mean the detail of it, but the tone and temper in which it was made. The tone had been taken on the mere word of ministers, and it was now found that they had been completely deceived themselves, or had deceived others. The treaty, in truth, was no sooner signed, than the disposition of the French government was found to be very different from what ministers had affected to believe it; and that disposition has continued to discover itself more and more plainly. No sooner was the treaty signed in May, than close upon the back of this we heard of Piedmont being to be annexed to France. In August was brought to light the plan agreed upon between France and Russia, for the destruction of the Germanic body. In this act it had been stated, that we were not concerned; but had not a part of the electorate of Hanover been torn from us, to solder the indemnities? The unhappy fate of the Swiss attracted our attention in September; and in October, the duchy of Parma was formally and irrevocably annexed to France. Such were the indications of the pacific temper of the first consul. The House then was absolved, the nation was absolved, from its former consent to the treaty, as that consent was only procured by misrepresentation. The very words of the address were sufficient to show that the sentiments of administration were now changed. A powerful military establishment is recommended, and the tendency of this measure could not be doubtful. It was in this view that he gave his concurrence to the address.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the terms of the address on the peace which had been alluded to, had not been accurately quoted. His majesty was called upon in it to employ that vigilance which the state of Europe demanded, not to proceed to act immediately upon every alteration of the status quo. The state of things, he confessed, was much more unsatisfactory than it was when the definitive treaty was signed. The hon. gentleman wished for an active interference in consequence of recent events; but had those events altered the maritime or colonial power and influence of France; and what else could render such an interference political or indeed just? Events had certainly taken place on the continent injurious to our policy, but not so much so as to the policy of other states; and it was not for us singly to make an attack for interest which concerned us least. An hon. member had supposed that his noble friend (lord Hawkesbury) had admitted, that a remonstrance had been made relative to Switzerland; but it could not with propriety be concluded from any thing he had said, that such an interference had taken place. He only said, hypothetically, that those who objected so hastily and violently to the conduct of his majesty's ministers did not know that they had not interfered. His lordship proceeded to observe, that proving to all Europe, as we had done, our sincere desire of peace, we should enter into a new war with double advantages. Had we continued the war (said he) on the reasoning of the hon. gentleman's friends, we should have lost our energy, the country would not have gone with us. Another advantage likewise has resulted from the peace; the country now sees that its trade and prosperity do not depend on war. The experiment has been tried, and has shown that the resources of the nation are firmly established both in peace and war. It has been urged, that my noble friend (lord Hawkesbury) positively said, that all continental alliance was at an end; but he did not mean to express the dispiriting idea, that no circumstances, or time, could revive the spirit of vigour on the continent; he only intended to state, that all the continental powers having made a separate peace, no farther aid or concurrence could be expected from them. With respect to the present state of this country, it is the determination of ministers to place the peace establishment on the most efficient footing; and should any adverse events render it necessary for us again to have recourse to war, I cannot doubt but the spirit and resources of the nation will enable us to repel every danger with which we may be threatened.

Lord Hawkesbury also explained. He had observed, he said, that the House would be prepared to defend our honour and essential interests if attacked; but, as to interference with the continent, it must depend on the consideration of many circumstances, upon the support we should receive, and the chance of success. He observed, that he had not spoken of the temper of the treaty, but of the tone, the time, and the terms. By the tone was meant, that tone of equality, which should prevail between independent states, and the absence of revolting and degrading conditions, besides the terms.

Mr. Whitbread said, he should vote for the address, though he was considerably alarmed by what he had heard from ministers. Those who disapproved the peace, acted consistently in now wishing for war; but those who had made the peace, while France was in possession of Piedmont and Switzerland, and who had not then made the slightest stipulation, in regard either to Switzerland or Sardinia, would act inconsistently if they were to break the treaty on such grounds. However he admired the abilities and lively imagination of a right hon. gentleman, he could not agree with him in his reasoning, when he supposed France would increase much faster in power during peace than in time of war. The fact was otherwise: at the first effort at negociation, France was content to cede Belgium; at the second she refused to give it up; at the third her pretensions were still higher; the fourth attempt was, when Buonaparté sent overtures of peace, which, in an evil hour, were rejected; and during the war France had enormously increased in power. She had not made an equal progress in peace. He hoped peace was not likely to be soon broken, and he lamented that language tending to inspire such a belief should have been so inconsiderately used.

The Address was then agreed to.

Nov. 24. The Address being reported to the House,

Mr. Wilberforce said, he was desirous of delivering a few observations on the important subject before the House, the more especially, as certain sentiments of his had been alluded to, by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) on the preceding night. The sentiments which he had uttered at the time adverted to, were such as he was ready to avow. The Address seemed to him to speak the language which it was proper for the House to hold, for it was not right to push matters to extremity with regard to continental affairs: there was a propriety in saying, on the part of his majesty, that we should keep our eyes on the affairs of the continent, and be ready to take such measures as circumstances might require; and that was properly assented to in the address. If any thing gave suspicion to him in this matter, it was an allusion to the standing policy of this country, which, upon a careful and attentive perusal of the matter, and much reflection, he had formed an opinion upon which he was not likely, on a sudden, to abandon. It was this, that that House and this country had been far too forward to engage in war and continental connexions; to enter into engagements, the full extent of which we could not foresee, and many of which had been to the highest degree, injurious to this country, having wasted much of its blood and treasure, and that without procuring, in return, the least benefit to us. Therefore, if he were to take the speech in the spirit of a special pleader, he should doubt how far the words of it, or the address upon the subject of the policy he alluded to, was right; but, in a general sense, he had no difficulty in expressing his approbation of the sentiments it contained. But it had been said, that he had uttered, on a former occasion, a sentiment purporting that in no circumstances ought this country to form any continental connexion; a sentiment which he never did utter, nor did he believe he ever should utter it, for it was going to an extreme which he never approved; it being his persuasion that almost all good policy lay between extreme points on either side, as most virtue was said to be in a medium; but he had no difficulty in saying, that, under the present circumstances of this country, it would be wise in us to pause before we renewed any continental alliance or connexion: for if the experience of the last ten years had not made us at least diffident upon these projects, it must have been most unhappily thrown away. He hoped, therefore, we should, in the language of the address, keep our eyes on what was going forward. It was, indeed, desirable that we should prevent France by land, as well as by sea, from extending her power; but then we were to look to expediency, and not depend on any speculations of statesmen. Need he say any thing on the shortsightedness of men? How had the greatest and the wisest of men been deceived in their conjectures! How had their speculations been turned into foolishness! Indeed some of the most profound politicians had overlooked things which men of the plainest, and almost meanest capacities had foreseen. And here he was led to remember a very eloquent speech which his noble friend (lord Hawkesbury) made in that House, and which could not be too much admired, as it gave earnest of those great talents which had since been exercised in the service of his country. He could not help, however, reflecting on the miscarriages which may attend the schemes of all those who are accustomed to a great chain of political combinations in their thoughts and sentiments. The speech of his noble friend, although he most unaffectedly admired the knowledge it displayed, as well as brilliancy, on the occasion to which he alluded, naturally occurred to him, when he was considering of human foresight, especially on the events likely to arise out of the policy of states. The truth of the matter was this: politicians calculated on the continuance of the operation of certain causes, and a given number of events; when one of these events happened to be altered, the whole combination was at an end, and with it, of course, all the reasoning that was built upon such combination; nay, the whole system built upon such a combination might be reversed by one event. The whole state of a great number of things might be altered by a single event: so that after a great deal of speculation and political sagacity, we had discovered that all the trouble we had taken, might have been very well spared, and the country have saved vast quantities of blood and treasure. The cost might have been well employed in the improvement, instead of the destruction of mankind. He illustrated this by adverting to the circumstances at the peace of Utrecht, of which the danger, at one time so much apprehended, shifted at once, by a single accident, and changed the whole complexion of political affairs, as they regarded the house of Austria, Spain and France; and which, from threatening all Europe with the horrors of war, produced a peace for thirty years, in which we were united with France for five years. Whether any policy might again unite us, he could not say, but that was not impossible. Upon these topics there was abundant matter for discussion, to show how little human calculation was to be depended upon in the affairs of states, and how much was the mere effect of accident, that is to say, upon events which human foresight could not penetrate. These were considerations which ought to make us cautious in relying on the advantages of continental connexions, which might depend on a combination of numerous events. It had been said of him, that he had uttered a sentiment which had about it perhaps some unseasonable merriment, nor was it totally without its sober sadness. The phrase that conveyed the sentiment he alluded to was this: "that the people of this country are too honest to have much to do with continental connexions." His right hon. friend (Mr. Canning), who had animadverted on that expression, ought to have made some allowance for his situation. He had occasion to go home to his constituents, and to address them on the subject of their pressure; for such must be the effect of every war to such a class as his constituents, and particularly in the last war. He therefore ought to have some indulgence in speaking as the representative of such a class of persons as his constituents were. It was not unreasonable to say, that we wanted to recruit our strength, which was much wasted both in blood and treasure; and therefore, if he made use of an odd expression, it was not matter of great blame. But the truth of the matter was this: he had no apology to make for the expression which had been so quoted and animadverted upon; and he was so far from making any apology for the assertion, that he was now about to repeat and affirm it; and it was a sentence to which he called the attention of the House, and particularly that of his majesty's ministers. He said again, that the people of this country are too honest to have much to do with continental connexions. He said this, because we are always faithful to our engagements, they almost always faithless to us; at least always so when it appears to them to suit their interests; for it was part of the general system of the policy of the continent to pay no attention to political engagements, when it is in the least degree convenient to neglect them. Of the truth of this there were many instances; a striking one was that of the Pragmatic Sanction, in which, in the course of a few years, every power engaged in it deserted its engagement, England alone excepted. As to the last three we had had with France, to use the strong language of another person, the ink which recorded these engagements, was hardly dry when they meditated a breach of them. In a word, the principle on the continent seemed to be, that of paying no attention to political engagements for a moment longer than an observance of them was convenient. Seeing this, and feeling the effect of it, he would ask, whether it was too much to say, that the people of England ought to be cautious in the engagements which they enter into? We certainly ought to be cautious in these things; for we must keep our engagements whether they be convenient or not, whatever others may do with theirs. He entreated the House to consider, what was likely to be the result of a confederacy with any of the powers which we had already been engaged with. We had been engaged in as powerful a confederacy as ever was formed, and upon a subject as interesting as ever was contemplated by any state; and on the part of some of the confederates, the ties of consanguinity were added to those of general policy; for Austria had family motives in the confederacy. Russia, Prussia, Spain, Sardinia, and indeed every power in Europe, had at some time or other belonged to this great confederacy. Did not every one of these powers get out of the confederacy as soon, or, as it were, steal out of it? Nor could it be otherwise, while they were acting on views so different, that some of them were more afraid of each other, than they were of the enemy they had united to oppose. In 1797, was not the court of Vienna induced to quit us? How did that court behave towards us on that occasion? Did it discover any extraordinary fidelity towards this country? Did they give us a polite intimation, upon that occasion, of what they were about to do? No such thing. We could not know, for many months, what the treaty was between it and France. It was lodged in the breast of the Austrian cabinet; but when it came out, there was no wonder it was so long concealed; for it disclosed the utmost perfidy with regard to us. So with regard to the German indemnities, no regard was paid to any engagements with us. From all this continental policy of faithlessness, we had only to determine to embark no farther than we can see our way. He had heard it said, that among the alterations which the French had introduced, that of changing the meaning of words was one; so that now, No may be made to mean Yes, and Yes No. So that when the French say, they will guarantee the integrity of the Turkish empire for all time, they mean, they will give away part to any power they please, upon having an equivalent, and that they will keep the remainder themselves. Such was the nature of the engagements they made with states; yet we must observe ours, if we made any. He proceeded to observe on the probable effect of the new confederacy, and expressed an apprehension that it might be dissolved, as far as regarded Austria or Russia, by the granting, by France, for an equivalent of course, to either, but particularly to Russia, a certain part of Turkey; but by giving part to the one, and part to the other, both might become hostile to us. We had seen that once already, in the course of the last war; nor was a project like this unlikely to enter the head of a Russian statesman; nor was it unlikely that the parties should act upon it. What then should we do? Take care not to form any engagement, unless for present action; not to form any connexion that was to be of distant execution by powers, the good faith of whom we had reason to be diffident of; not to enter into a combination we have reason to apprehend may be dissolved without any regard to our interests, and that we had reason to be diffident of. He called on the House to infer, from the experience of the last 14 years of continental affairs in particular. He then proceeded to take a view of the policy which it was the real interest of this country to pursue, and differed totally from the sentiments which had been expressed by Mr. Windham upon that subject. The right hon. gentleman had declared that, upon a full view of our situation, war appeared to him to be the better course of the two. Now he would ask what we could expect from war? In the last war we had taken all that was takeable, if he might be allowed the expression. And what could we do but take again what we had agreed to give up? And what should we be the better if another peace was agreed to within 50 miles of Vienna, or at the capital? What could we get by prolonging the war? What could we hope more than to be put into the situation in which we were at the conclusion of the peace? Were the people of this country so ready to burst with prosperity as to be eager for war? Or did it appear, on a calm view of our situation, that a war was necessary for us at this moment? He apprehended not, and he could not help thinking, that were it not for some immoveable prejudice of Mr. Windham, a man of his enlarged understanding could not see political events and affairs in the light he did. Before we were engaged again in war, we should look at our revenue, and see that it be improved: we should look the whole of our situation in the face—look at and provide against all our dangers; attend to the dearest interest of our country; but we should consider wherein that interest consists. Let us remember, that, dear as are army and navy, our revenue, our trade, and our commerce, and all our resources, that yet above all our army, above all our navy—that was to say, above all our soldiers—ay, and above all our sailors too—above all our commerce, and above all our wealth, and the preparation which that wealth enabled us to make, there was one more important than all the rest to a free country, and that was the disposition of the people, that was, that its government should possess the hearts of the people; but he begged leave to warn ministers against the possible event of creating a clamour for war, by exciting the resentment of the people against some detestable acts of tyranny in another power, and of taking advantage of it, to involve the country in war; the effects of which, when the people began to reflect, would be dismal. He entreated that they would, as far as possible, inform the people of their situation; give a right feeling of their danger; observing, that if they hurried on the people to war, without this caution, they would deserve the severest censure; and, he had almost said, the execration of their countrymen. He thought that ministers acted on the true policy of this country, by endeavouring to restore to it the blessings of peace. He hoped they would turn their thoughts to all species of internal improvements, to the economy, to reformation of abuses, to the improvement of the education of youth, as the best way to improve morals, to the redress of all species of grievances, as the best way to continue the attachment of the whole people to that constitution and state of things, that rendered us at once the admiration of the whole world, and marked us out as a people enjoying the greatest blessing it had yet pleased Providence to bestow on mankind—a government, under which liberty was enjoyed, and property protected, and all the comforts of human life better secured, than any other age or country had yet felt. With all these blessings, and with all this power to preserve them and sense to enjoy them, he could not help wishing that we might try the advantages of peace, and avail ourselves of them, and shun all indefinite continental connexions; above all, to enter into no engagements hastily or precipitately, on the ground of any supposed readiness in the public for hostility, on account of some recent instances of flagrant injustice. He wished rather to obtain the sentiments of the middle class of society, who, generally speaking, were the best informed, and who had and who felt an immediate and direct identity of interest with the public at large—a class of men whose opinion, although never neglected in this country, had not perhaps all the weight it deserved. He concluded with observing, that if this course was taken by government, we should have nothing to fear from the enormous size of the French republic. What if they were 50 millions of men—did that constitute the strength of the chief consul of France? Rather his weakness, if left to themselves; for multitudes of them must hate the system by which they are become subject to their present yoke. Time, therefore, would remove all apprehension in this respect. It was natural to expect, that if this unwieldy mass was left to itself, it would, in time, change its condition—it could not be otherwise; for moral causes were certain of their effects, whereas the effect of human policy was always uncertain. The way to produce the dissolution of this mighty power was, to leave it to its own course; the way to unite it, was to attack it by hostile force.

General Gascoyne said, he apprehended there was some mistake in the representation given of our common prosperity. That description did not apply to the most important branch of all, he meant the West India islands. Since the conclusion of peace, a pressure had fallen with great severity on the carrying trade particularly, which diminished it at this time one third of its former value.

Mr. Elliot said, he should not consume the time of the House by an apology for presuming to ask its indulgence. He had been so little in the habit of public discussion, and felt so unfeigned a reluctance, to engage in it, that nothing could have induced him to trespass on its patience, short of the circumstances of the alarming crisis in which it was assembled—a crisis which filled him with considerations, that, he acknowledged, almost superseded and overwhelmed the ordinary emotions of personal embarrassment. All other feelings seemed to fade and die away before those great and primary interests, which must, at the present conjuncture, have seized and fastened themselves on the minds and apprehensions of all men. It was not whether one spoke with a little more or a little less reputation: that was not in the class of reflections which occurred at such a period. It was, whether our nearest and dearest concerns were not at stake. It was for the landed interest to consider, whether the security of their inheritance was not shaken; it was for those engaged in commercial life to consider, whether they were likely long to remain in the safe enjoyment of the well-earned fruits of their industry. The stoutest and boldest hearts around him could not look at the present awful state of public affairs without harbouring a doubt, whether that whole system of relations called our country was not on the very edge of irretrievable ruin. With these impressions, he could not reconcile it to himself to depart from this second discussion in perfect silence. If ever there was a period which called for discussion, if ever there was a conjuncture which demanded the deliberative voice of every man endued with a public trust, surely it was the present. In that hour of peril it behoved us to sift our situation to the bottom, to endeavour to trace to its source the danger to which we stood exposed; to examine whether it proceeded from a fundamental error in our system, or from erroneous measures accompanying that system, or from causes independent of both. It was our bounden duty to unveil the danger, not only to ourselves, but to the country, to show it in its nature and quality, and in its full extent, that we might apportion our efforts to the exigencies which required them, that we might turn from us the danger, if human prudence could avert it; or that, if we should be obliged to meet it, we might encounter it with the firmness that became us; and above all, that we might prove to the enemy (if enemy we had) and to the world, that we were still in the unimpaired possession of that true, genuine, and tried resource of the empire, that persevering constancy, that unshaken resolution, and that cool and determined courage, which had ever distinguished the British people, when summoned to assert the honour, the character, the safety, and the independence of their country. With this view of his duty, he should take the liberty of adverting to the events that had occurred on the continent since the close of the last parliament. Within that short space of time, a period of only a few months, we had been taught a very awful and impressive lesson: we had learnt that France could conquer in peace as well as in war; states and a whole empire had fallen before her. A new revolution had been accomplished on the continent of Europe, which he could not help regarding as little less affecting the interests of this country than an internal convulsion would have been—he meant the dissolution of the Germanic body. In truth, no person who had cast his eye on the map of Europe, or who was conversant with history, or who had heard of the equilibrium of power, could be ignorant that the German empire was the very balance of the scale. The political evil of this transaction was not the only calamity arising from it. It was impossible for us to turn our eyes from the moral mischief of it. No man could behold the overthrow of property, titles, and honours; the abolition of archbishoprics, bishoprics, and corporations, both ecclesiastical and civil; no man could see sovereign princes transferred from one dominion to another, and subjects severed from their legitimate rulers, without feeling that all those opinions, habits, prejudices, and principles, which constitute the foundation of civil government and social order, were shaken to their base. All this, too, had been done under the auspices and influence of a power, which, it was ever to be remembered, was itself founded on the recognition of the violation of property. The political effect of this stupendous change was obvious: it gave to France that ascendancy in the German empire which Austria before possessed. The transaction was marked, too, by the peculiar contempt and neglect with which his Britannic majesty had been treated. The arrangement had been made without previous communication, either with the house of Austria, the legitimate head of the empire, or his Britanic majesty, who was the ally of Austria, who had recently signed a treaty of peace with France, who was a member of the Germanic body, and who was peculiarly fitted to be an arbitrator in the partition, as he was entirely disinterested in the question of the indemnifications. It was settled by France, in conjunction with Russia, which had a very slight interest in the empire, and with Prussia, which expected indemnification in the vicinity of his majesty's Hanoverian possessions, and the troops of which had not long before, without any declaration of hostility, actually occupied Hanover; and the partition had terminated in establishing a Prussian garrison in the heart of his majesty's patrimonial territory, and with the additional contumely of extorting from his majesty a part of the indemnification for the house of Orange. It would be recollected, that, after the private convention at Amiens, between the Dutch and the French ministers, it was stated in a sort of extra-official turn of debate, that the indemnification to the stadtholder might fall upon this country. It had now actually come to pass, that a part of his indemnification had been derived from his majesty's continental dominions, and, perhaps, another portion might subsequently be drawn from Great Britain.—It had been said in the course of the discussion of last night, that the honour of the country had been saved in the terms of the peace; but he appealed to any man who should review the whole of the transaction of the indemnification of the house of Orange, whether he could lay his hand on his heart, and declare that the honour of the nation had been preserved.—He mentioned Piedmont only, because it afforded an example of the systematic advancement of French aggrandizement. During the negotiation of peace, it had been denominated a 27th military division of France; since the conclusion of the peace, it had been, by a sort of regular progression, formally annexed to the territory of France. The fate of Switzerland was too well known. It had been rumoured, that the British government had made a representation on its behalf. From what fell last night from a noble lord, and the chancellor of the exchequer, he rather understood them to have admitted discussions to have taken place on that subject, but that nothing had been done which had committed the honour of this country. Whether or not the honour of the country had been committed, was rather a matter of opinion than of declaration. He, however, conceived his noble friend (lord Castlereagh) to have said, that there had been no remonstrance. In short, the matter was involved in a mystery, which he should not attempt to develop. In argument, he should take it both ways. First, he would assume, that ministers had interfered. That they had a right, and that they were warranted by every principle of justice and policy to interfere, he had no hesitation in asserting. A more flagrant and unprovoked aggression on the rights and liberties of a brave, innocent, and injured people, than the conduct of France towards the Swiss exhibited, he believed the records of tyranny did not furnish. But though he applauded the motive, he must condemn the mode of the interposition. It ought to have been made earlier; for, unless he had a distinct and specific assurance from ministers to the contrary, he could not be convinced that the Swiss, so soon as they had determined to resist the encroachments of France, would have been so negligent of the interests of their cause, as not immediately to have communicated their intentions to the independent powers of Europe, and to the court of London among the first. In that case ministers must have been apprized of the rising spirit in Switzerland many months ago: they should, therefore, have adopted means for giving authority to their representation by a suitable armament; and they should have endeavoured to have procured a co-operation on the continent. Instead of precautions of that nature, however, they permitted Germany to be so enfeebled as to have no hope of co-operation from that quarter; and then they came forward with a remonstrance, without even the countenance and support of an adequate armament. The principal feature in the importance of Switzerland to Europe, consisted in its being a barrier to Germany; but we suffered Germany to be partitioned, and then we interposed for Switzerland. We first permitted the house to be plundered, and then we made an inefficient bluster at the door. If, as he had apprehended his noble friend to have stated, no remonstrance had been made in favour of Switzerland, he must still impute blame to ministers. There ought to have been a remonstrance, and a remonstrance made in a manner to have given it effect, and not in a way which was calculated at once to commit the dignity of the country, and to aggravate the misfortunes of the people whom it was our object to succour. If there had been no representation, it was because we were unprepared with a suitable armament to support it. But how came we to be so unprepared? Was it possible that his majesty's ministers could have put the last hand to the treaty of Amiens without having endeavoured to acquire a knowledge of the actual relation of France with regard to other powers, as well as to ascertain her ulterior views; for instance, to ascertain whether Germany was to have been free in the arrangement of the indemnifications? If no measures had been employed to obtain some information and security on these points, we were at that moment in complete ignorance in respect to even the extent of the possessions of France. Mexico and Peru, for any thing we knew, might have been ceded to her in addition to Louisiana. But admitting that ministers had been guilty of so flagrant an omission, they could not have been insensible to that spirit of aggrandizement, by which France had been actuated during the whole course of the negotiation of peace; and they therefore should not have been unprovided with the means of meeting it in the event of the measures of the French government subsequent to the peace proving to be such as should menace the interests of this country. There had been nothing new in the system of France. Her power had, to be sure, increased with an accumulated rapidity; but the spirit of her proceedings were unchanged. It had been manifested during the negotiation in multiplied acts of fraud, insult, and violence. Had the seizure of one of the most flourishing portions of Italy, while our ambassador was waiting the pleasure of the first consul at Amiens, escaped the memory of ministers? Did they not remember how they had been imposed upon in respect to the limits of Portuguese Guiana? how they had been cheated in the instance of Louisiana? how they had been deceived about Elba? Could they have forgot the trick practised on the Turkish minister at Paris, and the diplomatic manoeuvre, which the noble secretary of state himself had experienced, in regard to that article of the preliminaries which related to the evacuation of Egypt? He trusted, that neither the ministers, nor the parliament, could suffer to be erased from their recollection that memorable interval, during which this country had been held up to the scorn and derision of Europe. He was persuaded that most of the members of the late parliament, who had voted for the peace, had considered it in a great degree as an experiment; and he was convinced that none of them (at least he meant with very few exceptions) would have given it their sanction, if it could have entered into their contemplation that his majesty's ministers would have immediately begun to deport themselves as if the trial had been made, and the result had been successful; if, for example, they could have imagined that our establishments would have been diminished, before it could have been ascertained whether the conduct of France was likely to be such as might afford a rational hope of repose for Europe, and before she had evinced any disposition to reduce the scale of her own establishments. It was his firm belief, that no man in that House (always excepting a very few of very eccentric opinions) would have conferred his approbation on the treaty, could he have foreseen that such a system of measures would have followed it. That the fixed, uniform, and rooted purpose of France, was the establishment of universal empire, if other proofs than her conduct were requisite, was evinced by publications which had lately appeared in the Moniteur. He might be told, that newspapers were not to be considered as authentic documents, that they might be disavowed; but if the newspaper to which he alluded should be disavowed, could any person in the House credit the disavowal? It was notorious that the press in France was in a state of the most abject subjection to the government, and the Moniteur was a paper which bore the title of official. It was, therefore, highly improbable that any paragraph should be inserted in it, which had not the sanction of the French government; but it was absolutely impossible that a second publication should appear in it without the direct approbation of consular authority. It was the second he should quote, partly because it contained a concise description of the present situation and views of France, and partly because it was desirable in a transaction between adverse parties, such as the treaty of peace, to discover the sentiments of both parties in respect to it; and the last publication declared the consular opinion of that instrument. He should read only what was essential to his purpose: "What is the interest of France? It is, to have none but good neighbours and sure friends: in the South, the king of Spain, the ally of France, from inclination as well as from interest, and the Italian and Ligurian republics, which enter into her federative system: Switzerland, the duke of Bavaria, the good prince of Baden, the king of Prussia, Holland, to the north and east."—"Every thing has returned to its natural state, into that state which on all sides will exhibit the fine territory of France surrounded by friendly people." Such friendly people, continued Mr. E., as were contained in the new states, which had been created by the late partition of Germany, and which, being in complete subservience to France, were so many forts and garrisons on her frontier, answering the purpose either of aggression or defence. The paragraph then proceeded to state, "That situation is the result of ten years triumphs, of hazards, of labours, and immense sacrifices." Europe, he said, seemed to be described by the chief consul as a fine estate, with eligible appendages and circumstances: and what were the titles, what the deeds of conveyance to that estate? "The peace of Luneville, the preliminaries of London, and the peace of Amiens, far from having changed it, have consolidated it." Here we had the testimony of consular authority, that when the noble secretary of state signed the preliminaries of London, and when his majesty's ministers concluded the treaty of Amiens, they had established and consolidated the domination of France; and so he solemnly protested he believed they had. He then proceeded to touch on the topics of consolation which had been offered. Of consolation, he said, he stood so much in need, that he should catch with avidity at any ray of it that might be shown to him: one was, the extinction of the danger of Jacobinism. It had been alleged, that Jacobinism was suppressed in France; and he did, indeed, believe, that no one dare utter a seditious sentence, or write a seditious paragraph against the government there; but with the determined malignity which the prime consul bore to this nation, he saw nothing which justified him in flattering himself that Buonaparté would neglect to avail himself of any seditious combinations which might exist either in England or Ireland, for the subversion of the British empire; and it must be admitted, that the intercourse of peace was calculated to mature a system of organization with greater facility than it could have been carried on in war. He really knew not from what source gentlemen derived their security on this head; not, he imagined, from the band of Irish traitors who were now at Paris, not from the illustrious instance of Napper Tandy, whose name he could not mention without remarking, that, had he been vested with the power, he would have pardoned him. He was, to be sure, a traitor, and had been convicted on the clearest evidence; but he was an old man, and perfectly insignificant: he was, in truth, an extinguished traitor; and though he, perhaps, could not justify the feeling, he must repeat, he would certainly have spared his life. But he must add, that if, after his pardon, it had been even whispered or insinuated that the French government had expressed a solicitude for his release, he would have taken care that he should not have been permitted to retire to France; and if he had been suffered to go thither under such circumstances, he could not help saying it was a positive insult on the right feeling of every English and every Irish heart. Before he quitted this part of the subject, he could not forbear reminding the House of the new English paper which had been lately established in Paris, with the cognizance and sanction of the government (for no paper could otherwise be circulated there), and in which, among a mass of very dull sedition, it had been insinuated, that the Irish nation was absolved from its allegiance to the king. This, it must be confessed, was pretty ardent language for this anti-jacobin, pretty stout doctrine for this confirmed friend and potent protector of civil government, who had the press of France at his devotion, to suffer to be circulated in his own dominions, and to be transmitted to the country with which he had recently concluded a treaty of peace and amity. Another topic of comfort was the increase of the trade and resources of the country. He felt it his duty here to correct a misconception of his noble friend (lord Castlereagh), who appeared to have understood some of the gentlemen near him to have stated in the last parliament, that the resources of the country depended upon war. His noble friend had certainly misunderstood those gentlemen: they, to the best of his recollection, had said, that it was probable that, for the first two or three years of peace, the amount of our trade would remain much the same as it had been in the course of the war; but that when the peace should assume a settled and permanent appearance, it must be expected that the other maritime powers of Europe would resume their share of the commerce, which, during the war, had been entirely engrossed by Great Britain. The chancellor of the exchequer had represented the exports of the last year to exceed those of any of the years of war. He was far from meaning to controvert the fact. He had no doubt that the exports of our manufactures to France were very considerable, notwithstanding the severe restrictions of the French government; but it was to be observed, that our commodities being excluded by the French decrees from the whole line of the French coast, our trade was carried on totally on the principle of a contraband traffic, and much of it in neutral bottoms: consequently, the prosperity of our navigation was made a subordinate consideration to the manufacturing interest. The price of shipping had, he understood, already experienced a considerable fall; and thus, while continental connexions, one great means of control over the ambition of France, were regarded as impracticable, and by one gentleman ineligible, even if they could be obtained, we were embarking in a system of commerce eminently prejudicial to that maritime superiority which was our only remaining shield against French aggrandizement. We also ought not to veil from ourselves the immense commercial means of France, if she should apply herself to objects of that nature. It seemed impossible to look without some apprehension at the vast territorial extent of that country, its immense population, and its inexhaustible riches of production, together with the addition of the industry and manufactures of the Austrian Netherlands, and the collieries, iron-works, naval stores, and other multiplied resources of the country lying between the Meuse and the Rhine. Much reliance had been, perhaps justly, placed on the superiority of British capital, credit, and confidence; but he did not think we sufficiently appreciated the force of the capital of French power and of French energy. He was at a loss to discern the principle on which those persons reasoned, who thought that the activity and enterprise which had rendered France so formidable in war, would not have the same overwhelming influence when directed to the concerns of commerce. Of the magnificence of the public works in France, we had a recent example in the military road through the Valais, which he understood was carried on upon the grandest scale. If with the same spirit, and on the same scale, she should turn her attention to the formation of canals, which, he believed, she did not wholly neglect, she must, in consequence of her possession of all the principal rivers of Europe, secure to herself the entire inland navigation of the continent. Of the coast of Europe she was already mistress; and we had too good reason to know that she now had large and valuable colonial territories. He was anxious, however, not to be understood as depreciating the resources and riches of this country; he firmly believed it was almost bursting with opulence. But some gentlemen argued as if the efficacy of wealth did not consist in its application. They really spoke as if it contained some principle of vitality, as if it had some inherent principle of activity, as if it had ears and eyes, and hands and feet. They say, "We have a surplus of near four millions of money." I say, "The French have four hundred thousand bayonets." I tell them, "An armed robber is at the door."—"Oh! but," say they, "we are very rich." In common sense the answer is, "So much the better for the robber." The report which ministers had to make to parliament, of their administration, was this: "It is very true that Germany has been so divided as to secure the preponderance of France in the empire; that a great portion of Italy belongs to France, and the whole of it is under her influence; that Piedmont is annexed to France; that Switzerland has been overwhelmed by France; that the Austrian Netherlands and a considerable part of Germany are united to France; and that Holland, Spain, Portugal, and the coast of Barbary, are in vassalage to her; that we have recognised a principle of armament for France, by permitting her to send fleets and armies to St. Domingo for the subjugation of the negroes; and that, if those fleets and armies fail to subdue the negroes, they are ready to be applied to the invasion of our own colonies; that we have restored to France, Martinico, improved both in point of cultivation and strength, and also Tobago and St. Lucie; and that we have ceded Elba and Minorca. The Cape, we trust, is not yet transferred; but our possession of it depends on a race of ships. Malta we still hold, because fortunately the machinery of the arrangement for our dereliction of it is so curiously complicated, that even its inventors cannot work it. France has imported maritime stores with great activity, and to an immense amount. We have transferred to France near thirty thousand seamen, and we have reduced our own establishment in a greater proportion. All these things are very true; but we have a surplus of near four millions of money." What an account was this for a government to render at such a crisis! Former parliaments would have demanded, and he hoped the present parliament would ask, "Where is our army for the protection of the few possessions you have left us? Is Ireland in a state of safety? Where is our Channel fleet, the bulwark of our coasts? Your savings have been made out of the very vital security of the country." No man, he said, could exult more in the flourishing state of the revenue and resources of the nation than he did. But he could not help reminding gentlemen, that our wealth may be our glory or our shame. If wealth was in its due place, and was made subservient to the honour, dignity, independence, and security of the country, he trusted that under the blessing of Providence, it might become the foundation of a towering and durable greatness; but if we betrayed more fear for the loss of it than zeal in defending it, if we did not direct it to its proper objects, it would be no longer the magazine of our strength, or the storehouse of our power, but an additional bait to the rapacity of our foe. In respect to the necessity or expediency of war at the present moment, he should not presume to deliver an opinion. It was a point on which those were responsible who had the necessary information. But he was prepared to say, that we ought to arm without delay, and that we ought to retain, even at the hazard of war, those points of cession which remained in our hands, as some balance (though he confessed a very inadequate one) to the accession of power which France had acquired since the signature of the treaty of peace. An hon. gentleman had asked, "Why should you risk hostilities? What would be the chances of war?" He should reply by asking, What had been the chances of peace? We beheld France possessed of large territories in the western hemisphere, something in Asia, much in Africa, almost the whole of Europe, and a long line of coast opposite our shores, augmenting instead of reducing her establishments both by sea and land; showing no disposition to forego her system of aggrandizement, but, on the contrary, pursuing it with unabating zeal and increased rapidity; prohibiting our trade, and manifesting a rooted desire for the destruction of that country which presented the only remaining obstacle to her universal dominion. If in this predicament we submitted, she would continue her encroachments, and the point of our resistance must at last arrive, when we should have diminished means of contending with her. It was evident we must, under the present aspect of affairs, arm to the amount of a war establishment; and under such circumstances, what would become of the economy of peace, which was the benefit most expected and most desired from it? He begged nevertheless to be understood as far from advising that the country should be rashly plunged into war. Perhaps that event might be still averted by a firm, dignified, and vigorous remonstrance; but whether such a representation might have its due weight and effect, when urged by those who had hitherto spoken only in the tone of acquiescence and submission, was, indeed, a matter of very grave and serious reflection. He should trouble the House no farther than to observe, that if unfortunately we should be compelled to a renewal of hostilities, it would not be a contest for our honour, though that would be a legitimate cause for war; nor for the rights and the independence of other nations, though that also would be a legitimate cause of war; but it would be a struggle for the very existence of the empire; and relying on the justice of our cause, and on that most valuable of all our resources (which, he trusted, we should ever most carefully cherish and foster), the generous spirit and magnanimous fortitude of the people, he hoped we might look with confidence to a favourable result.

Sir Francis Burdett said, that in his mind, the speeches he had heard on both sides excited the greatest degree of surprise; for they presented to him the most extraordinary portrait of a debate he had ever beheld. He agreed, however, in many points urged by those in whose opinions he had often concurred; and also in many that were advanced by gentlemen with whom he never before had the good fortune to concur in opinion. As to the speech of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, if it did not provoke and incite to war, it appeared to him the most strange and disinterested exertion he had ever witnessed. Indeed, that hon. gentleman had depicted, with great truth, the melancholy state of the country, arising out of the gigantic aggrandizement and accumulating resources of France. Without pretending to any great degree of political sagacity, it was easy to foresee that that aggrandizement, seconded by all its concomitant circumstances, must be a source of alarm and of danger to Great Britain. What was now the extent of France, or of French influence? Was she bounded but by the Alps, the Pyrenees, the Rhine, and the Ocean? Was she not said to possess forty or fifty millions of inhabitants, not like those of our Eastern dominions, but a race of men active, hardy, brave, industrious, warlike and well-disciplined; possessing the most fertile territories, fostered by a most genial climate; commanding an immense line of coast, with numberless most opportune harbours; countenanced almost by all Europe as her allies, and having acquired by war innumerable resources for the prosecution of new wars, and crowning all these advantages with the dazzling splendour of recent victories, and the fascinating lustre of military renown? So formidable a situation could not be contemplated by an Englishman without dismay, and no man could be more deeply alarmed at it than he was. But at the same time that he confessed the alarming nature of our situation, was it not extraordinary that those who have accumulated against us this mountain of dangers and difficulties, should be the most forward to exaggerate them: that they should be the loudest in stating the result of their own conduct and counsels, and the most studious in detailing the perils with which their imprudence, their obstinacy, or their infatuation, have encompassed the country? Nothing surely could be more extraordinary, except the advice they now offer us. They advise us—to do what? Why, to pursue the same mad career they themselves had run before, and to choose the same person for our guide who has plunged us in all the perils and perplexities which they now so pathetically, but so preposterously deplore. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham) exemplified his terror and surprise at the aggrandizement of France, by supposing a man to arise out of his grave seven or eight years after his death, and upon taking a survey of Europe, to ask what is become of Brabant, what is become of Piedmont, what of Genoa, what of all Italy? Who could so well answer the queries of such a man as the right hon. gentleman, or how could he better resolve such questions than by a simple detail of his own administration? But, after all, what is the blame now imputed to ministers? That they made peace without foreseeing what advantages France would derive from peace; and that they do not now hold a bold and blustering language, while it is confessed that, if they again tried the chances of war, there would scarcely be any hope of their doing any thing effectual. Would to God no greater faults could be imputed to the present or to the late administration! Almost never did it fall to his lot to approve the measures of administration; but if the peace which the present administration had concluded was liable to objections, those objections were not imputable to them. If any faults or blame attended the negotiation of the peace, they were not fairly ascribable to ministers: for they arose out of the nature of the war itself, and the principles upon which it was conducted. Did not the ministers of this country endeavour by every means to surround France with a confederacy of despots, by which they left her no choice but resistance and victory, or tame submission to the dictates of foreign powers? Hence the enthusiasm with which France was fired; hence those energies which she has so triumphantly displayed, and from the exertion of which flow all the consequences which are now deemed so humiliating to our pride, and so fatal to our security. But an hon. gentleman says, that he voted for peace as an experiment. Surely the changes and chances that may arise from war or peace, are not of a nature to be trifled with, and the hazarding of such experiments cannot be said to argue any great wisdom or prudence. He was led much more to adopt the sentiments of another hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce); sentiments, however, which he could not but hear with surprise, from a person who had been a zealous and uniform supporter of the war, but which certainly, as far as his judgment went, laid down the true policy which this country ought to pursue; for nothing now was so absurd as any attempt to renew or preserve what was called a balance of power in Europe. The experience of the last ten years abundantly evinced that absurdity; and though that system was formerly countenanced by some of our enlightened statesmen, yet a change of circumstances rendered it now impossible, at least as far as England could attempt to influence it. The hon. baronet next proceeded to his more particular objections to the proposed address. It stated that we should look with watchfulness to the state of Europe, and seemed to intimate that we should catch at an opportunity of renewing hostilities. Such an expression he could not but consider as imprudent, for it argued an inclination, without a consciousness of ability to give it effect; in such language there was little of wisdom or of dignity. The other passage he had to object to, was that which alluded to the advantages of the union with Ireland. Ireland had reaped no advantages from what had been commonly called the union, but which in truth should be called her subjugation; if any advantage was derived from it, it was experienced only by ministers, who drew from it an additional phalanx to strengthen their ranks in that House. He was disposed most cordially again to agree with an hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce), with whom he scarcely ever agreed before, that ministers should exert every means to restore the just rights of the people, to consult their ease, to get acquainted with their opinions and wishes, and to employ every endeavour to conciliate their confidence and affections. But could this be done without a due reform in the representation of the people? Impossible! that alone can unite the hearts and draw forth the unanimous exertions of the people; that alone can snatch us from the dangers which press upon the country. The term Jacobin was again revived: when gentlemen make use of it, they should endeavour in some way to define its meaning; of late it was applied to all those who ventured to reprove the tyrannical and oppressive measures of government, or who attempted to discountenance the principles of Toryism which were endeavoured to be set up in the country. If it was really the wish of ministers to rally and unite all honest men in defence of the constitution and the country, let them hold out some principle for which they will fight; a principle that can win their hearts, and gain their understandings. For his part, he believed the principle of reform would have great weight with the people to that effect; and under the present circumstances, he did not see that any other principle would enable the country to cope with France, and rise above the difficulties with which it was now threatened. One word about another topic which had emphatically been insisted upon, he meant the abilities and services of the leader of the late administration. In his absence he would say but little on that point. His character required but few words to describe it, they were these:—Satis eloquentiæ, sapientiæ parvum: but much of what that right hon. gentleman had little, was now required to rescue us from the many perils with which we were assailed. As to the question of peace or war, he congratulated the country on our impossibility to attempt the former. Such an attempt in the present state of Europe, would betray not a spirit of hostility, but of insanity; but as this topic had been already so much discussed, he should not dwell upon it, but content himself with concurring in the address as far as it went, to encourage and maintain the continuance of peace.

Mr. Johnstone approved of the conduct of ministers, in endeavouring to maintain peace, and was sorry to see them deserted by their former friends, while they were attacked by gentlemen of such formidable abilities. Indeed, it was but too evident that endeavours were making to remove them from office. The conduct of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham), and that of his friend, gave him much surprise; for after the Netherlands, and in a great measure, Holland have been abandoned to the French, was it prudent to instigate a war for interests in which we were so remotely concerned, and when our interference could not be attended with success? Equally must he disapprove of all attempts to renew continental alliances with Austria, at least till other powers were inclined to co-operate with us. These powers should court our alliance, not we theirs. He trusted ministers would persevere in the system they had hitherto pursued, that they would remain calm and moderate, and not expose the country to the chances of war, unless our naval power was attacked, or our colonial possessions invaded.

Earl Temple animadverted on that part of the speech of sir F. Burdett where the present power of France was ascribed to the attempts of a confederacy of despots to dictate to her. While these despots acted with this country, they were the objects of that hon baronet's spleen and invective; but now that the despotism of Europe was united in one hand, and directed against this country, it was no longer assailed with those invectives. But he principally rose to notice a phrase which was used on both sides of the House; namely, that he and his friends wished for war at any rate in preference to peace. To such an assertion he must give a flat denial. They had no wish for war, they saw all its dangers, and were ready to confess the almost impossibility of success under the present circumstances. Their object was, to open the eyes of the people, and enable them to see the real dangers of the country; how its dignity suffered; how its interests were impaired; and how impossible it was to look for safety in war, or security in peace, under an administration like the present. A storm was ready to burst upon us; but were they the men that could enable us to escape it? Would not they rather act as dull conductors (and so much the worse from being dull) to draw down and scatter wider the lightnings that were to consume us? They had no right to call upon the country to go to war. When they made peace, they pledged themselves to resist the future aggrandizement of France. That promise they had not kept; on the contrary, every step of aggrandizement on the part of France had been followed on their parts with a proportionate disarming. The address was filled with a maukish mixture of pretended firmness and conciliation; but, as far as it thanked the bounty of Heaven for a plentiful harvest, it should have his concurrence.

General Maitland said, that our effective force was greater than it had been in any former peace, or even in several years of the late war. With regard to our fleet, no blame could attach to ministers for its diminution, as there were 48,000 sailors, from which any deficiency might be supplied, should circumstances render an augmentation necessary. Much had been said of the insufficiency of confidence, credit, and capital, on which we relied for the stability of our commerce, and how little they would avail us whenever Buonaparté should think fit to throw his sword into the scale. Now, he thought this very apprehension was the best security for our commerce. Commerce never flourished under a tyrannical government; it could only find its way into a free government, without ambition or passion for conquest. A right hon. gentleman had said that, weighing all the circumstances of our situation, the tendency of his mind was for war. If war could remedy the evils of which he complained, this advice might be good; but it could not. War would not change the situation of France in Europe. We might, indeed, take her colonies, sweep the ocean of her ships, and by ruining her trade destroy her finances. But what would be the result of all this? Why she would do as she had done before. She would make some neighbouring state her bank, and draw upon it for the reimbursement of her losses. If the states of Europe were full of health and vigour, he was not prepared to say, that we ought not to make an effort to recover from France what was lost in Europe. But that was not the case; and therefore any such attempt must prove abortive.

The Secretary at War said:—I am surprised that any gentleman should say that we have no army, and that we have laid aside our navy. So far is this assertion from being founded in fact, that we have a greater efficient force than we ever possessed in peace, or even in several years of the late war. The diminution made in it is only of the corps that were enlisted for a specific time, of the militia, and of a number of the fencible corps that were raised upon the same terms with respect to the duration of their service. Thus our physical force is not only greater than at the periods I have already mentioned, but it is in a state of organization and discipline for the purpose of carrying it, whenever necessary, to such a state of augmentation, as would make it not a very pleasant thing for any foreign force to meddle with it. An hon. gentleman has asked, where is our channel fleet? We have not, to be sure, 30 or 40 sail of the line lying at Spithead, but we have a fleet greater than ever it was in a peace, or even during part of the late war—not stationed in one port, I allow, but scattered over the world, in the West Indies, in the Mediterranean, and several other places; in none of which is it insufficient to meet any force that France could muster against it. I was glad to hear the speech of the noble lord, because until I heard it, I was at a loss to come to any practical conclusion upon the argument of the gentlemen who have taken the same course. That the situation of France is formidable, that she has attained a power and influence greater than may be compatible with our interests, and that, as such, she should be viewed with considerable anxiety by this country, are points which no man attempts to disguise; but the tendency of their speeches beyond that I did not know. The speech, however, of the noble lord, discloses their ulterior views. From the speech of a right hon. member yesterday, I thought their object was to renew the war; but to-day, I find it is the dismissal of ministers. It is manly in the noble lord to avow it, thinking, as he does, that himself and his friends could fill their places much better. This, then, being the noble lord's opinion, why not bring the question before the House, instead of drawing a gloomy picture of our affairs, and exaggerating the dangers of the country with a view to make it discontented with the present administration? That administration the noble lord described as a maukish milk and water composition. Should the noble lord and his friends succeed in their plans to come into office, I do not know whether it will be a maukish administration; but I must say, it will not be one without insolence. We did not come into office by cabal or intrigue. Whatever may be our deficiencies, it would at least be said of us, that we gave peace to the country, and that it suffered no calamity in our hands.

Mr. Fox said:—Sir, it has been to me a source of the liveliest satisfaction to hear the warm eloquence of the youthful lord. I have heard also with pleasure, the avowal of the object of his arguments, and the conclusion that he has drawn from them; for I see, that all those tropes and figures, all the metaphors and imagery which have adorned the speeches of the noble lord and his friends, in abundance sufficient to make an epic poem, have had for their only object a change of ministers, by substituting a part of the last administration in the room of the present. Thanks to this candid avowal, I can now read of intrigues and changes to effect a return of certain persons to office, not, I admit, with absolute indifference, but with something like it, because I find, that in the event of their being restored we shall get rid of all their warlike language, the country will be flourishing and happy, and all the horrors with which we are threatened from France will have passed away: we shall then have an administration, containing a great name, that will be in itself a tower of strength to the country, and sufficient for every purpose of its defence, security, and happiness, without the assistance of fleets and armaments. But this is not the only cause of joy that I find in the speech of the noble lord. It supplies another fruitful source of pleasing consolation. When people seek to change an administration by speeches and declarations calculated to throw an odium upon it, they always choose some popular topics. The declaration therefore of the noble lord, that his object is not to renew the war, plainly shows to me, that the disposition of the country is pacific, and that a war would be unpopular. I entertained that sentiment before, and have now the satisfaction of finding it confirmed by the noble lord's speech. I shall not be ungrateful for the pleasure, and will repay it as well as I can. After the political course that I have taken, and the efforts that I have made in this House, it would be strange indeed if I should entertain a wish to represent an attempt to change an administration as unconstitutional and unwarrantable. The object of the noble lord, therefore, as a principle, I cannot disapprove; but in the mode to attain it, I wish he had taken example from the opposition of which I formed a part, and, by pursuing their line of conduct on similar occasions, endeavoured to effect his purpose in a fair and regular way. The right hon. the secretary at war says, "if we be an incompetent administration, without ability to fill our station, bring that question to issue directly, and try it fairly." Now though this may be an open and candid proposition, I do not think it is a fair answer, because it is not the course that practice and experience would warrant him to adopt. There are other ways by which the object might be more regularly attained. If the noble lord has reason to think that there is any thing improper in the conduct of administration, if he is dissatisfied with any of their measures on points of serious magnitude, let him take the sense of the House upon it, and it may be afterwards seen whether that particular conduct, or measure, so canvassed and discussed, be sufficient ground for their removal. If ministers were to draw a gloomy picture of the state of the country, not warranted by actual circumstances, and having thus excited an unfounded alarm, should advise his majesty to arm to an extent beyond what was necessary, that I conceive would be a fair question to submit to the House with a view to their removal. But it would be going too far, to say at once, without a fair and constitutional inquiry into their conduct, "we dislike the present administration; it is a maukish, milk, and water composition: we would like another better, and therefore we must get rid of it." The right hon. gentleman also says, that he or his friends did not seek their offices, or owe them to intrigue. Now, with regard to how they came into office, though I have generally approved their conduct since, I am not prepared to give my approbation to that question. The late ministers assigned a certain principle as the cause of their removal. If, then, the present came in upon a contrary principle, and to prevent the extension of rights to a great portion of his majesty's subjects to which they were clearly entitled, I must condemn the way in which they came into office. The noble lord's speech also contained a censure upon an hon. baronet (sir F. Burdett); it charges him with having been tremblingly alive to the interests of France when threatened by a foreign foe, while he has no feeling for his own country in a similar situation. To this I answer that the cases are not parallel, that there is no similitude between them. When Prussia, Austria, and England, joined to overturn the new government of France; when the mode of carrying their design into execution was to invade that country, to attack her towns and cities, is that I ask, a parallel with our situation? Is the recent interference in Switzerland like the attempt of Austria to restore the crown of France to the House of Bourbon? There is no resemblance between the two cases. But what is the spirit and feeling shown by the noble lord who is ready to censure the want of them in another? He puts England in precisely the same situation in which France was when the duke of Brunswick issued his proclamation, threatening not to leave one stone upon another, and yet, he says, he does not advise her to go to war for her defence. In this view the spirit of the noble lord is very far below the spirit evinced by the hon. baronet. But what is the state of things that calls forth all these apprehensions? We are told that if a man were to rise from the dead, and to ask what was become of the twenty independent states which he had left behind him, he would be told they were all sunk and destroyed under the power of France, except England. But might he not be tempted to ask, who were the ministers of England when all these changes happened, and why they did not prevent them? He might probably presume, that they wanted vigour, that they let the giant quietly attain his full growth; but what would he say, when he should be undeceived, and told that ministers had been constantly making vigorous attacks upon him from his cradle, but that they were ill-directed, and incapable of effecting their purpose? It was rightly observed, that France cannot remain in the formidable state in which she now is. I do not like to go into a history of these things, and shall only notice a few in illustration of this observation. How did you proceed against France? you threatened her very vitals. That proceeding roused a spirit of resistance; and the minds of her people being heated by the alternative which you offered of a government at your hands or destruction, an enthusiasm was excited, and the country was roused to exertions beyond her natural strength. That spirit, no doubt, did not last; but then, the impulse once given, she was enabled to continue those extraordinary exertions, and persevere in the career which it had opened. Look to the Netherlands in the time of king William, and you will there also discover a spirit of energy far beyond the natural strength of the country. And to what is it to be attributed? why to the oppression of Philip 2nd, and to the attack of Louis the 14th. Until these powers interfered, the Netherlands were nothing; but after this provocation their energy was excited, and they rose to a flourishing state. I grant that Holland, from its size, was not formidable, but rather a subject of admiration; but then the cause that effected this change was the same that operated in France, where it would have produced no greater consequence, had the country been of the same extent. I am far from saying, that France, in process of time, must fall to the state of Holland. She will fall to the state of the first country upon the continent; but she will not retain that quantity of spirit or peculiar force formidable to the safety of other nations which she at present possesses. I am no advocate for France, but I am a friend to common sense; and that informs us, that there may be many things which, however we may regret, we cannot cure. I give the hon. gentleman credit for his quotation from Machiavel. The principle has my full approbation; and relying upon it, I do believe there are many things in France that we now dislike, which time will alleviate. We are told, that France has taken several steps, since the definitive treaty, which are aggressions; but why I know not. The principle of the indemnities in Germany is as old as the treaty of Luneville, and older. Secularisations were the means for carrying it into effect, and you knew it; for if you read the public prints, you must have learned that the principle existed at that time, and that such was the mode by which it was carried into effect, and, knowing it, you signed the treaty of Amiens. Now this is called an aggression; but if it be a violence it is also a violence of the court of Petersburg, which is alike with France a party in the business; and if so, why does not the House ring with the perfidy and violence of the court of Petersburg? But we are told the elector was particularly concerned in the arrangement of this business. Now it has been the policy laid down by all wise statesmen, that the interests of England and Hanover are perfectly separate, just as separate as the interests of England and Hesse Cassel, or any other state in Germany. I therefore see in the case the elector of Hanover only, and not the sovereign whom we all revere. Is the business of the indemnities then, I ask, in that view an aggression against Great Britain? I now come to Switzerland. Dreadful as the two partitions of Poland were, they were not a greater source of regret than this. I love the people of Switzerland; I have known and seen their happiness. It has been, at different times, the refuge of liberty; and I lament the fate that has befallen it, proportionably with the pride and happiness which they placed in the enjoyment of independence. But the case of Switzerland is admitted to be no ground of war, and consequently can be no aggression against Great Britain; for I presume it will not be contended that an aggression is not a ground of war. But was not Switzerland in the hands of the French at the very time of the treaties of Luneville and Amiens? It certainly was, and, a considerable dissention having since arisen in that country, France has interfered. Now, are we the guarantees of the whole world? Whatever name you choose to give to the conduct of France in Switzerland, you cannot call it an aggression against Great Britain. The true cause of all this complaint is this: Switzerland is a great accession to France; but when you made the peace, did not you see that Switzerland, whether divided into small cantons, or large cantons, whatever the form of its government, or the state of its parties, was in the power of France? Did you not hear it stated, and did you not know that the peace left her in the power of France? But it is said, that France has extended her territory since the peace. Now, before the treaty of Amiens, she had annexed the Netherlands, she had gained Savoy, and made various other acquisitions; but all these are nothing to what she has gained since the peace; yet Switzerland she had before, and all she has gained in Piedmont is to have changed it from the 29th military department, as she formerly called it, into the department of the Po, or some such name. Now, how is this an aggression against England? We did not stipulate for the king of Sardinia. You gave up the king of Sardinia in the definitive treaty; and if so, you have no right to bring him into account now against France as matter subsequent to the peace. In the guilt, however, of this desertion, we were not without an accomplice. Russia was applied to in favour of the king of Sardinia, and shown, I understand, a disposition to interfere; but what said Austria? "There are too many of us here already. There is no room for him here. If he is to get any thing here, you will be wanting, perhaps, a slice from me of Venice to compensate the petty prince of whose territory he gets a share."—Sir, another consideration arises in my mind—what may be expected to be the state of our finances, should war be renewed? This, I know is dross to some men. Oh what is money? What is wealth? You will tell me we have three or four millions of surplus, and what have the French? And then one hon. gentleman breaks out in the style and strain of heroic enterprise and chivalry. Why, Sir, upon the subject of great attention to wealth, I may perhaps be as careless as any man. One of the most ancient and beautiful of our poets, says—

Reward of worldly muck doth foully blend,
And low abase the high heroic spirit,
That joys for crowns.

Sir, these may be riches, but they are not the riches fit for the people of England. Equal military force with France we cannot have. We must therefore supply the impossibility of having an equal army, by the superiority of our navy, and by that steady and systematic economy which may enable us to remedy that military deficiency. To talk otherwise is talking the language of children. But, says an hon. gentleman, the thief is at the door, and you are rich, and so much the better for him. My answer is, that it is better to prevent his entrance, than to have a gun or weapon oneself to resist him when he has entered; and that it is more prudent to procure the means of purchasing those who may defend us from such an attack. Sir, I know there are short answers to all these arguments; for one cannot but see how frequently extremes meet. It was said, I remember, of the Jacobins, that they despised all experience, laughed at the evidence of history, and desired us to throw our books into the sea. The same assertions are now used: the same arguments are enforced when we attempt to quote history; and the right hon. gentleman is fully prepared with his poetical appendages in support of his opinion. Sir, reasoning upon past experience, may perhaps, in this new situation of the world, be bad; but whether it be not at least as good as reasoning upon warm, unintelligible, impassioned feelings, I leave those who hear me to decide. Sir, I confess, for one, that I like the support of deficient history, and deficient I am willing to confess it is, better than the feelings of men who set out with confessing themselves to be frightened out of all bounds. Upon the greatness and power of France, I will make some remarks by-and-by; but I must first advert to two or three arguments which have been used with respect to the cessions that we were to make. Some gentlemen say, "Don't surrender Malta; don't surrender the Cape." I say, Sir, don't surrender Malta while a doubt remains upon the fulfilment of the articles of the treaty that relate to that island. Don't surrender the Cape, if the other parts of the treaty be not executed. But if they be fulfilled—if the letter of the bond be executed, why then, I say, cede Malta, give up the Cape, upon the same principle of chivalry to which the right hon. gentleman clings, because you promised to do so, and because the honour of nations is their best and proudest possession. Much has been said of a French paper, in which it is alleged that the treaty of Amiens has consolidated the empire of France. Why, Sir, that treaty did recognize that empire, and by making peace, did confess that the situation of that empire, was no further ground of quarrel. I repeat, therefore, that the greatness of France was no longer any ground of quarrel. Why then, Sir, the question would be only a question of expediency. Undoubtedly, if that greatness should be abused; if it should be exercised in such a way as to affect the honour of Great Britain, then, indeed, we should be called upon for a different mode of conduct. Sir, there is one species of warfare, of the success of which, without in the smallest degree doubting the skill and valour of either our soldiers or seamen, I confess I am not very sanguine. There is another kind of warfare, a more important one, perhaps, upon which I am less sanguine. If gentlemen mean to recommend a system of warfare by continental connexions, by making an impression upon the continent of France by those connexions, I, for one, cannot be sanguine with respect to the success of such a war. I do not mean to go into all the arguments used by the hon. gentleman who opened the debate; but I do believe the policy to be in general a right one. I do think, without entertaining too much national jealousy, that a man might read the history of continental wars down to the peace of 1763, and say, that, except from the conferences of Gertruydenberg to the peace of Utrecht, not one war had been unjustifiably undertaken by this country. But the case is altered now. That which was a doubtful feeling, is now become a question of necessity. Will any man, after the experience of the last war, contend, that a connexion with German princes against France is likely to be more successful in future, than it was during that war? Sorry am I to hear any member assert, that we are looking forward to those connexions. Sorry should I be to hear it insinuated, that his majesty's ministers were looking forward to those connections with a view of renewing the war. I remember what was said by an hon. member, that there was every reason to suppose, in the two treaties of peace with France that preceded the present, aye, and in the peace of 1749, France was meditating the means of resuming hostilities. But let not such an accusation be brought against the ministers of Great Britain. Sir, we are all agreed upon one point, that this is not the moment to avail ourselves of the assistance of Austria. Then let us not be too eager in looking forward to that connexion as an available resource in future—for, see what effect you will produce. If you suffer it to be supposed that you do look to Austria as the power upon which you rely to check and curb the ambition of France, what additional motives do you not hold out to France to cripple and diminish the power of Austria? Sir, this is not a wise system of conduct—it is not a prudent one—it is not a generous one. But, in addition to the other aggressions of France which gentlemen have enumerated, some gentlemen have mentioned the furious hatred of the First Consul to us. There is, indeed, a species of hatred which we may always expect even in time of peace, a hatred proceeding from rivalry; but let it not be supposed that all the irritation is on one side. I wish not to state circumstances too humbly, nor at the same time too proudly for us. But if France be too powerful upon the continent of Europe, can we disguise that our naval superiority is an object of great jealousy to many of the powers upon the continent? If France inspired alarms by her armies, do we inspire none by our fleets? If there was an assembly like this in France, might they not speak of our naval superiority in something like the same terms we use in speaking of their military superiority? You say such irritation subsists, and then, by a singular mode of argument, consider the French government as answerable for every libel that is published—that would be dealing out a kind of political justice for the destruction of the press. But let it be recollected, that an imprimatur existed in England a century ago; yet I never heard that Louis the 14th or the Dutch considered every publication in this country as the act of the government. But be it so: the French newspapers are irritating I grant. Who began the contest, I know not. They have gone the length, I am told, of publishing, in an English paper, printed at Paris, that the Irish are absolved from their allegiance. One number of that paper I certainly saw; but I found my friends spoken ill of in it, and myself abused; and as I have no satisfaction in hearing them ill spoken of, and as little in hearing myself abused, I never read more than that one number. But let me ask gentlemen, have the English newspapers said nothing? Have they been conciliatory? To the shame of the country, I have heard that a paragraph has been inserted in one of them, declaring that Englishmen ought to fight Buonaparté with fleets and armies, but that Frenchmen ought to fight him with something more than the pen. Is not this, I ask, an instigation to the assassination of that person? [Several members cried, No! No! No!]

—No, Sir! What then is it an instigation to do? I grant, that, in a prosecution for such a paragraph, ingenious counsel might contend that it was not. They might assert it to be a hint to insurrection, which, in certain cases, might be justifiable. But no man, I am sure, whatever his political sentiments may be, will view an instigation to assassination without horror and disgust. Yet let us allow then that the irritation is not all on one side; that the French newspapers are not the only ones that are irritating. Oh, but next comes this—Napper Tandy has been received in France. I certainly do not know the conditions of his pardon; but there are other Irish at Paris—where are they to be received? You say that they shall not be received but by a government at peace with Great Britain. You did not mean, I suppose, that they should not be landed on any inhabited part of the globe.—And then come the arguments founded upon the propriety of keeping up the public spirit. If it be right to do so, I should think that that spirit would be more likely to be raised by the introduction of some practical improvement in the constitution. If that, however, be not thought fit, the best other way would be, an assurance that you will not call upon the people to give their support to wars, but from urgent, proved, and absolute necessity. Sir, is the publication of libels, is the making of irritating speeches against the government of France, the best way of raising that spirit? Is it a fair, is it a manly way? Who began that paper contest I know not. It has been much in use on both sides. But, notwithstanding the splendid state drawn by the partizans of their respective countries, many philosophical persons on each side, look on this war of words with contempt. Yet, if we must fight, I had rather it should be in this than in any other way. If there be a certain quantity of bile which it is necessary to exhaust; if there be a certain quantity of invective which it is wished to consume, why then, let the fight be continued—let paper contend with paper; let the Moniteur fight it out with The Morning Post; but let not the two countries be involved in the quarrel.—There is another point which is worthy of our consideration. You have just sent an ambassador to France, a nobleman of great abilities, of frank and amiable manners, a man every way qualified for the important situation;—you have sent him, and what is he to be? The representative of the sovereign—the representative of the British nation. Is it, then, dignified or decent, when he is making his bows, and paying the accustomed tributes of respect and friendship, that we shall be calling names, and applying opprobrious epithets to that person whom we are treating in another place, through the medium of our ambassador, with such courtesy and respect? Sir, I am not disposed to deny that the crisis is momentous, that it is critical. I do not look at the power of France without feelings of dread; but I cannot see any reason, either in France or here, that should make me think irritating language the most likely means of curbing that power, or of reducing it. Always let it be recollected too, that we shall not be stronger in war for using such language before it.—Sir, with respect to our peace establishment, I hope and trust it will not be greater than is absolutely necessary. And here I must take notice of what I consider to be a most unjust charge against ministers. It has been asked, could we have thought at the time peace was made, that ministers would have so disarmed? Why, Sir, I suggested an observation at that time, that the army was too high; and I was answered, that I was not to take that establishment then as the fair peace establishment. Here, then, I contend, that the gentlemen who now bring forward this charge had fair notice of the reduction; yet they never objected to it at the time. Sir, if the country, contrary to my opinion certainly, thinks that her safety consists in a large peace establishment, she has a right to adopt such a measure, without France having any right to be alarmed. But I, for one, think, that a large establishment, as bringing with it great additional expense, will tend to enfeeble the country; and I own, too, I have other objections founded upon constitutional principles. These I shall not argue now; but I must say, that a very extended army has always been one of the most to be dreaded means of influence on the part of the crown, ever since the revolution of 1688. In exciting our alarms at the present crisis, one gentleman says, “but think of your commerce.” I do not know whether he did not endeavour to increase our apprehensions, by informing us that France was cutting a canal. Another gentleman supposes that France will be too patrician, too noble, to think of commerce; that she will take the military part, and issue orders to Genoa and Amsterdam to rival the trade of Great Britain. Nothing more easy, perhaps that gentleman thinks. But no, says a third: she will do it herself—she is making ports, cutting canals, increasing in activity and vigour. And what is the remedy they recommend for such a state? War. Take care, they say, that you do not engage with France in commerce—take care of your manufactures—look at the French ones—Why, Sir, certainly, the French manufactures are beautiful. But I would still venture to assert, that our Staffordshire ware would stand a comparison with the Seve manufactory, not perhaps in look or in colour altogether, but in all other respects. But you say, Go to war. In that way the French are innocent; there is no reason to dread their bayonets and their requisitions; but for God’s sake take care, they add, of this rivalry of commerce. But, Sir, if you go to war, and have no commerce, and no money, why then certainly you get rid of the thief from your door. A noble lord takes a different ground. He says, the whole object is a change of administration, and the acquisition of better ministers—an open confession certainly. Sir, what I recommend is, not to adhere to ancient policy strictly, but to adopt a system of vigilance. If ministers shall ever state that acts of aggression have been committed against the country, the country, I will venture to say, will be responsive to their call. But let us not be too much alive to the evil which we have ourselves occasioned. Let not our too nice fears involve us in difficulty and danger. Let us remember that we are weak for any attack upon the continent of France; let us recollect that we are strong to repel any attack that may be made upon us. That is the principle upon which we should proceed, and it is on that ground that I agree to the address. I will only repeat, that what I have heard in this House, and out of it, has concurred with my hope, that the sense of the country is strongly for peace, and that that sense will influence the conduct of his majesty's ministers. Before I sit down, however, I wish to say one word upon what has fallen from the hon. member for Liverpool. He acknowledges that our manufactures and revenue are flourishing, but considers our trade to have rather declined since the peace. Sir, if that were to be made use of as an argument, we should never be able to make peace. I rather believe that in the three last treaties of peace, in the peace of 1749, 1763, and 1783, there was a diminution of our commerce for some time afterwards. Yet let gentlemen see how far that consideration would carry us—it would be an eternal argument against peace. But this carrying-trade is alleged to be so material—France consumes our manufactures—I am glad she does. I could have wished, indeed, that commercial regulations had been adopted between the two countries. But after the regulations that we have made against the introduction of foreign manufactures into this country, we must not think that we have a right to complain because other nations resort to a similar mode of conduct. I regret, certainly, those restrictions which prevail to so great a degree in France, because I think that they place commerce upon an erroneous foundation. But we have no right to interfere. We have had before, treaties of the strictest friendship and alliance with other nations; and yet, during the very existence of those treaties, reciprocal commercial prohibitions have been strictly enforced.

Mr. Windham said, that his habits of debate had not been such as to give him a command of that ready, flexible, and discriminating recollection, for which Mr. Fox was eminently remarkable. But he thought it incumbent on him to attempt some reply to those things which were the most revolting to his judgment, and which had the most forcibly impressed themselves upon his remembrance. How was it possible for that hon. gentleman to deny to the penetration of his own mind, that these seeds of inordinate political aggrandizement were sown in the minds of the French nation, coeval with those of democratical revolution? Every succession of the revolutionary rulers, had openly professed the very principles which so conspicuously possessed the mind of the present first consul. The extension of dominion was made at one time the very pride of the revolution; at another, its necessary defence. But still it was, in one form or another, for one purpose or another, the most confidently professed. And was it for any man to come into that House, and offer an encomiastic apology for the first efforts of a principle, which had been thus carried, of deep design, and by no inevitable necessity, to its present threatening and overpowering height? It had been said, that Britain had gained nothing by the war—that France had acquired nothing by the peace. Was it, then, nothing gained, to preserve our constitution; to hold at bay both the revolutionary principles, and the political ambition of the French; to maintain that erect, independent, national spirit, which had so long constituted the very essence of the British character? Was it nothing to confine within the limits of Europe an ambition to bestride, as but a petty space, the very world? Buonaparte, with the soul of an Alexander, might regard this many-peopled earth as but a large prison; and was it nothing to confine that restless spirit within a space which might, to its hopes and darings, be but a narrow cell? The French had gained nothing by the peace! Was it nothing to have procured those restraints, which they could neither burst through nor surmount, to be voluntarily withdrawn? The preliminaries of peace—the treaty of Amiens—had they not, like the spell of a magician, like the movement of some talisman, laid open, in an instant, to France, the obstructed passages to the West Indies, to Africa, to Asia, to every region to which she might otherwise have long struggled in vain to make her way? The sudden restitution of St. Domingo to the dominion of France—was not that an effect of the peace? To what but the peace did she owe the advantages of that access which she gained by the acquisition of Louisiana to the back settlements of America? While the issue of the contest remained yet uncertain, France planned that confirmed power in Italy to which she had since attained. We may judge whether France has not gained by the peace, by reflecting, whether, if we were now to renew the war, we could renew it with all those pledges for success which we held in our hands at the cessation of hostilities? The hon. gentleman has talked of the irritations of a paper war between the two countries, of its contemptible meanness, and of its being yet more foolish than irritating. But if we are to shut out from the people of this country all knowledge of the designs and conduct of the French rulers, it were difficult to understand how they should be prepared to meet any meditated hostilities with just indignation and resolution, till they were at our very gates, or rather kindling to a conflagration the very fires on our hearths. The hon. gentleman talks of the error of fine spun and distant speculations; then refers us to Machiavel for an account of the wonderful and happy things to be expected from the blessed agency of time and chance. But time and chance rarely do much in favour of men who can do nothing to support themselves. To time and chance none ever trusted less than the French. Who would bet upon the uncertainties of the dice, when he might venture his money upon the sure calculations to which it is possible to subject a game at chess? Look back to the most distant æra of French ambition to sway in the system of Europe. Buonapartè has but accomplished schemes that were conceived by Henry 4th, and his minister Sully, and have been ever since uniformly pursued. And, is it in this state of things that the hon. gentleman is to come, and, with a voice than which an enemy's ambassador could propose nothing more dangerous, to call to us, that we have nothing left but to trust to time and chance; to be quiet, lest we should be attacked; to dread the force of a population so much superior to our own: to hope well of our commerce, but to be comforted in the thought, that, when our trade and wealth are ravished from us, we shall have nothing left to provoke an enemy's desires? Did Buonaparte send a friend to solicit the interests of his ambition in this country; what else could he wisely enjoin him, to dissolve all manly resolution in the hearts of our people, than by such arguments to impress a general persuasion of the necessity to lay us hopelessly down in the charms of such a peace? Examples had been quoted from history, to show that France was weakened by her conquests; that she would break in pieces like the Roman empire; but what consolation did this give? The Roman empire had subsisted 400 years in all its extent; and if France were to over-run all Europe, it surely was no great comfort to think that, by some accident in the course of 400 years, it might again be rescued! From a comparison between the safety of peace and the safety of war, he inferred, that war would have enabled us to secure more than peace gave us a chance of securing. He then adverted with severity to the language which had been held as to continental connections; that we were "too honest" to deal with the princes of the continent, &c. He said that the complaints against the continental powers in this war were ill-founded. We had given money; but surely it would not be said that, doing so, we had done more than Austria, which had contributed the bravery and the blood of her armies. It was not true that Austria abandoned us. She gave up the contest, not yielding, but, as it were, driven out of the line. He reprobated the unfeeling language of those who said that Austria had done nothing in comparison with us. A day might come when such reproaches from us would be remembered by the continental powers. Nothing could more tend to alienate those powers from us, and a day might come when it might be necessary for us to look for their co-operation or their aid. With respect to what had been said against all deep-laid schemes, and all plans in concert with other powers, being unadvisable, and that we should trust to chance, it was reversing the old maxim, "nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia!" it was abandoning wisdom, making a surrender of reason and resigning ourselves to chance.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that the speech of the right hon. gentleman ran precisely in the same strain of gloomy despondency as that which he had delivered on the motion for the address. In the present instance, however, his arguments were applicable to a state of war, as well as to a state of peace; though certainly to the latter in the greater degree. The drift of his arguments was, to establish the proposition, that after balancing the considerations on both sides, the country would, upon the whole, be less insecure were it restored to that state from which it was taken by the treaty of Amiens. The right hon. gentleman spoke of the evils which would have been averted had the country remained in the former situation; that the French would not at present be in possession of Louisiana or of St. Domingo, and that the British fleet would retain the superiority in the Mediterranean. The true question, however, for the consideration of the House was, whether upon the whole it were better, for the sake of averting those comparatively lesser evils, to plunge the country again into the calamities of war? The effect of the right hon. gentleman's arguments was not only to renew, but to render war perpetual. A noble lord had advanced a proposition which was not maintainable; namely, that it was impossible hostilities could be renewed. To this proposition he would ever oppose a decided negative. On the first discussion of the question of peace, he had expressly stated, that the war was not discontinued on account of any deficiency in the means of carrying it on; he had disclaimed the plea of necessity, and scouted the idea that this country was driven to the alternative of peace. He therefore would have no hesitation in asserting, that were the honour of the country touched, or its security in danger, it would not only be possible to renew hostilities, but it possessed the means of supporting a contest of seven or eight years duration, without imposing any burthens upon the people but such as would, under all the circumstances of the case, be borne with cheerfulness. With respect to what had fallen from a noble relative of his lordship's in another place, it was impossible for that noble lord to aver, after the part he had taken, that he would not have treated with the present government of France; or to say, that he would not have advised treaties formed on the basis of those proposed at Paris or at Lisle. It could not be contended therefore, when the retention of Ceylon, Trinidad, and the Cape was urged only as the first proposition, that the terms on which the noble lord he alluded to had obviously been willing to conclude peace, could constitute any material difference in the relative situation of either country, compared with the terms of the treaty of Amiens. To return to the observations of the noble lord himself, his declared object was, to change the persons who administered the government of the country. He had described the situation in which he conceived the country to stand; and his principal if not sole charge against ministers was, the imputation of a want of energy and vigour. He would, however, ask the noble lord, what part of their conduct, either before the signature of the preliminary, or in the occurrences since that period, could justify such an imputation? Was there any deficiency in that respect manifested when they dispatched a powerful fleet to the Baltic, in order to follow up with vigour and effect the plan laid by their predecessors for destroying the northern confederacy? or in the means adopted to secure the country from external attack, at a time when the preparations of the enemy menaced us with invasion? Did they betray any degree of neglect or lassitude, when finding by the first intelligence from Egypt that the occasion called for the exertion, they sent regiments of infantry and corps of cavalry to reinforce the army in that quarter? or in detaching a squadron with sir James Saumarez from the force under lord Nelson, to block up the enemy in the harbour of Cadiz, or to defeat them on their own coasts? He could therefore with confidence defy the noble lord to point out a single instance where the conduct of ministers betrayed a want of promptitude or vigour. But, at the period of the peace, the noble lord possibly might say, that all their energy and vigour deserted them. At that eventful period, it appeared, they incurred the censure of the noble lord. In respect to this, he would again ask the noble lord, what specific charge he could urge against them? Was it imputable to them, that the power and influence of France had extended since that period? With a reference to that consideration, could the noble lord justly impute to them a want of energy or vigour? He could not. In one instance, however, he would admit, ministers might possibly have been charged with a want of attention to the strength and security of the country; namely, if they had reduced the establishments which the noble lord, and others on his side of the question, had at one time recommended. He hoped, therefore, the noble lord would expressly state the grounds upon which he brought his charge. If the noble lord should not state some specific grounds, he should be inclined to suspect that his wish was only for a change in the persons of those who administered his majesty's government; that their real crime in the noble lord's eyes was, their continuing to enjoy the confidence of their sovereign, and being instrumental in giving peace to the country. On the meeting of parliament in the October following the period he had alluded to, he had said, that the House, under all the circumstances of the case, were to determine the points then at issue between him and those on the side of the noble lord. He had said then, that if the pacification had the effect of lulling us into a blind security, it would prove, instead of a blessing, a real misfortune; but he at the same time said, that its best prospect of duration lay in our rendering ourselves secure; and that our security was founded in our strength. With respect to what had fallen from an hon. gentleman, relative to the language which had lately appeared in the public prints of the respective countries, he concurred in all his observations; the steps which appeared to be taken for the purpose of producing excesses, he must say, were unworthy the good sense, the prudence, and the manners of the countries. At the same time, he wished not to be understood to say that a finger should be laid upon the freedom of the British press upon that account; God forbid! as the worst consequences such could produce, were light and insignificant, compared with the effect of such an outrage! However, language as reprehensible had proceeded from the other side of the water as what had issued from the press of this country. He had, on a former occasion, stated the degree of his apprehensions from those whose language and exaggerated statements went to place the two countries in a state of hostility: on the other hand, apprehensions were to be entertained from the line of conduct recommended by those who would make any compromise for the preservation of peace. It was the duty and the intention of those who administered his majesty's government to steer between both extremes; and to observe a line of moderation founded upon those principles, in which they deemed the honour and the security of the country to consist. In pursuing that course, they relied upon the approbation of their country, and the support of that House; and from such a course they would not be diverted. On the great and salutary objects they had in view, they would endeavour steadily to fix their eyes, and not to suffer any part of their conduct to militate against the honour of their sovereign, or the true interests of the country.

Lord Morpeth, in allusion to the comparison between the projet of lord Grenville and the treaty of Amiens, observed that by the projet all the interests of this country would have been fully secured, with the advantage of preserving our fidelity to our allies, Portugal, and the house of Orange.

Lord Hawkesbury said, it was not fair to institute a comparison between a projet which was not an ultimatum, and might have been modified, and a treaty actually concluded. At the same time he contended that the treaty of Amiens had secured as effectually in the projet, all the interests of this country, with an equal fidelity to our allies; for an indemnity to the prince of Orange had been stipulated: and although Portugal invaded by a French army, had made a separate peace, we had obtained modifications favourable to her interests.

Mr. Canning contended that in the case in question the projet was a real ultimatum. It was not, as in ordinary cases, a first offer, expected to be reduced by subsequent discussion, but it was presented at the desire of the enemy. It was so framed as to exclude cavil, and it was such as the government was prepared at the time to make their appeal to the country as the test of their moderation. This he could state with something like certainty.

The Address was agreed to nem. con.

[Debate on the Navy Estimates.] Dec. 2. Mr. Alexander brought up the report of the committee of supply. On the motion that the resolution for granting 50,000 seamen for the service of the ensuing year be read a second time,

Mr. T. Grenville said:—I rise, Sir, to express my astonishment at the mode of proceeding which is now proposed; a mode which places the House of Commons in quite a new situation. The minister demands an extraordinary supply of seamen, without condescending to give the least explanation of the reasons which induce the necessity, or the purposes to which he means to apply them. Such conduct is unprecedented, and the House will subscribe to its own disgrace, if it assent to this proposition until the necessary explanation shall be given. The vote in the committee passed without a single observation. Ministers have not thought proper to tell us any of the grounds upon which they have deemed it expedient thus to demand a large disposable force, productive of great expense, without informing us what danger we have to dread, and how far the force demanded will tend to avert that danger. The speech from the throne contained not a sentiment which was not applicable to any period of our history; it was a collection of truisms, without any opinion, or statement peculiarly referring to the present times. How different was the conduct of ministers at the peace of 1763, and at that of 1783. Now, for the first time, a minister opens a session in time of peace with a speech composed of general terms, and applies to parliament for a vote of 50,000 seamen, without describing the necessity which calls for such a force, or enabling us to judge how far this force may be proportioned to that necessity. When the minister, in June last, proposed a vote of 70,000 seamen, he was asked, what would be his probable peace establishment, and he replied, about 30,000. Why, then, does he now require 50,000? What change has taken place in our position? What new and unexpected dangers have arisen? Before we assent to the proposition, I trust the minister will present such materials for our consideration, as may fully qualify us to decide this question. The question upon which we are to determine is this: what is the danger that threatens us, and is the state of our resources and preparation equal to resist it? Among the dangers that threaten us, let us consider the maritime state of Europe. When we look at Russia, in the first instance, we unfortunately find a strong partiality in that power towards the views of France, at least for some time back; though from the moderate character of the present emperor, and some late circumstances, there may be reason to hope that our former relations of cordial friendship with that cabinet will be re-established. I am aware that, in advert- ing to the northern confederacy, I tread on delicate grounds; but, in my opinion, what is called the convention, did not satisfactorily settle the point in dispute with that confederacy; and what the noble secretary of state termed the explanatory convention, involved the matter in still greater perplexity. However, my principal reason for alluding to that confederacy is, to take notice of an expression made use of, on a former occasion, by the noble secretary of state. That noble lord said, that the victory of Copenhagen created an obstacle in the treaty with the northern confederacy, which rendered it the most difficult negotiation in which he had ever been engaged. I must then remark, that the British statesman who could experience a difficulty in his negotiation with an enemy, from one of the most glorious victories ever obtained by the British fleet, and over that very enemy, affords no very flattering prospect of the consequences likely to ensue from his dexterous management at the court of Petersburg, or at any other court in Europe.—But to proceed to a review of the maritime powers of Europe. In Holland, no one can be ignorant that unparalleled exertions are making to restore their navy; that a considerable number of large vessels are now building, and that many have been launched since the peace; and still greater efforts are making to recruit the fleets of France. Before, therefore, we undervalue the naval force of France, we should consider the extent of the whole naval force of Europe; and more, that every acquisition she makes is a deduction from us; that it tells doubly against us; for every cession of territory to France, is an exclusion of England. In the event of a war, the influence she has established on the continent would be sufficient utterly to exclude us; for what assistance could we hope to derive from Portugal? That country dare not, perhaps would not interfere. Let us only consider the state of the Portuguese, from the insult recently offered to a British officer in the port of Lisbon, in the presence of our sovereign's son. Perhaps it may be stated, that some satisfaction has been had; but I would ask, could such an indignity have been offered at a former period to the British flag, while Portugal had the power or the will to respect us? The subserviency of Spain to France no man can doubt, and the endeavours of France to exclude us from every port in the Mediterranean; her pretensions in Africa, and wherever she can interfere with the interests of our navy, must excite the attention of every man. The Morea and the Republic of the Seven Isles are not even safe from her attacks; day after day adds something to her conquests; and if the last rumour can be credited, it is in contemplation to add Tuscany to her dominions. On the subject of Switzerland I cannot help saying a few words. I have been told that a gentleman, holding a high situation, was a considerable time during the disturbances in Switzerland, resident at Constance, and held frequent conferences with the principal directors of the Swiss insurrection. If this anecdote be true, it does not tally with the assertion, that ministers have not committed the honour of the country. To return to the Mediterranean: the French government have succeeded in completely depriving us of every port in that sea, except Malta; and if government do their duty, they will retain that island. It is, I understand, retained; but why, I am ignorant. Is it only held until the court of Petersburg agrees to guarantee it? and does that court decline to join in that guarantee, notwithstanding the positive assertions of the minister that she would? I have no hesitation in saying, that it is incumbent on ministers to retain all the places covenanted by treaty to be given up, which are still in our possession. From the conduct of France since the peace, such a proceeding would be consistent with justice, equity, and policy.—If in Europe the prospect is so discouraging, is there any consolation to be derived from the West or East Indies? Certainly not. We have every reason to apprehend danger to our colonies, particularly Jamaica from the force in St. Domingo; and that danger is aggravated, from a consideration of the force at Louisiana, and the recent cession of Martinique. If so, it is of moment to ascertain whether ministers, at the time they were calling for 50,000 seamen, in the apprehension of war, were justified in giving up the key of the French islands. Wherever we turn our eyes, we must see the progressive aggrandizement of France. She is, I understand, immediately to take possession of Cochin, in the East Indies, a place of no commerce, which can afford no attraction in that way. Then the only use it can be of is, that it will afford opportunities of negotiating with the native powers. In such a state of our affairs, can the House confirm the resolution of the committee of supply, without some explanation from ministers, whether we are to be at war or peace? If the right hon. gentleman will show a necessity for this force, no rational Englishman can object to the vote.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said:—After the confident expectations of security which his majesty's speech was calculated to excite, was not the proposition of a considerable force naturally to be expected? But the right hon. gentleman and his friends vary their charges so frequently, that one is scarcely heard, when it is destroyed by another. Some time since it was argued, that a large establishment was indispensably necessary, and it was asserted that ministers had most improvidently reduced the public force, though the navy now actually retained exceeded that in the first year of the last war. With respect to the allusion to the peace of 1783, though his majesty's speech of that day speaks confidently of peace, yet 26,000 seamen were voted for the navy. The grounds upon which the right hon. gentleman opposes the present vote, are rather singular, considering his desire to keep up a strong defensive force. Such is also the desire of government; any reduction would be unadvisable for some time, and in a few days the secretary at war will submit a proposition to the House for a larger establishment for the army than was ever known in time of peace. I am not disposed to shrink from the declaration, that in the present situation of Europe it is necessary to maintain a strong defensive system. My opinion is, that our best security will consist in the consciousness of our strength. On that principle I have acted, and with that view I proposed this vote. I have no objection to follow the right hon. gentleman in his review of the state of Europe. As to Petersburg, the right hon. gentleman will pardon me, if I decline to give him any precise answer on that subject; I shall give no positive contradiction to what he has stated; but I will say that he ought to have inquired a little farther before he hazarded an assertion, which must be heard from him with surprise and regret. The right hon. gentleman has misconceived the statement of my noble friend, on a former day, respecting the victory off Copenhagen. He did not say that the victory created the difficulties of the negotiation with the northern confederacy, but, that even after that victory many difficulties remained to be adjusted. The right hon. gentleman has adverted to the activity of the Dutch to recruit their navy; but is it a matter of wonder, that a power, which at one period of the war, mustered a respectable navy, and which, at the termination of the war, only retained sixteen, should be anxious to repair her fleets? Though the increase of every fleet likely at any period to be employed against us, may be a subject of lamentation, yet it formed no ground of complaint against ministers, unless that degree of exertion in foreign powers should be met by supineness on our part; but could any such imputation attach? I feel confident that it cannot. The right hon. gentleman was in error when he stated, that the navy of France and the navy of Europe were synonymous terms. I admit that present appearances naturally induce the belief, that those of Spain and Holland are intimately attached to France; but whatever may be their force, are we unprepared to meet them combined? No. For the insult to the British officer in the port of Lisbon the most ample satisfaction was readily given. The fleets of France, Spain, and Holland, stood thus at the beginning of the war: France 105 sail of the line, Spain 79, and Holland 27. What was the result of the war, which covered this country with so much glory? Why, that at the conclusion of the war, France had but 39, Spain 68, and Holland 16. What addition can there have been made, by building new ships, to such a force, to excite alarm in the breast of an Englishman, when I state that we have at present 192 sail of the line, 209 frigates, 129 sloops, and 243 smaller craft? With an excess of 60 sail of the line above the combined fleets of France, Spain, and Holland, what have we to fear; and what apprehension can be felt for our safety, when it is known, that in case of the renewal of hostilities, 50 sail of the line can be prepared for sea within one month, and even a larger number, should the exigency be pressing? Thus are we situated, ready for any event. Whether this state of preparation proves that want of energy on the part of administration, which the right hon. gentleman attributes to them, I leave the House and the country to determine. It is our sincere wish to maintain peace; but if the honour of the country should be wounded, or its security endangered, it is our determination to be in a state to meet the enemy. I hope the establishment now proposed will not long exist. I should be sorry to consider it the permanent peace establishment. When the circumstances of Europe shall render it proper to reduce our force to the most economic standard, I shall feel most sincerely happy; but the arrival of that period, and the security of peace, will depend much on the acquiescence of the House in this vote.

Sir Sidney Smith expressed considerable regret, at the great reductions which were suddenly made, both in the king's dock-yards, and in the navy in general. A prodigious number of men had been thus reduced to the utmost poverty and distress; and it might be apprehended that they would be obliged to seek employment from foreign states. Whatever reluctance they might feel to this, they might, by dire necessity, be compelled to it. On this ground he wished the number of seamen to be employed were considerably greater than it is; for he knew, from his own experience, that what was called an ordinary seaman, could hardly find employment at present, either in the king's or in the merchants' service. He had himself been present at some of the changes which had taken place in France; they resembled more the changes of scenery at a theatre than any thing else. Every thing was done for stage effect, and whether it was the death of Cæsar, the fall of Byzantium; or the march of Alexander, it seemed to Frenchmen almost equally indifferent. If the invasion of Britain was to be produced, it might have stage effect enough to draw 400,000 volunteers to join in the procession. Under those circumstances, he wished that this country should always be in a situation to call together speedily a strong naval force, to frustrate any attempts on the part of the enemy.

Mr. Sturges supported the resolution, from his idea of the necessity of a large establishment; but expressed surprise that ministers had assigned no reason for this increase, and earnestly hoped that it would be yet possible to continue in peace.

Captain Markham defended the conduct of the admiralty board, in contradiction of the instances adduced by sir Sidney Smith.

Lord Hawkesbury said, it certainly was not usual to introduce the votes for the service of the army and navy, by any specific explanation of the circumstances which appeared to render such an establishment necessary. What bore on this point in his majesty's speech did, however, clearly point out to the House that a proposition of the kind now offered was in contemplation. The language which the hon. gentlemen on the other side held on the present occasion, was contrary to all parliamentary precedent. He remembered on one occasion, when a right hon. gentleman, late at the head of administration, proposed, in a time of peace, a larger establishment than usual, another hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox), though then acting in opposition to the measures of government, said, that if they would assure the House that there were circumstances in the state of Europe to justify the measure, he should support it. Ministers at this moment were entitled to confidence on the same principles. They might fairly contend, that, in the present circumstances of Europe, such an increased establishment was necessary. They did not wish, however, to rest the proposition on such a foundation. Without saying any thing about private negotiations which might exist, he put it to the House whether there did not exist in Europe at this moment such known circumstances as, independent of any other consideration, fully justified ministers in proposing a large naval establishment? He was aware that, consistently with a very laudable principle of economy, small establishments were held to be desirable. It had long appeared to him, however, that this system of low establishments was founded in very mistaken policy. It had been proved by the history of the wars of this country, that it was not till a late period that we were enabled to put forth all our energies, and though ultimately successful, we were always foiled in the first instance. With reference to economy, therefore, he would contend for the policy of a large establishment. In the prospect of a renewal of war, this was particularly obvious, since commencing a war with a small establishment, a considerable proportion was withdrawn from active service, and employed in recruiting our armies, reduced to a mere skeleton. So much, he said, on the general principle of establishments. But, on the avowed principles of gentlemen on the other side, it was unnecessary for him to offer any thing in defence of the proposition now before the House. With the annexation of Belgium and Holland to France, with the immense influence she had acquired over dependent states, with the views with which she had at all times regarded the interests of this country, to propose an establishment not greater than had existed in any former peace, would be to propose the greatest absurdity. Circumstances in Europe, known and admitted, were the grounds on which ministers offered the present proposition for the establishment of the year 1803. After that period had expired, it would again become the duty of the House, under an enlarged consideration of what the relative situation of this country and Europe might be, to determine whether the same establishment should be maintained, increased, or reduced.

Mr. Canning said, he had heard his noble friend with great pleasure; and if the speech he had delivered had preceded that which gave rise to this debate, he believed the debate itself would have been rendered unnecessary. He, however, agreed entirely with the proposition of setting forth the inquiry which produced that speech; for if ministers had maintained an entire silence, he did not think the House could have been warranted in proceeding upon the measure now proposed to them in the manner in which ministers seemed to have expected. He observed that parliament proceeded to the discussion of his majesty's speech, under circumstances that were agreed to be very alarming; so much so, that extraordinary armaments were deemed to be necessary. With the explanation given by his noble friend he professed himself in general, to be satisfied. Circumstances had attended these estimates, which never attended any other in time of peace or war. The proposal for the augmentation was originally for three months, the vote of that night proposed it for the year. Now, wherefore should that vote be continued for the year. If there had been no change in our circumstances since the discussion of his majesty's speech, he must lament the fluctuation which had taken place in our councils, and which rendered it necessary that this establishment should be voted for a year instead of three months. He begged to subscribe, however, to what the noble lord had stated in explanation that night. He rejoiced in the explanation which had been given, for it would afford to the people a knowledge of their true situation. It did not, however, follow, that ministers were advocates for war, by the preparations they were now making; they might see this country, at present, without such a preparation, in more danger than if it were in a state of war. Nothing could be more distant from his intentions than to convey the slightest disrespect of his noble friend; nor could he be supposed to allude to any deficiency either in the talents or the zeal of his noble friend, for the full discharge of the office which he held. He thought, however, that the House was entitled to expect some explanation upon the subject of Switzerland. What he wished to know was, whether the honour of the country was in any way committed upon that question? He was satisfied that the circumstances of Europe required the present augmentation, and, perhaps, greater; and therefore it had his most cordial concurrence.

The Attorney General said, that the course which this debate had taken was so extraordinary, that he felt great difficulty in offering himself to the House; and yet he knew not how to suffer the debate to pass unnoticed. It was most extraordinary that persons of the sentiments which had been professed that night, and on former occasions, should have accompanied those sentiments with the observations he had heard. A compliment was expressed by the right hon. gentleman who spoke last, to his majesty's ministers, for the vote which they now proposed to the House; and yet he censured them for observing a perfect silence and reserve, or rather concealment of the reason they had for proposing such vote, which reason, when given, was that which was perfectly notorious, so that ministers were censured for being silent on what had been already spoken, reserved on what had been already communicated, and for concealing that which was already notorious, namely, that they proposed this vote on the state of things, as known already to every man in the country. This was certainly very curious but who were they that complained upon this occasion? Not those who, by their former declarations, had given them to understand they expected the peace establishment to be reduced; but the complaint came from those who agreed in the vote, and thought it came at the present time with peculiar propriety. A very exaggerated statement had been made of the forces of France, and of the inadequacy of the resources of this country to meet those forces. To those gentlemen who dealt so much in amplification in both ways, he would only say, that whilst their declamations were so much at variance with their sentiments, their opposition to ministers could never be considered in any other shape than government votes; so that, in whatever way impartial persons considered this dissertation it would have all the appearance of debate, while nothing existed upon which there was a fundamental difference. Yet, if any one had entered the House in the middle of the speech of any of those who so laboured in epithets to paint the dangers of the country and the state, he would have supposed the danger so imminent, that nothing could save us. From all this, therefore, he had a right to infer that men, not measures, were the objects of attack; that those so violent in their phillippics against ministers, were only actuated by a violent desire for their places; for he was persuaded, that could they only supplant them, from the knowledge he entertained of their talents and their zeal, they would pursue precisely the very same principles.

Dr. Laurence said, that as to the vote of 50,000 seamen, he was persuaded it was wholly inefficient. If we looked to France, we should find that, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, she had increased her army nearly 100,000 men; her navy she was increasing in the same manner. He was of opinion, that we should keep up ship for ship with that country, and seaman for seaman, if we expected to be safe. He was of no party, and he could not be arraigned of seeking the places of any party; he was content with the produce of an honourable profession, and possessed no ambition beyond it. He therefore was not to be coupled with any of those whom the learned gentleman might allude to. As we never had obtained actual peace from France, so we ought to consider our situation as that of the most destructive kind of warfare, and be on the alert to meet it in every way that God and nature pointed out to us. He would vote for the resolution, because, small as the number was, it was better than nothing, laying upon the heads of ministers all the responsibility of their measures, after the timely admonitions they had thus repeatedly heard.

The resolution was agreed to.

Debate on the Army Estimates.] Dec. 8. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply to which the Army Estimates were referred,

The Secretary at War said:—I rise, Sir, to propose the establishment of the army for the ensuing year; and before I enter into the particulars of the statement, I beg leave to offer a short general view of the motives and circumstances which induce his majesty's ministers to require such a force. The estimates now on the table exceed in number and expense any thing that this country has known in any former period of peace. The main question for the decision of the House is, whether the circumstances of the present times be such as to render such a force as is now proposed necessary, and if this should be decided in the affirmative, it will then remain to determine whether the division and description of the force be the most eligible, and whether its distribution be such as is best accommodated to the exigencies of the public service. That in the present time a larger force is necessary for the security of Great Britain, than at former periods of peace, it is hardly necessary for me to waste time in attempting to prove. The circumstances of Europe, and the relative situation of this country, are too obvious to escape the observation of any thinking man. The overgrown power of France, arrived to a magnitude beyond that which the ambition of Louis 14th projected; the menacing attitude of that country, the ambition and enterprise of its present government, have not only brought these feelings home to every British spirit, but have also impressed them deeply on every rational mind in Europe. The state of the question has already been distinctly laid down, as to the conduct we are to pursue under these circumstances; to maintain the present peace as long as we can with honour; to fulfil the conditions of it, as far as depends on us, with exactness and good faith; to abstain from all irritating language, but to resist all hostile aggression. It is our duty to be well prepared, and our preparations should be strong, as well on land as at sea. Our navy alone, however great, is not sufficient to guard the whole extent of our possessions, widely as they are spread through every quarter of the globe it will be sufficient to remind the committee, that France is now in possession of the Netherlands, of Holland, of the course of the Maese and the Lower Rhine, and the fortresses on the banks of these rivers. This is the first time that parliament has been called upon to vote a peace establishment under such circumstances, and therefore I was much surprised when I heard an hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) maintain, that there was no reason why a larger establishment than usual in former periods of peace should be maintained in Great Britain; and that there were reasons why even a smaller force would suffice every where but in the West Indies, for there even he did not think the increase unnecessary. Let the hon. gentleman consider, that in the last peace, Holland was friendly to us; the Netherlands were under the dominion of Austria; and the course of the Rhine, down from Alsace, was in the hands of friendly powers. Another circumstance material for consideration, is the actual military state of our neighbour, and his permanent establishment, of which I will take a short view, not with a design to excite any idea of keeping up a proportionate establishment here, but merely to show that there is a necessity for making some increase, if we wish to provide for our own security. The French military establishment for the present year consists of 84 regiments of cavalry, consisting each of four squadrons, at 150 men a squadron, 46,350; 110 demi-brigades of the line, and 130 of light infantry 341,000; 10 demi-brigades of veterans for garrisons 13,160; artillery 26,600; making a total regular established force of 427,110; and if to these are added 27 legions of gendarmerie, and other persons in arms, and liable to be called out, the French government has at command 929,900; Such being the geographical position, and such the military power of France, no man can deny the necessity of an increased establishment on our part. I have been long adverse to the parsimonious system of peace establishments. I am satisfied, that though no considerable evil has befallen this country in consequence of the smallness of its armed force in times of peace, much mischief might have befallen it, and our safety might have been much endangered, if the enterprise of our rivals had been proportioned to the hatred by which they now show themselves actuated towards us. No hope can be entertained of enjoying repose without a just sense of national security; nor has any nation a right to expect that it will remain unmolested, unless it possesses such means of defence as render it dangerous for any rival power to insult its honour or to invade its rights. Without these means of defence no treaty is secure: but with such means any treaty may remain inviolate for a number of years. The maintenance of standing armies is generally censured as being attended with certain expense, and being eventually dangerous to the constitution; and unquestionably the smallest standing army is so, unless constitutional, authorised, and established. But we know very well that ever since the Revolution, and in the best administered times of our constitution, such armies have been admitted and maintained. It has been said by an ancient writer, that good laws must be maintained by good armies, and good armies by good discipline. In these times it is impossible that laws or constitutions can be maintained, without a force capable of protecting and securing our independence by sea and by land. I do not see how any objection can be made to the increase now proposed, and I go on this ground merely—the absolute necessity of such an augmentation; for if this augmentation be not necessary, then there is no need of any augmentation at all. But if it was deemed necessary in times of no danger to keep up 24,000, 30,000, and 40,000 men, surely it will not be deemed unnecessary, unadvisable, or unconstitutional, in these times of danger and difficulty, to maintain a greater number. It has been said, that armies, cannot be subsisted in times of actual war, but by husbanding the means of their support, and carrying the wealth and credit of the country to the highest. I am ready to allow, that the credit of the country ought to be maintained, and its wealth augmented as much as possible. If we omit to provide a military force proportioned to the urgency of occasions, our honour is compromised, and we are left exposed to danger without a resource. For when, according to the best information that can be collected from the most authentic sources, 100,000 men are the number sufficient for the security of the country, and fewer are deemed insufficient, the hon. gentleman cannot mean that the maintenance of that number is impolitic. Wealth, in my opinion, however it may be increased, cannot be deemed secure without a respectable military force. Money has, it is true, been called the sinew of war; but that sinew cannot preserve its tone, without a body, and the body here is an army ready to be resorted to without loss of time. I have to mention that Ceylon and Trinidad, newly added to our dominions, require an increase proportioned to their extent and importance, an absolute increase without any relative consideration of times or circumstances. It is meant to keep up three regiments of horse guards, and 27 of dragoon guards and dragoons, on the same regulation as in the last peace. The general division is to be 8 troops in a regiment, each troop to consist of 60 rank and file; of these, 10 to be dismounted. The dismounted men will be disciplined like the others; while they afford a saving to the public of 50,000*l.* a year; and at the same time can occasion no material delay, even in case of urgency, as horses are much more easily procured than men. The foot guards, as usual, to consist of 3 regiments, 1 of 3 battalions, and the other 2 of 2 battalions each: 75 men to a company, as the other regiments. The total of cavalry 17,250; total of foot guards 6,060; 102 battalions of foot, consisting of the numbered regiments up to the 93*d.*, with two battalions of the royals, the 2*nd* battalion of the 52*nd*, 5 battalions of the 60*th*, and 5 battalions of the 94*th*, at 75 rank and file a company, with the exception of those on India service, which are to have 75 men in a company, for the purpose of keeping up the numbers in that distant station. Six West India regiments, 6 of the 12 kept up last year having been reduced. These troops, consisting of men of colour, are found useful for many services in the West Indies, which Europeans cannot perform, and, when mixed with Europeans, form a very respectable force in the field: the 6 regiments consist of 4,158 men. To these are to be added the foreign corps, consisting of the king's German regiment, Stuart's regiment, which distinguished itself so much in Egypt; 3 Swiss regiments, those of Meuron, Rohan, and Watteville; making altogether 3,552 men. The staff corps, consisting of 4 companies, and the corps of waggoners, which had been found extremely useful. The total of this force, including the regiments serving in India, and counting officers, is 128,909.—I now come to the distribution: 60,000 rank and file, including 15,000 cavalry, are to serve as guards and garrisons in Great Britain and Ireland. A body of 30,000 men for the plantations, and the remainder of the force to be employed in India. I will now state, particularly the force in India, which consists of 3 regiments of dragoons, and 14 British regiments of foot, consisting of 16,100 men, and the regiment of Meuron, consisting of 1,150 men. The troops now in India cannot come home till late, and it is, therefore, difficult to give a precise statement respecting them. There are now 17 battalions there, and it is intended that 14 shall be kept there. The total expense of guards and garrisons, and the plantation estimate, including India, will be about 4,015,000*l.* [Here Mr. Fox asked across the table, whether the garrison battalions were included in this calculation? He believed that with them the whole force would be above 130,000 men.] The hon. gentleman is right. I did omit the garrison battalions, consisting of 5,000 men. It has been found expedient to form seven new garrison battalions on a better foundation; they are on a plan likely to prove more efficacious than the former, which rendered this force by no means adequate in service to the expense with which it bore upon the country. It has been thought expedient to abolish the name of "invalids," to which contemptuous ideas were attached, as if of a man walking on a crutch, and unable to manage a musket or a bayonet. It is intended that they shall be effective men, and they are to have a board of officers, by whom redress of all complaints is to be made. The difference of expense between these and the invalids is about 5,000*l.*, the difference between them and troops of the line is between 35 and 40,000*l.* The clothing for these corps is this year to be issued out of the king's stores, and consequently there are to be no charges incurred this year for clothing them. These battalions are able to occupy garisons, and to do service in several posts which would otherwise be maintained by regiments of the line, consequently these regiments will be at liberty for other services.—I am now to notice to the committee the mode by which this plan is more economical than keeping up a smaller proportion of officers. First, the battalions and squadrons are really capable of service, without waiting to recruit, and admit of increase, without breaking the hearts of officers in the beginning of a war, by raising new corps, and bringing men into the field who had seen no service. The addition of 1 lieutenant and 25 men to each company in the cavalry, gives an addition of 5,000 in the infantry; 1 lieutenant and 25 men for each company give an increase of 250 rank and file in each battalion, and a total addition of 25,000 rank and file, with 1030 lieutenants. The whole addition thus made is 30,000 men, with the expense of only a few additional officers. By the addition of one company to each regiment of cavalry, and two to each regiment of infantry, there is a farther increase of 20,000 men.—All the services in the army department will amount to 5,270,000*l.* and all those annexed expenses not in the paper, including the half-pay to reduced officers, and the out-pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham, will not exceed the similar expenses in 1801. The expense of the military college is 7,000*l.*; and it is for the pleasure of parliament to grant a sum for the support of the Military Asylum. The total of the military expense will be about 5,500,000*l.* This expense is certainly great, but it is less than that of last year by 2,270,000*l.* and less than that of the last year of the war by 10,130,000*l.* A difficulty arose, from the army proposed to be kept up last year, but to which in fact, we could never arrive. There is an increase of 8,525 men this year, and an additional expense of 65,000*l.*; there has been, at the same time, a saving in several items. The expense of barracks is less by 300,000*l.*; and in the half-pay and other items there has been a proportionate diminution. In mentioning the increase of force since last year, I must notice a charge made on his majesty's ministers of having hastily, improvidently, and unwisely reduced the armed force of the country, when, as those persons themselves admitted, the increase now demanded was not too considerable. I will now proceed to show that these charges were without foundation. On the 1st of October 1801, there were under arms 250,000 men of all descriptions; of these, 123,343 men of all descriptions have been reduced. 1st, The cavalry amounted at that time to 25,000 men; a force not thought necessary, and for that reason, as well as because it was the most expensive, the reduction commenced with it, and 10,493 men were reduced. The militia of Great Britain and Ireland were discharged to the amount of 71,000 men. It is understood that the militia is always to be called out at the commencement of a war, and discharged on the conclusion of peace, but the fencible regiments come more strictly under this description, and were therefore immediately disbanded, to the number of 20,679 men. The invalids, to the number of 5,172 were reduced, because it had been resolved to form the out-pensioners into a more effectual force. The foreign corps were reduced to the number of 8,945 men; a force which we were glad to spare, and which, when any reduction was necessary, we thought it most politic to reduce; for when British troops were disbanded, who would think of maintaining foreigners, unless they were in situations where we could not dismiss them? All other descriptions of men dismissed, amounted to 7,025 men, which number alone constitutes the strict and regular difference between the British infantry, then and now. And if it be considered, that of these 7,000, some had enlisted to serve for a limited time, and though they were not strictly entitled to their discharge, yet as the act is so drawn as to give them reason to think they were entitled to it, and many of them were induced to enlist, by having it so explained; it seemed inconsistent with that good faith which the government should always maintain with the people, to refuse to discharge them; but I can assure the gentleman who brought those charges, that no exertion was omitted to induce them to enlist regularly in other corps, and so many did enlist, that 19 or 20 battalions were filled up, while the reduction did not take away more than 6 or 7. Of these 7,000, many were discharged from the hospitals, and many were discharged for infirmities, on their return from long foreign service. This is the only foundation on which the charge of improvident reduction rests. But look at the force kept up, and the picture now afforded by the British army. This army was never more respectable, never in better subordination, never in better order than now, it was never composed of more able and efficient men, never actuated by a noble military spirit, with a number of able, experienced, and brave general officers, many of them in the flower of their age, uniting the vigour and enterprise of youth with the temper and wisdom of more advanced years; regulated by a prince possessed of an uncommon understanding in military affairs, indefatigable in his attention to business, and eminently just in discharging the duties of his office. For this respectable army, and the facility of augmenting its military force, the country is partly indebted to the hon. gentleman on the other side, who is entitled to the praise of having given us the command of such a force, with the facility of making an addition of 20,000 men; besides an easy resource in the militia of Ireland of 20,000 men more, exclusive of the yeomanry and volunteer corps, who have agreed to continue their services. Of these last, 8,000 rank and file have been already enrolled in Great Britain, chiefly cavalry. In Ireland the enrolment has been above double that number, amounting to 10,000 cavalry, and a still greater number of infantry. Putting all together, we have a total force of 200,000 men, exclusive of the army in India; a force of such a magnitude, and of such a description, as to present no very alluring prospect to any foreign power that may be disposed to attack us. I conclude, Sir, with moving, "That 66,574 men be voted for guards and garrisons in Ireland, from the

Mr. Bankes said, that if he disapproved of a high peace establishment, it was not because he thought less highly than others of the formidable power of France, but because he thought more highly of the natural means and resources of this country; and he did not like to waste those resources in guarding against a danger which did not exist. In former times it had been found that small peace establishments were sufficient to keep the country secure at home, and preserve its respectability abroad; but if we were now to make the military establishment of France the measure of our own, that could not be done without ruining the resources of the country. If this country was quiet and contented at home, he did not think it need to be panic-struck on hearing of half a million of men drawn up upon the shores of France. Our insular situation was to be estimated as a powerful defence, but, above all, we were to rely on the resources of the nation, when satisfied with its government. It was by public credit and confidence, and not from our population, that Great Britain had carried on so many wars with advantage and glory. He relied also on the great number of men trained and disciplined to arms, who are now in the country; he wished, instead of increasing, to diminish as much as possible, the expenses of the army, by allowing the soldiers leave of absence for a considerable part of the year, as had always been done upon the continent.

Sir Eyre Coote approved of the proposed increase of the military establishment, which in times like the present was, he conceived, necessary, to support the honour and dignity of the empire.

Earl Temple said, that consistently with the principles he had ever acted upon in that House, he could by no means oppose the increase which was now proposed, nor should he by any vote of his, either damp the spirits of the country, or check that spark of spirit which had, however tardily, been exhibited by his majesty's government. He gave full credit to the able speech which had been made by the secretary at war; but in that statement there was nothing which could enable the House to judge whether this was an estimate for a peace establishment, or for a war establishment. There was no language of the noble secretary which appeared like telling France, as it was the duty of this country to do, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." We were voting a large establishment, without any information on the subject. His lordship then condemned the general conduct of administration, and particularly their conduct with respect to the affairs of Switzerland; and on the whole he considered, that his majesty's ministers were not persons fit to be entrusted with the government of the country in times like the present.

General Maitland highly approved of the speech of the secretary at war; and thought that there was no occasion for any other argument to justify the vote, except the present situation of Europe. Besides the enormous power of France, the ruling passion of that people is now entirely for military enterprise; and their government is in the hands of a general, who if not the first and greatest now alive, is certainly the most ambitious and enterprising. He never gave a vote in parliament with greater pleasure than the present. It was for an establishment which would have all the effect of real economy, and a mode of securing to us peace, far better than could be effected by any seal that was ever put to the treaty.

General Tarleton stated, that he had uniformly voted against the late war, and had done so most conscientiously: but he should vote with pleasure for the increase now proposed, as he considered it absolutely necessary for the honour and security of the country—however great were the horrors of war, yet the horrors of seeing Buonaparté's flag on the Tower of London, or his political principles current in this country, were still more terrifying to him.

Mr. Archdall hoped the vote of that night, would be understood both at home and abroad as the cool decision of the representatives of a great nation, who wished to act in the spirit of the answer given to his majesty. It was not the dark manifesto of a perpetual dictator, but the voice of a great and free nation, adequately represented. He had often heard the situation of the country spoken of in the most desponding terms, by those very gentlemen who were for the most vigorous measures. They seemed to wish to vote the country to vigor, but to debate it to despair. He had heard that a general should not think lightly of his enemy, but that a common soldier should; now he saw no policy in describing our situation to the enemy, so as that they should despise both general and soldier: if what was said in the House passed no further, there would be no harm perhaps, in gentlemen speaking one way, and voting another: but as those things travelled far, it was very dangerous. The strength of France was also magnified; it was supposed by many, that her resources were founded on pillage, and its alliances on compulsion: if so, he saw no great reason for us to dread her power. If with our great resources, our loyalty firm, our honour untouched, our glorious navy, our army and people in a mass attached to our Constitution, we should yet be doomed to fall and be destroyed; he must say, there was something in it beyond human foresight, and therefore we must not be ashamed of our destruction.

Mr. Cartwright said, it was because he felt anxious for the preservation of peace that he should give his vote in favour of the estimate proposed; but he could not help thinking it extraordinary that his majesty's ministers should withhold all information as to the actual situation of this country with respect to France, and the stipulations of the treaty of peace.

Mr. Whitbread lamented that ministers had about them so much indecision; for at one time the minister told the House, that from the situation of affairs, he was convinced that 30,000 seamen would be sufficient; then, without any alteration in those affairs, 50,000 were proposed; and having given it as his opinion, that it would only be necessary to vote this force for a few months, then, without the least allegation of increased danger, the same minister, in a few hours afterwards, thought it proper to propose this force for the year. He condemned the language that had been so often repeated, of a determination to defend our honour, and not to bear insult: he thought that might be very well inferred, from what this country had formerly done; and that consequently such language was unnecessary, and not in the tone of true spirit. He did not seriously believe, that France meditated an attack upon this country, and thought the French government might as well pretend to be alarmed with the fears of an attack from this. Nations, as well as individuals, often retained ridiculous apprehensions of danger; we had once entertained strong apprehensions from Dunkirk being fortified, and now we cared very little about its harbour. We were very much afraid of Jamaica too, when the French fleet sailed for St. Domingo; but those sort of fears cannot last a very long time: he did not see how the vote now proposed, could at all tend to diminish the power of France. He concluded by declaring, that it was with pleasure that he had seen the government of the country taken out of those hands, who had so misused it: and he dreaded the consequences of such men returning to power.

Mr. Ryder said, that if the proposed increase in our establishments did not take place, this country might bid a long adieu to all its greatness. But some gentlemen seemed inclined to think that navies were useless, armies something worse, and even all continental alliances absolutely detrimental. When we beheld the subjugation of the Swiss, and the progressive aggrandizement of France, were we to sit still, and suffer her to devour the rest of Europe, contented at her forbearance in making us the last whom she was to snap at? According to the observations of an hon. gentleman, we should remain quiet, in hopes that the first consul would in time remit his anger against us, and be satisfied with the punishment we had already suffered; but the same hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) in this afforded us but little consolation, for, in his opinion we deserved that punishment, and the war ought to have terminated gloriously to France, and ingloriously for this country. The pacific sentiments of some gentlemen argued no small degree of inconsistency. At the time when a commercial treaty was negotiating between the two countries, the same gentleman opposed it, not so much on account of the terms, as the fear that the benefit we might derive from it might, on any future occasion, render us unwilling to go to war, even though we should have provocation: yet they assumed a different tone now, when the question was respecting a war for our own immediate defence, and at a time when we were every where surrounded by France or its auxiliaries. The demand was for a military establishment, ready for any emergency that might arise, and not perhaps so much called for by any subsisting differences, but such as would place us in a situation to assist others, and perhaps, in some not very far distant day, oppose a barrier to the encroachments of our aspiring neighbours. Into what situation things might yet subside, must be left to time and circumstances to develope, and no reliance could be placed upon pledges or previous dispositions exhibited by that House. In the reign of Queen Anne, parliament had passed a resolution, that no peace should be made with France while she retained an inch of the Spanish territory; yet that object was wholly abandoned at the peace of Utrecht. So also, in 1741, the parliament voted, that no peace should be made until the Spaniards renounced the right of search on the coast of America; but the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was made without ever mentioning the subject. It was true, that heretofore we had always peace establishments comparatively small; but at no former period were we ever totally destitute of all continental alliances and connexions. The House was not, however, now called upon for a pledge of any kind; but as our resources were but little impaired, he conceived it to be the duty of every man to bear his share in the expenses of an increased establishment, lest the burthen should afterwards fall with accumulated weight upon us.

Mr. Sheridan rose and said:—Sir, being in the situation alluded to by the right hon. gentleman who has just sat down, of not being able to agree precisely with any of those who have preceded me, yet of being, at the same time, unwilling to give a silent vote on the present occasion, I rise with some sentiments of reluctance. There is one thing, however, in which we all coincide; it is, that the crisis in which we are placed, is so big with tremendous importance, so pregnant with mighty difficulties, so full of apprehensions and dangers, that the House and the country have a right to know what are the intentions and the views of those by whose exertions we may expect to be extricated from the complication of embarrassments, and snatched from the very brink of destruction. Sir, one of the circumstances I most regret in this debate is, the references that have been made to the characters and abilities of persons supposed to be fit to fill particular offices. I feel this as a subject of regret, and feeling so, I am sorry that my hon. friend near me made any allusion even to one man, whom of all men upon earth, I most love and respect, because I do view the crisis to be one of such moment and peril, and because, if ever there was a time in which we should prove to the people of England that we are above all party feelings, that we are above all party distinctions, that we are superior to any petty scramble for places and power, that time is the present. — Sir, in speaking upon these topics, I do find a disposition in some gentlemen to rebuke any man who shall deliver any opinion with respect to the first consul of France. One hon. gentleman, who rebuked an hon. general that spoke before him, declared that he would not give his opinion with respect to the conduct of France to Switzerland; and what does his rebuke amount to? He confesses that upon that subject there can be but one opinion. Why then, Sir, he either adopts the opinion of the hon. general or not. If he does adopt it, he gives as strong an opinion against the conduct of France as can possibly be given. If he does not adopt it, why then all we can say is, that there are two opinions. But what, he asks, has Switzerland to do with the question? It has this to do with it. The hon. general introduced the subject in this way; he contends that a power which is capable of such unprovoked aggression, and such perfidy, is the power that ought to be watched. But the hon. gentleman goes on to assert, that we have nothing to do with the case of Switzerland, nothing to do with France, nothing but with her power:—nothing but her power!—as if that were little. He asks too where is the great difference between France under the Bourbons and under her present ruler? Why, Sir, the hon. general inferred, from the conduct of France, that with her growing power she had a growing disposition to mischief. But is that power, demands the hon. gentleman, greater now than it was last June? Perhaps it is not, Sir. But her mischievous disposition is greater; and if I am asked to bring a proof of the truth of my assertion, I must bring the case of Switzerland. Sir, if I see a purposed contempt of the independence of a nation; if I see a perfidious disregard of the faith of treaties; if I see a power withdraw her assistance, only to return and entrap a country of freemen with greater certainty, why then I say there has been a change, and a great change too, and that such a power we have a right to watch. But, says the hon. gentlemen, we have no right to make use of invectives against the first consul of France. I will abstain if I can; I say if I can, because I feel that even a simple narrative may be construed into invective. With regard to the general question of a disposition to peace or war, I, for one, declare, that I am as strongly and as sincerely for the preservation of peace as any man, and that I do not consider war as any remedy for the evils complained of. If a war spirit be springing up in this country, if a chivalrous disposition be observable, if a sentiment of indignation be rising upon the subject of the treatment of Switzerland, I, for one, shall contend that the treatment of Switzerland is no cause of war. I would therefore say, preserve peace if possible: peace if possible, because the effects of war, always calamitous, may be calamitous indeed, buckling, as we should be forced to do, all our sinews and strength to that power in a contest with her upon such grounds. I repeat, therefore, peace if possible; but I add, resistance, prompt, resolute, determined resistance to the first aggression, be the consequences what they may. Influenced by these sentiments, I shall vote cordially and cheerfully for this large peace establishment; and it is because I shall vote for it, that I think myself bound to state my reasons. Sir, some gentlemen seem to consider what they advance as so many axioms too clear to need explanation or to require defence. But when I vote so large an establishment, I think myself not at liberty to bind such a burthen upon my constituents, without stating the grounds upon which I act, and the principles by which I am prompted. Sir, I have listened with all the attention I am master of to the different arguments that have been advanced in the present debate. One hon. gentleman who spoke second, appears to be a decided enemy to a great establishment, and the reasons he gave for his opposition, I confess, perfectly astonished me. Luckily he has no rapid flippancy in his manner; his sentiments are delivered too soberly and sedately to be mistaken. I am sure I mean nothing disrespectful to that gentleman, who amply repays the attention that is paid to him. But he says, if ministers had only said to him that danger existed, he would, for one, have voted for the force proposed. Does he doubt the danger? He complains that his majesty's ministers do not state it precisely. But does he pretend that he does not see and feel it? Can any one look at the map of Europe and be blind to it? Can any one have a heart to resist apprehended injury, and say that we ought not to be prepared; but he asks, why raise only 110,000 men? You can never equal the military power of France, and as you cannot, why stop at 110,000? Why not raise 120, 130, 140,000? If this argument be worth any thing, it applies equally to our raising only 1,000. Why, if we can never be equal to France, raise a man? Another gentleman, who spoke last, has alluded to alliances, and I agree perfectly with him in what he advanced against making any pledges. He has alluded to the fate of the pledges made in the war of the succession, in the war of 1741; but if he meant to be impartial, he need not have gone back so far: he need not have travelled beyond the last war; he might have mentioned the pledges then given; he might have recollected the pledge of never giving up the Netherlands; he might have recalled to our minds the pledge of obtaining indemnity for the past, and security for the future; he might have dwelt upon the pledge of exhausting the last drop of our blood in the contest for religion, order, and civilized society, the toto certatum corpore regni; he might have reminded us of all these pledges made, and of all of them having been abandoned. He confesses his warmth of friendship for the late minister, and he certainly never showed it more than in stopping so short with his historical narrative of pledges. The next excellent reasoning of the hon. gentleman who spoke second against the proposed vote is, that the first year of war there will be an immense army drawn upon the opposite coast, and therefore, now it is not necessary to be prepared. When the army is upon your shores, when the trumpet of the enemy sounds at your gates, then it is time to be prepared. Appearance of security, he contends, gives often, the effect of security. If we have large armies, France will think we raise them through fear; if we do not have them, she will think that we feel ourselves perfectly secure. I have heard instances, Sir, where mounting wooden guns upon a fort has produced the same security as if there had been real ones. But unluckily in this instance for us, by our constitutional form of proceeding, our whole force must be known: we cannot pass upon an enemy wooden guns, and an army at Brentford. If we vote no force, an enemy will know we have none. But have no arms, throw away your guns, is the advice of the hon. gentleman. Sir, when every house in my neighbourhood has been attacked and robbed by a gang of ruffians, how my having no arms is to save me from a visit from them, I must leave the hon. gentleman to explain. His next argument is, that it is unreasonable in us to believe that Buonaparté wishes to be at war with us; for he thinks the French have nothing to gain by invasion. Nothing to gain? What else have they to lose but that of which it has been said they have so much to spare, and what have they not to gain? Sir, I cannot but think this as unbecoming a sentiment as ever was uttered. But it is unreasonable to think that the French wish to meddle with us. Why, I protest I cannot explain. If, as has been said, they have felt our arms, they who have been every where else successful, cannot but view the only power whose arms they have felt with feelings of warm resentment and with sentiments of mortified pride. But look at the map of Europe; there, where a great man (who, however, was always wrong on this subject) said he looked for France, and found nothing but a chasm. Look at that map now, and see nothing but France. It is in our power to measure her territory, to reckon her population, but it is scarcely within the grasp of any man's mind to measure the ambition of Buonaparté. Why, when all Europe bows down before him—why when he has subdued the whole continent, he should feel such great respect for us, I am at a loss to discover. If then it be true, as I have stated, that his ambition is of that immeasurable nature, there are abundant and obvious reasons why it must be progressive—reasons much stronger than any that could have been used under the power of the Bourbons. They were ambitious, but it was not so necessary for them to feed their subjects with the spoils and plunder of war; they had the attachment of a long established family applied to them; they had the effect and advantage of hereditary succession. But I see in the very situation and composition of the power of Buonaparté a physical necessity for him to go on in this barter with his subjects, and to promise to make them the masters of the world if they will consent to be his slaves. I see then, I repeat, this strong reason for his pursuing this system of policy. If that be the case, must not his most anxious looks be directed to Great Britain?—Every thing else is petty and contemptible compared with it.

Russia, if not in his power, is at least in his influence—Prussia is at his beck—Italy is his vassal—Holland is in his grasp—Spain at his nod—Turkey in his toils—Portugal at his foot;—when I see this, can I hesitate in stating my feelings, still less can I hesitate in giving a vote that shall put us upon our guard against the machinations and workings of such an ambition. But it has been said, that it is possible he may mean nothing more than rivalry of commerce. Happy, Sir, shall I be, if such an idea enter into his head at all, much more if it form part of his plans. But I confess I cannot see that it does. I mark him taking positions calculated to destroy our commerce, but I do not find him doing any thing for the mutual benefit of the trade of the two countries. I see him anxious to take possession of Louisiana, and to use the ports of St. Domingo to carry out West India and Jamaica trade. I can conceive a possible case, in which such positions might be taken as to force us to surrender our commerce without a stroke. An ignorant observer may see two armies, and may say there is no war, because there is no battle; yet one of them may make such movements as to compel the other to surrender without striking a blow.

Of the commercial talents of Buonaparté, I can be supposed to know but little; but bred in camps, it cannot be imagined that his commercial knowledge can be very great: and, indeed, if I am rightly informed, he is proceeding in the old plan of heavy duties and prohibitions. But he would go a shorter way to work with us. The old country has credit and capital, and commercial enterprise: and he may think if he can subjugate us, that he can carry them off to France like so many busts and marbles. But he would find himself mistaken; that credit would wither under the gripe of power; that capital would sink into the earth, if trodden upon by the foot of a despot. That commercial enterprise would, I believe, lose all its vigour in the presence of an arbitrary government. No, Sir, instead of putting his nation apprentice to commerce he has other ideas in his head. My humble apprehension is, that, though in the tablet and volume of his mind there may be some marginal note about cashiering the king of Etruria; yet, that the whole text is occupied with the destruction of this country. This is the first vision that breaks upon him through the gleam of the morning; this is his last prayer at night, to whatever Deity he addresses it, whether to Jupiter, or to Mahomet; to the goddess of battles, or to the goddess of Reason. But, Sir, the only consolation is, that he is a great philosopher and philanthropist. I believe this hyper-philanthropy has done more harm than ever it did good. He has discovered that we all belong to the Western family. Sir, I confess I feel a sentiment of deep indignation, when I hear (I take it from report) that this scrap of nonsense was uttered to one of the most enlightened of the human race. To this family party I do not wish to belong. He may invite persons, if he please, to dinner, and, like lord Peter, say that this tough crust is excellent mutton. He may toss a sceptre to the king of Etruria to play with, and keep a rod to scourge him in the corner; he may have thought at first his Cisalpine Republic a fine growing child, and may have found it a ricketty bantling; but I feel contempt for all this mockery. Let us, Sir, abstain from invective, only let us speak the truth. Why, Sir, what I have said is nothing but the truth. Let us be visiting acquaintance but I do implore him not to consider us as one of the family. Perhaps, Sir, it is unnecessary for me to state any more reasons for voting for this large peace establishment. All I desire is, not to have it understood that in stating my fears, I speak from a well informed judgment. On that account it is, that I say do not go to war, on that account it is, that I state my apprehensions as rational grounds for great vigilance, and for strong preparation. Sir, there are two other points pressed by several gentlemen, to which I beg leave to refer.—I mean the fitness of the persons in power, and the spirit of the people. The power of the country consists in its army, its navy, and its finance, in the talent and integrity of its ministers, and, above all, in the spirit of the people. Upon this second branch of the question, though I have said some things which may be considered as grateful to that party which may be denominated the war party, yet I fear I shall be compelled to state by-and-by some circumstances that may not be quite so agreeable to them. It is a matter of no importance to the House perhaps to know why I was absent on the two first days of the session. I am anxious to hear the part which men would take, and I do confess I never felt so much disgust at any circumstance, as to find on the first day of the session, instead of an unanimous vote for vigilance and preparation, a call from some to give us back our places. The noble lord's friends may be divided into two classes; those who call for a change of ministers, and for war. And here I must say, Sir, for one, that I thank them for their frankness in stating what they have done, because their frankness is an antidote to the fury of their counsels. The noble lord says, we do not want to go to war: we only wish to have other persons in power; the noble lord deals with the ingenuousness of youth, as I say; with the inexperience of youth, according to others. But what should we get by this change? Would those persons he recommends have acted differently from the present ministers? Would they have gone to war for any of the events that have occurred since the peace? Would they have gone to war for the annexing of Piedmont to France? for the Cisalpine republic? for the invasion of Switzerland? No, for none of these. They would have done as ministers have done, but more vigorously; they would have shown more grumbling patience: they would have made wry faces; they would not have stood with their hands a-kinbo. What would they have got by this? Would they have obtained any thing more by all this grudging and winning? Would such a mode of conduct have become the character and dignity of the country? Sir, it is not to be inferred, because the right hon. gentleman opposite me did none of these things, that he felt no indignation. I learn from his majesty's speech, every word of which I approve, that his ministers are determined not to be shut out of the continent. I say, Sir, I approve of the speech, because it satisfied me that a sense of wrong, and a resentment of injury, may live under moderate language. But these ministers, it seems, are the incapable gentlemen. Will gentlemen show us any act of base submission on their part? If they can; if they prove that they did any act with respect to Switzerland, and meanly retracted it afterwards, I will be the first to inveigh against them. But these gentlemen show us no such acts; they seem as if they considered the ministers, now the drudgery of signing the peace is done, as puncti officii, and as if they ought to go out; as if one was a mere goose-quill, and the other a stick of sealing wax, which are done with, and ought to be thrown under the table. We know that Touchstone says, as a good ground of quarrel, "That he don't like the cut of a certain courtier's beard." Perhaps this capricious dislike cannot be better exemplified than by the sentiment expressed in the well known epigram of Martial:—

"Non amo te, Sabidi, nec possum dicere quare, Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te!"

The English parody may be more applicable to these gentlemen:

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this, I'm sure, I know full well,

It is fair, Sir, to say, that this English parody, so unfavourable to the doctor, proceeds from the mouth of a fair lady, who has privileges to like and dislike, which would ill become a member of this House. Sir, I contend that no solid reason has been offered to be urged against these ministers. How, I would ask, has the right hon. gentleman forfeited the confidence of the people? And why are we told that there is but one man alone that can save the country. But it seems, and I must frankly confess that I was utterly astonished when I heard such an assertion made use of, that his majesty's ministers assumed the reins of government at a most inviting period. Sir, I defy any man to show me a period of greater difficulty. The right hon. gentleman who, in the chair of this House, had so amply deserved and secured the respect of every member in it, could not but have quitted it with feelings of regret.—But the expeditions to the Baltic and to Egypt were prepared: true; yet was success certain? Was it not the act of chance, and the great skill shown by the noble admiral (Nelson) that brought the expedition to the Baltic to a favourable issue? Did the late ministers conceal their fears with respect to the expedition to Egypt? That it was most glorious in its event, and that the country ought to bind the brows of the meanest soldier engaged in it with laurels, I am ready to allow. But it cannot be denied, that, after the expedition had been off the coast in Italy, and was in Marmorice Bay, orders were sent to stop the expedition altogether. With respect to the negotiations for peace, their predecessors knew that the present ministers would have to deal with men who, it might be supposed, would be glad of an occasion to retort the insolence of lord Grenville's letter. If the enemy had parodied that letter as their only answer to us, if they had said we will wait for experience and the evidence of facts, with respect to the new ministry: if they had said, restore that old Whig constitution which the former ministers have so impaired, we might have thought such conduct trifling, and beneath them; but we could not have questioned its fairness. Sir, though his majesty's ministers must have been prepared to expect humiliation; yet they made peace, I will venture to say, on terms comparatively more advantageous to the country than those that were offered at Lisle. Of these ministers, Sir, I know also that they have not renewed any of their predecessors' oppressive acts. But this, some gentlemen will contend, is a proof of their weakness and unfitness. Never too, Sir, did the Treasury interfere so little in the general election. This again may be advanced by some as an instance of their incapacity. Nay, the North was left almost to a member of the late administration. When, therefore, gentlemen talk in future of Mr. Pitt's being the fittest person to save the country, they ought to add also the name of Mr. Dundas. But what did these gentlemen expect from the present chancellor of the exchequer? We treated him, when in the chair of this House, with the respect he merited. He has, I believe, Sir, over our present worthy Speaker, the advantage in attitude; but did they expect that when he was minister he was to stand up and call Europe to order? Was he to send Mr. Colman, the serjeant at arms, to the Baltic, and order the Northern powers to the bar of the House? Was he to see the powers of Germany scrambling like members over the benches, and say, gentlemen must take their places? Was he expected to cast his eye to the Tuscan gallery, and exclaim, that strangers must withdraw? Was he to stand across the Rhine, and say, the Germans to the right, and the French to the left? If he could have done all these things, I, for one, should always vote, that the Speaker of the House should be appointed the minister of the country. But the right hon. gentleman has done all that a reasonable man could expect him to do.

Sir, I confess, I wish to know what Mr. Pitt himself thinks. I should be glad to hear what his sentiments are of the call made for him, and loudly made too, in another place by a vigorous statesman. I well remember, Sir, and so do we all, the character he gave of the present administration. The justice of his character of the first lord of the admiralty no man can question. Of the accuracy of his judgment with respect to the present chancellor of the exchequer, it does not become us to entertain a doubt. The noble secretary of state was better qualified for the situation than any man in the country, with an exception made, I believe, in favour of my hon. friend near me (Mr. Fox). Does Mr. Pitt mean to retract that character? I cannot suppose he does. I must believe that he left, in his judgment, the best administration that could be left. I have heard some gentlemen attach to the present ministry the appellation of a mawkish mixture; but if I were to compare them to any thing, I should say, that Mr. Pitt, and the ex-secretary of war, acted as men fond of wine (which I certainly do not mean to impute to them as a fault), and drinking a bottle of tokay. Though you may take what appears to be the best, and leave only what seems to be the lees, yet if you only pour a bottle of good white wine upon them, you have as good a bottle of tokay as ever. Sir, I think the mixture as good and as wholesome to the constitution as it could have been. I am sure I hear with joy that it is not on account of ill health that the right hon. gentleman to whom I have alluded is absent. I repeat, Sir, when I see so many persons anxious about that gentleman, I am glad to hear that his health is re-established. But how, I would ask, can we, with any consistency, turn out the man who made the peace, to bring in the person who avowed his approbation of it? Sir, it is since that peace was made that gentlemen have voted a statue to Mr. Pitt; but whenever they erect that statue, let them cover it with laurels so as not to show its nose; yet still a piece of the olive must go with it, for he approved and supported the peace. Sir, I cannot persuade myself to think he is playing a double game, or that he has retracted the opinion he delivered in this House; but every thing should stand plain, every thing should be explicit. I have heard of one person playing two different games at chess, for two different persons at the same time; but I never heard of a person playing one of his hands against the other.

I suspect, therefore, there has been some mistake in the telegraphic communication; that the political Philidor's game has been misunderstood; that his friends have displaced a knight and a castle, when they should only have taken two pawns; that they have made an attempt to checkmate the king, when they had no instructions for doing it. Sir, I cannot forget the period when the august personage of the sovereign was held up as the only man who was against extending privileges to the Catholics in Ireland; and I cannot, therefore, brook the idea of calling that right hon. gentleman back to power, and forcing him upon the crown. I expected when I came into this House to hear much said against Buonaparté, but I had not the slightest expectation of hearing any thing against the prerogative of the crown. Mr. Pitt the only man to save the country! No single man can save the country. If a nation depends only upon one man, it cannot, and, I will add, it does not deserve to be saved; it can only be done by the parliament and the people. Sir, I say therefore I cannot believe that there is a back and a fore door to this Egerian grotto. We have all heard, I dare say, of a classical exhibition in this town, The Invisible Girl. Here, however, I hope we shall have no whisperings backwards and forwards, no speaking through tubes, no invisible agency. I hope too, that we shall have it declared, as it ought to be, that these opinions, which have been rumoured about, are unfounded. I shall now address a few words to those gentlemen who would hurry us into war; and here, Sir, I must say, that of all persons living, the ex-secretary of war is the last man who can consistently call out for war. He despised the warning voice of my hon. friend, he turned a deaf ear to his predictions that we should only consolidate and strengthen the power of France. His answers always were as if he should despise the power of France, could he but see Jacobinism destroyed. Is it not destroyed?

"Approach thou like the rugged Russian bear;
The arm'd rhinoceros, or the Hyrcanian tiger—
Take any shape but that, and my firm nerves Shall never tremble—"

The right hon. gentleman's wishes are gratified; Jacobinism is killed and gone, and by whom? By him who can no longer be called the child and champion of Jacobinism—by Buonaparté. I remember to have heard Jacobinism compared to Antæus, who gained strength at every throw: but Buonaparté proceeded like Hercules; he gave it a true fraternal hug, and strangled it. Did the French annex Piedmont, did they enter Switzerland with the Rights of Man? Did they talk of those rights when Buonaparté told the people of Italy they were a set of dolts and drivellers, and were unfit to govern themselves? But now the right hon. gentleman seems in a greater fright than ever. He seems as if he had rather have the old ghost back again. Most whimsically he wants to unite all parties against France—

Black spirits and white, Blue spirits and grey,

all are welcome to him. The moderate Jacobins he takes to his bosom: they were only misled by their feelings. The violent Jacobins he appeals to as men of proud spirits. He wishes to sing Ca Ira to them, and to head them all. Oh! had I, he sighs, but plenty of Jacobins here! But on what principle would they carry on the war? If they were able to curtail the power of Buonaparté, would not their views increase, and would they ever stop without making an example of the regicide republic? If they will speak out fairly, will they not confess this? Will the country, then, for such a purpose consent to turn out the present ministers? Sir, upon the spirit of the country I wish to say a few words. I have heard from one noble lord, with regret, what I hope was but a slip, that the spirit of the country is worn out. I think that noble lord must retract that idea. Sir, I certainly looked to the rejoicings at the peace as an unmanly and irrational exultation. Do I rebuke the people for rejoicing at the blessings of peace? No Sir, but for rejoicing without asking about the terms. Did they rejoice that we had gained Trinidad and Ceylon? Would two farthing candles have been burnt less had we not obtained them? No, Sir, if they had believed that they had been fighting for civilized order, morality, and religion; and if, believing this, they exulted in such a peace, then it proves, that their spirit was worn out. But I allude to this, in order that the enemy may not be led into a mistake upon the subject. Sir, one of the disadvantages attending the present administration is, that they will not turn, when they are attacked by the last administration. They are hampered by the votes they gave for the war. But from the period of the allegations that it was a war for the Scheldt, I assert that it continued to be a war upon false pretences. The people were told that it was a war for religion and good order, and they found that peace was ready to be made at Lisle, without any reference to those causes. The right hon. gentleman says, what baseness, what meanness, while religion was in their mouths, to consent to steal a sugar island. It is true, Sir, though it comes a little extraordinarily from that man who was one of the cabinet ministers at the time of the negociation at Lisle. It should appear as if there had indeed been great discord in the cabinet: there never was greater, says the hon. gentleman. They acted not merely like men in a boat, rowing different ways, but like men in the boat of a balloon. Up the ex-secretary of war was ascending to the clouds, whilst Mr. Dundas was opening the valve and letting out the gas to descend; while one was throwing out ballast to mount to the most chivalrous heights, the other was attempting to let drop an anchor upon a West India island. Each of these ministers was suffered to have his favourite plan. The ex-secretary at war was allowed to nibble at the coast of France, the war secretary of state to make a descent upon a sugar island; and thus they went on till the letter from lord Grenville, that letter never to be forgotten, and I will add, never to be forgiven, made its appearance, and the people took a deep and settled disgust. Why did this not appear? And this, Sir, ought to be a lesson to us. The mouths of the people were shut and gagged, and the government were acting without knowing any thing of their circumstances. Sir, in such circumstances, the integrity of their minds was disgusted, and they were glad to get rid of the war at any rate. Upon this subject I have dwelt the more particularly, because I wish Buonaparté not to mistake the cause of the joy of the people. He should know, that if he commits any act of aggression against them, they are ready to enter singly into the contest, rather than suffer any attack upon their honour and their independence. I shall proceed no further. I perfectly agree with my hon. friend, that war ought to be avoided, though he does not agree with me on the means best calculated to produce that effect. From any opinion he may express, I never differ but with the greatest reluctance. For him my affection, my esteem, and my attachment are unbounded, and they will end only with my life. But I think an important lesson is to be learnt from the arrogance of Buonaparté. He says he is an instrument in the hands of Providence, an envoy of God: he says he is an instrument in the hands of Providence to restore Switzerland to happiness, and to elevate Italy to splendor and importance. Sir, I think he is an instrument in the hands of Providence to make the English love their constitution the better; to cling to it with more fondness; to hang round it with truer tenderness. Every man feels when he returns from France that he is coming from a dungeon to enjoy the light and life of British independence. Sir, whatever abuses exist, we shall still look with pride and pleasure upon the substantial blessings we still enjoy. I believe too, Sir, that he is an instrument in the hands of Providence, to make us more liberal in our political differences, and to render us determined with one hand and heart to oppose any aggressions that may be made upon us. If that aggression be made, my hon. friend will, I am sure, agree with me, that we ought to meet it with a spirit worthy of these islands; that we ought to meet it with a conviction of the truth of this assertion, that the country which has achieved such greatness, has no retreat in littleness; that if we could be content to abandon every thing, we should find no safety in poverty, no security in abject submission: finally, Sir, that we ought to meet it with a fixed determination to perish in the same grave with the honour and independence of the country.

Mr. Canning rose and said:—I feel, Sir, all the disadvantage under which I rise, to claim, for a short time, the attention of the committee, while they are yet warm with those impressions of admiration and delight which must have been excited in the minds of all who hear me, by the speech just delivered by my hon. friend. And were it not that that speech contained some allusions pointed personally to me, upon which I am particularly anxious to have as early an opportunity as possible of offering a few observations, I should certainly have better consulted my own interest, than to expose myself to a comparison by which

I must be so great a sufferer. This consolation, however, I have for the danger and difficulty of the situation in which I stand up to address you (and to me, with the feelings of personal kindness and regard which subsists between my hon. friend and myself, it is no small consolation), that if I am the first to encounter the hazard of so perilous a contrast, I am also the first who have the opportunity of expressing in words, those sentiments which I am persuaded I feel only in common with every man in the House, sentiments, not of satisfaction only, but of thankfulness for the part which my hon. friend has this day taken; a part which he has taken this day not for the first time; for it is surely in the recollection of the House, it is most certainly in the recollection of the country, at how many other periods of public embarrassment and anxiety in the course of the last eventful and tremendous years, my hon. friend, throwing aside all petty distinctions of party feeling, has come forward, often under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, often discouraged, always alone, as the champion of his country's rights and interests, and has rallied the hearts and spirits of the nation. At this time, indeed, such an exertion was peculiarly necessary. Never was a moment at which it was so desirable to recall the attention, and revive the courage of the House, and to present to them a true picture of their situation; of the dangers which impend over us, and of the exertions by which we must be prepared to meet them. I trust we shall now hear no more of those miserable systems, the object of which is, not to rouse us to ward off our ruin, but to reconcile us to submit to it. I trust we shall hear no more of those weak, fallacious, and degrading hopes which have been held out, not to inspire, but to relax the exertions of the country; hopes founded on the calculation of what the chapter of accidents (as it is called) may produce, to favour our escape from a destruction, which we are taught that it is in vain to endeavour to resist; hopes founded sometimes on the possibility of Buonaparté's death, before his plans for our subjugation are brought to maturity; sometimes on the probability of changes in France; on the very magnitude of the French empire, which, it seems, affords a sure presage of its downfall (yes, of its downfall, perhaps some century hence, when we may long have made a subordinate part of it!);

lastly, hopes of what unknown and unthought-of things time or chance may effect for us, and for the world! O! contemptible substitutes for rational precaution and manly readiness! Time and chance can do nothing for those who will do nothing for themselves! Providence itself (if it were not impious to assign limits to Omnipotence) can scarcely save a people who are not prepared to make a struggle for their own safety. And then, sir, the systems that have been recommended to us! recommended too from high authority, the authority of great abilities, and of popular and respectable names! "We have nothing to dread from France but a rivalry in commerce," says the hon. gentleman opposite to me (Mr. Fox). Look round, sir, on the state of the world, and can such an argument, even from such a man, need farther refutation? "We may be safe and happy, if we will but keep to ourselves," says an hon. friend of mine (Mr. Wilberforce), of whom I am sure I mean to speak with every profession of that respect and esteem which his character claims; "if we will abjure the continent; if shut up in our own island, safe within the surrounding impassable barrier of the sea, we confine our attention to objects immediately concerning our own comfort and happiness, and cultivate the acts of peace, unmolested and unmolested." True, if unmolested; but these pictures of flowing felicity, these exhortations to inoffensive quiet, do they suit the times to which they are applied? or will not my hon. friend condescend to consider their practical possibility, before he shuts us out from any other chance of safety, but what is to be found in our own disposition to repose? Happy times, indeed, if they ever shall come, when we can realize these dreams of independent and unconnected security, when we can do without any intercourse with the corrupt nations of the continent, wretches whose territories are separated from each other by no other barriers than mountains and rivers, and who are consequently unfit for any intercourse with a pure insulated people like ourselves! Then shall the din of war never reach our tranquil shores! Then, instead of traversing the boisterous ocean, at the imminent hazard of their lives, our sailors shall be raised, for peaceful purposes, on the margins of duck-ponds, and the towing-paths of canals! But till this millennium does arrive, in God's name, sir, let us look about us! Let us consider the state of the world as it is, not as we fancy it ought to be! Let us not seek to hide from our own eyes, or to diminish in the eyes of those who look to our deliberations for information, the real, imminent, and awful danger which threatens us, from the overgrown power, the insolent spirit, and still more, the implacable hatred of our natural rivals and enemies! Let us not amuse ourselves with vain notions, that our greatness and our happiness, as a nation, are capable of being separated. It is no such thing. The choice is not in our power. We have, as my hon. friend (Mr. Sheridan) has well observed, no refuge in littleness. We must maintain ourselves what we are, or cease to have a political existence worth preserving.

Such, Sir, is the view of our situation, which we are now called upon to take; such the tone and temper in which we must deliberate upon it, if we would deliberate to any purpose. And for recalling us to that tone, for shaming that dangerous and delusive mixture of whining despondency and false security which for the last two or three nights have been gradually gaining the ascendancy in our debates, my hon. friend has my thanks; he has rendered, in so doing, an essential service to his country. His speech, coming from the quarter from which it came, has done incalculable good. Let not my hon. friend suppose I grudge him the merit and the fame which belong to such a display of talents, when I add, that I lament that such a speech did not proceed from the mouth of a minister. Language like his, in the mouths of the administration at this crisis, would, in my opinion, have done more than fleets and armies to ward off the attack of a foreign enemy, and to animate and maintain the spirit and energy of the people; but from that quarter we have looked for such declarations in vain. And this leads me, Sir, to that part of my hon. friend's speech, in which, agreeing cordially as I do in the general sentiment which pervades the whole, I find myself under the necessity of differing from him. He has stated it as a matter of grave imputation against those who, like myself, are ready to vote for every measure of defence and preparation that the minister may think proper to propose, that while we concur in such measures, we do not withhold expressions of distrust or disapprobation of the general conduct and system of policy of those who propose them. It is argued by him and others as if there were something unfair and uncandid in not giving full confidence to the government at the moment when the particular subject of debate is one on which you agree with them. Now, Sir, I am, on the contrary, of the opinion which has been so well expressed and so well defended, by an hon. friend of mine (Mr. Cartwright) who spoke early in this debate, that it would be much more uncandid and unfair to conceal your general sentiments, at the moment when you are expressing partial approbation. In times of more regular and marshalled party, indeed, all such reserve or qualification is wholly unnecessary. It is understood without explanation, that the general combined sense of those who usually act together either influences their vote upon each particular question (I am not defending the system, I am only stating it); or that if upon any particular question that uniform influence is suspended, the suspension is limited to the occasion, and the general sentiment of partiality or distrust remains unimpaired. Such, Sir, was the case with the gentlemen who sit opposite to me (the old Opposition) during the whole of the last war; with this difference indeed, that I do not remember a single instance in which they happened to think the minister right, in which, even in the most perilous moments of external difficulty, or internal disquiet, they, even upon any one occasion suspended the inveteracy of their parliamentary opposition. But if, now the state of things is changed, if (whether to the advantage or detriment of the country I will not now discuss) the system of regular combination and marshalled parties is at an end; if individuals are called upon to decide upon measures as they arise, on their own individual and conscientious judgments; is it to be imputed as blame to men so judging, and acting conscientiously upon their opinions, that they limit the opinions which they give, to the occasion which calls for them? and that approving, for instance, of the armament, because they, in their view of the state of the world, think it indispensably necessary, but disapproving of the mode in which that necessity is stated, or rather is not stated to parliament and the country, they avow one of these sentiments as freely as the other? What would gentlemen have? Would they have us do the converse of what we are doing, and disapprove of the armament itself, however necessary it may appear to us, because we cannot approve of the manner in which it has been proposed, or be satisfied with the grounds that have been laid for it? Would they have us do this? This was the conduct of the late Opposition. But I trust there is not a man with whom I have the honour to agree in opinion who would not reject with abhorrence any suggestion to act so dishonourable a part. No, Sir, we are not ready, whatever we may think of the counsels by which we have been brought into our present danger; whatever we may think of our chance of being extricated from it by the same counsels; we are not therefore ready to obstruct even those counsels in any thing confessedly directed to that end; we are not therefore ready to deliver our common country defenceless into the possession of an enemy.

But my hon. friend, taking under his powerful protection a ministry so hardly used as he describes the present ministry to be, complains that the unfairness lies in this; that while the approbation of their measures is specific, the expressions of distrust are vague and general; conveying no distinct accusation, pointed at no particular part of their conduct, and evincing only a fastidious dislike of their persons, not founded on any reasonable objection, nor supported by any intelligible charge. Sir, let others speak for themselves; for myself, I can most confidently say, and had my hon. friend happened to be present on any former night of debate, he would have borne me witness, that not one word personal to the right hon. gentleman below me (the chancellor of the exchequer) or his colleagues has escaped my lips; except indeed a few words on the last night of debate, expressive of the personal good will, and sincere and unaltered regard which I bear to one of them, the noble secretary of state (lord Hawkesbury); by which expressions I testified, I trust in no niggardly or reluctant manner, the satisfaction with which I heard from him (and I did hear with real satisfaction) the only speech that any of his majesty's ministers have yet made, in a tone at all suited to the circumstances of the times and of the country. But that I have arraigned the conduct, that I have pointed out what appeared to me to be gross blunders and mismanagement in the policy of the administration in respect to foreign affairs, that I have made no charge, without stating the grounds of it in the best way that I was able, I would appeal to my hon. friend himself, if he had been present in the House, and I do appeal to all those whom I may have had the honour of addressing on those occasions. My argument may have been good, or bad; convincing, or frivolous; my view of the points to which I took the liberty of calling the attention of the House on the first day of the session, may have been just or false; my charges of misconduct well made out, or proved to be unfounded: for this I am no otherwise responsible, than that I spoke nothing but what I was myself honestly persuaded was the truth; and what is more, every thing that I alleged remains to this hour unanswered. But that I did not indulge in random imputations I do most positively affirm. I stated, Sir (but let not the House suppose that I am about to wrong them by going through the particulars of my argument again), I stated my firm persuasion, that by their mismanagement of affairs at the court of Petersburg, ministers had detached the emperor of Russia from his alliance with Great Britain, and driven him out of the line of policy which he had laid down for himself, into the arms of France; that by refusing to interest themselves for the king of Sardinia, they had lost him Piedmont: that this very refusal had been that which above all other things perhaps had disgusted and alienated the emperor of Russia; and that they had therefore most ingeniously contrived, at one cast as it were, to throw away the dominions of one ally, and the friendship of another. I stated, that after having made these sacrifices, from fear of France, and in order to avoid any ground of difference with Buonaparté, they had all of a sudden absurdly and unnecessarily departed from this system of policy, such as it was, and by their rash, ill timed, ill-considered, and ill supported remonstrance in behalf of Switzerland, had committed the honour of this country with no other effect than to precipitate and aggravate the misfortunes of the people for whom they interfered; and that the honour of the country so committed had never been redeemed. I stated this, Sir, as the prima facie case against the ministers, arising out of circumstances of public notoriety, and such as any man who takes the trouble to read the newspapers of the day could not avoid observing: and I challenged ministers, if they had any unknown circumstance to bring forward in contradiction, or in extenuation, to bring it forward in answer to what I said; but this challenge has never been accepted. Sir, from this silence I did infer, and do infer, that the case is nearly as I have stated it. And I now assert, that by this conduct ministers have not entitled themselves to my general confidence; however, I may not disapprove of particular measures which they or any other men in their situation could not hesitate to adopt in such a state of the world as is now unfortunately before us. But I do also assert still farther, that part, and no small part, of the disadvantageous circumstances of this country does arise from those instances of misconduct in ministers which I have stated; from their having forfeited great advantages of alliance, and having sought opportunities of disgrace; from having conceded without conciliating, and interfered without prevailing; from having adopted a system of insulated policy unwisely in the first instance, departed from it in the second instance (in regard to the affairs of Switzerland), without necessity, and without effect, and retreated to it again discomfited and dishonoured; from having by all these circumstances humbled the dignity, and lowered the tone of the country, and thereby weakened the best and surest defence which any country can have for its honour and security, the respect of its enemies and rivals. Sir, will my hon. friend after this recapitulation, again accuse me of having acted, or (as he seemed to state it) professed to act on a groundless, womanish, fanciful distaste and dislike of his majesty's ministers; or will he not fairly own that if I am founded in my premises, I am justified in the conclusion, I mean in withholding my general confidence from ministers, whom I conceive to have done so ill by the country; and who having contributed to reduce it to the situation in which it lies, do not appear to me to be the persons best calculated to exalt and to sustain it?

But a further charge against me by my hon. friend, and that which I was most anxious not to let pass without an immediate answer, is that of my having, in contrast with the demerits and defects of the present administration, brought forward the name of a right hon. gentleman now absent (Mr. Pitt) and drawn invidious distinctions and comparisons between him and his successor in the office of chancellor of the exchequer. Sir, my first answer to this charge is, that I have never done so. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sheridan) had been present on the first night of the sessions, when he states this to have been done by me, he would know that I had done no such thing. Neither on that night nor at any other time have I brought forward my right hon. friend's (Mr. Pitt's) name, nor even alluded to his existence; except when I have heard, as on the first night of the session I certainly did hear from the hon. gentleman opposite to me (Mr. Fox) a direct and violent attack on the whole conduct and principles of his administration. Then indeed I did feel it impossible to be silent. I did feel that I should have been the most insensible and most ungrateful of mankind, if (amidst the silence of others much better capable of undertaking his defence) I had not done the little that was in my power to repel an attack at once so unqualified and so unjust. But even the reply which this attack provokes from me, my hon. friend (from misrepresentations made to him I am sure, not from intention,) has entirely misrepresented. He represents me to have averred among other things, that the event of the battle off Copenhagen, and that of the campaign in Egypt, were certain beforehand. Sir, I hope I need hardly argue, that I could not advance such an absurdity. What I did say was this: in answer to an assertion often made, and too often suffered to go uncontradicted, that the state in which the late administration left the country, was altogether not only deplorable but hopeless; I did take the liberty to point out some hopes and chances, and facilities, which they bequeathed to their successors; and I mentioned particularly the armament for the Baltic, and the expedition to Egypt, not as undertaking certain of success but as undertakings, which the eventual success, had justified, and with regard to which the new administration had this peculiar and remarkable advantage, that if they had both, or either of them failed, they (the new administration) would not have been responsible for the failure. The fruits of success were theirs; but not theirs the responsibility for failure. The very terms of this proposition show that I did not, and could not, state success as certain, and failure as impossible. But I did and do state it as a singular facility and good fortune, which probably never attended the outset of any former administration, that they inherited from their predecessors in office, all their chances of credit and advantage, while they stood clear of any discredit from reverse and disappointment. I did and do state this circumstance as a complete answer to all the stuff that we have heard about sacrifice in taking office on the one hand, and all the unjust aspersions about flying from difficulty and responsibility on the other. If in this respect the former ministry cannot be justified without detracting something from the exaggerated panegyrics upon their successors, that is not my fault. I did not start the topic; but as often as it is started in my presence, I shall be ready to meet it precisely on the same ground. It is thus only, I say, Sir, in pure defence alone against charges directly brought against him, that I have ever even alluded to my right hon. friend. As to bringing forward his name in the way and with the view imputed to me by my hon. friend on the other side of the House, for the purpose of suggesting him back into office, that I confidently affirm I never have done, nor any thing like it; not because I am hypocrite enough to deny or disguise (when challenged to speak my mind) the wish which I entertain in common, as I verily believe, with the greatest part of the public; or my opinion of the absolute necessity of his being where he ought to be; of his filling again that situation which he alone is competent to fill with advantage to the country. I do not pretend to indifference in this point; but I feel and acknowledge that the very sentiments of personal attachment and affection which bind me to him make me an unfit person from whom the declaration of such an opinion should come uncalled for. My testimony could add nothing to the public sense of his merits; but the uncalled-for obtrusion of it might subject me to imputations of personal views and interest, vulgar imputations to be sure, and such as I am truly sorry my hon. friend over the way, or my hon. friend the attorney-general, should have allowed himself on a former night to adopt and sanction; but such as, though I have something within me (be it pride or conscience) that enables me to treat them with disdain, neither I nor any man in his senses would wilfully go out of his way to incur. I say this to convince my hon. friend, not only that I did not, but that I could not, consistently with these feelings, for the sincerity of which I am sure he will give me credit, originate any such suggestion as he has imputed to me.

But if I am pushed to the wall, and forced to speak my opinion, I have no disguise nor reservation; I do think that this is a time when the administration of the government ought to be in the ablest and fittest hands; I do not think the hands in which it is now placed answer to that description; I do not pretend to conceal in what quarter I think that fitness most eminently resides; I do not subscribe to the doctrines which have been advanced, that in times like the present the fitness of individuals for their political situation is no part of the consideration to which a member of parliament may fairly turn his attention. I know not a more solemn or important duty that a member of parliament can have to discharge than by giving at fit seasons, a free opinion upon the character and qualities of public men. Away with the cant of "measures, not men!" the idle supposition that it is the harness and not the horses that draw the chariot along! No, Sir, if the comparison must be made, if the distinction must be taken, men are every thing, measures comparatively nothing. I speak, Sir, of times of difficulty and danger; of times when systems are shaken, when precedents and general rules of conduct fail. Then it is, that not to this or that measure, however prudently devised, however blameless in execution, but to the energy and character of individuals, a state must be indebted for its salvation. Then it is that kingdoms rise or fall in proportion as they are upheld, not by well-meant endeavours (laudable though they may be), but by commanding, over-awing talents; by able men. And what is the nature of the times in which we live? Look at France, and see what we have to cope with, and consider what has made her what she is? A man. You will tell me that she was great, and powerful, and formidable, before the date of Buonaparté's government; that he found in her great physical and moral resources; that he had but to turn them to account. True, and he did so. Compare the situation in which he found France with that to which he has raised her. I am no panegyrist of Buonaparté; but I cannot shut my eyes to the superiority of his talents, to the amazing ascendant of his genius. Tell me not of his measures, and his policy. It is his genius, his character, that keeps the world in awe. Sir, to meet, to check, to curb, to stand up against him, we want arms of the same kind. I am far from objecting to the large military establishments which are proposed to you. I vote for them with all my heart. But for the purpose of coping with Buonaparté, one great commanding spirit is worth them all. This is my undisguised opinion. But when I state this opinion thus undisguisedly, is my right hon. friend to be implicated in a charge of prompting what I say? Sir, I wish not to speak of myself; but I must say thus much, we are both above such a suspicion. Such, however, is the charge brought against him, accompanied and aggravated by another not less disgraceful to him, of guiding at a distance, in secrecy and irresponsibility, the measures of the government, and thus playing one part of his friends against the other. Of all the imputations to which that right hon. gentleman could be subjected, I confess I did think that of intrigue and cabal the least likely to be preferred against him by any man who has witnessed his public conduct; and least of all, perhaps, by my hon. friend opposite to me, who is a better judge of men than to believe what he says, and whose heart, I am sure, disclaims the accusation at the moment that he is making it. Is there any thing in the life of that right hon. gentleman, is there any thing in the last years of his life, to justify such an accusation? No, Sir. Never did young ambition, just struggling into public notice, and aiming at popular favour, labour with half so much earnestness to court reputation, and to conciliate adherents, as my right hon. friend has laboured, since his retreat from office, not to attract but to repel, not to increase the number of his followers, but to dissolve attachment and to transfer support. And if, whatever have been his endeavours to insulate and individualize himself in political life, he has not been able to succeed wholly even with those who would sacrifice to his wishes every thing but their attachment to him; if with the public he has succeeded not at all, what is the inference? what, but that, retreat and withdraw as much as he will, he must not hope to efface the memory of his past services from the gratitude of his country; he cannot withdraw himself from the following of a nation; he must endure the attachment of a people whom he has saved. For him, therefore, I disdain to answer such a charge as has been made against him. For myself I may be allowed to say, that, for this one plain reason, if for no other, I cannot very fairly allow him to be held answerable for the sentiments which I have uttered, because till the moment in which I uttered them I was myself wholly unconscious of any intention to make any such declaration as I have made: it has been extorted from me. If my right hon. friend had been sitting in his place here beside me, he would have been as unprepared to hear, as I was to pronounce it. But had he been sitting here, called upon as I have been, I would not the less have declared myself as I have done, however the fear of hurting his delicacy might have awed and constrained me. But, present or absent, he is no party to what I say.—Thus much, Sir, for that part of the charge in which I am coupled with my right hon. friend. The other, that of guiding the administration, it is not for me to answer: but it is one no less grave and serious in itself, and requires a no less distinct and peremptory refutation. And I do trust that his majesty's ministers will feel the strongest anxiety to remove an imputation equally discreditable to him and to themselves. I am confident they will not suffer this night to pass over, without disclaiming in the most unequivocal terms any secret guidance, any overruling influence, such as has been, groundlessly I am sure, insinuated against them and him; such as not only his, and their characters, but the constitution of the country itself, is deeply interested in their disclaiming. For, if on the part of my right hon. friend, I think myself entitled to claim that he shall not be loaded with responsibility where he has not power, I would claim no less strenuously on behalf of my country, that it should not be governed, nor held to be governed, by power, without constitutional responsibility. Sir, this is all that I think it necessary to trouble you with upon those points in my hon. friend's speech, which occasioned my rising to address you. I shall give my vote this night in favour of large military establishments; but I need not detain you with any further statement of the reasons by which that vote is determined.

Mr. Wilberforce rose to explain some parts of his speech which had been misrepresented. He never had said, that we should utterly disregard the continent; but that we should be cautious of being too forward in the affairs of the continent, in which experience had shown that we had generally been too forward to engage, and too obstinate to continue. He had said that we ought to improve our agriculture, encourage our manufactures, our fisheries, and the internal sources of prosperity. He thought that we should endeavour to gain the affection of the people, to cultivate the popular sentiment, to revive the national spirit, to repair what had become defective in any parts of the constitution; and, as commerce on the one hand tended to liberalize, so on the other it tended to induce a selfish character, that we ought to endeavour to correct that tendency, particularly when it might injure the purity of the constitution. Adverting to the immediate question, he was much more inclined to agree to an increase of the navy than the army, from the nature of the different services. He alluded to Mr. Pitt's disinterested support of the present ministers — a conduct which stamped the magnanimity of his character; and he contrasted that conduct with the behaviour of those who pretended to support the present ministry, and who did it with so ill a grace. He said they seemed to “damn with faint praise.” For his part he thought, in a crisis like this, it was proper to throw away all party connexion, and to give ministers a disinterested support. He was for considering measures and not men, rather than for being guided by that sort of partiality for men, which had been mentioned.

Mr. Fox said;—At so late an hour, when the attention of the House is so much exhausted, though they must have been equally delighted, by what they lately heard from my hon. friend, I should not have offered myself, were it not for the turn the debate has taken; and I therefore feel it a duty I owe, not only to myself, but to my constituents and my country, to say a few words. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Canning) has attempted to answer some part of what I said on a former occasion, by totally misrepresenting it; and that part of it which he does not misrepresent, he does not attempt to answer at all. Now, this is rather wonderful, considering that the hon. gentleman is not deficient in abilities, and certainly not in readiness. He need not, therefore, have waited for newspaper misstatements, or any other species of assistance, since he might have replied on the spot to that which he censures. He begins with saying, that the power of France is now “confessed” by me. “Confessed” by me! And was it necessary that the hon. gentleman should now for the first time find out that this was confessed? Did the hon. gentleman never hear me most distinctly charge it upon his friends, the late ministry, that, by their misconduct, they contributed so much to the aggrandizement of France? But he complains that I have not proposed a remedy for the evil that is confessed. But has the hon. gentleman himself proposed any remedy? Some say, and that but few, “go to war.” The hon. gentleman does not say so. Yet what remedy has been proposed, except the high tone and fine words in which so much reliance seems to be placed, I have not yet heard. It is not said that the conduct of France to Switzerland, in the German indemnities, and other articles of complaint against France, are singly grounds of a new war, nor is it said that taken together they amount to a cause of war; for if they do, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, why does he not state it as a specific charge against ministers, that they do not advise his majesty to declare war? If he does not think we should go to war, where do he and I differ but in the efficacy of fine words, and high tone? If he does think war the remedy, I am ready to join again with him on that ground of argument. But let him speak out. One hon. gentleman said, that if there was a person in this country, the agent of France, he could not do better than by holding such and such language. He seemed to say, that he might have supposed that those who held that language must be the agents of France, if he did not find that language used by a gentleman, whom he cannot suspect of being an agent of France. The speech of that hon. gentleman I certainly did very much approve. Indeed I am under considerable obligation to that gentleman for being in some sort my compurgator in this charge of being an agent of France, and on this account the satisfaction his speech afforded, may be thought not altogether disinterested. I wish gentlemen would speak out. Do they believe that I stand up here as the agent of France? Do they think me actuated by hatred against my own country, or bribed to betray its interests? I have been in Paris lately, on pursuits foreign to the House, though much connected with my private occupations. Would it be strange, think they, if going to Paris to read Barrillon's dispatches, and find out who were the pensioners of France in Charles and James's reign, I had contrived to get a pension for myself! If any body think so I shall not take the trouble to undeceive them; but if they do so, it is a more rational sort of charge than the common-place reproach, that I am the apologist of France! That kind of topic may do very well for those who use it, the places where it is used, and those it is intended to please; but I should expect something better here. The apologist of France! And is not this the reproach that is used in every war, the grounds of which are at all disputed? If this be a war not only with France, but with Russia (perhaps that may be a case in which, in a former war, I did receive a bribe!) those who think that other countries are not so much in the wrong as to justify a war, must lay their account with being exposed to the hacknied charge of being the apologist of enemies. Differing from those who are for large establishments, I hope it will not be expected that I should clear myself of a design to invite the French to invade this country. I remember, that a near and very respectable relation of mine, the duke of Richmond, was accused, during the American war, of having it as a favourite object to procure the French to invade Sussex. Proceeding in the way of information, his grace had an opportunity of denying the charge on oath, and making an affidavit that it was no favourite plan of his that the French should invade Sussex. Now, as I have no opportunity of swearing that I do not intend to invite the French to invade this country, I hope gentlemen will take it on my word. To come to the question of the establishment of the army, it may be considered, whether a small or a great army be best suited to the defence of the country. I find it said, that, as formerly, alliances superseded the necessity of large establishments, now, having no alliances, we should have a large army. Now, I believe the argument in former times to have been directly the reverse. It was because we had connexions with the continent, and not for our own defence, that standing armies were proposed; and this the preamble of every mutiny bill, since king William's reign, states. It would have roused the pride and indignation of our ancestors, if they had been told that a large standing army was necessary for their internal defence. No, it was on account of our continental alliances that a standing army was justified. Not thinking the policy of our ancestors wrong in regard to continental affairs, I cannot altogether disapprove a standing army—an object certainly of great jealousy. But how does the argument apply? What are the most glorious wars in which this country has been engaged for the last century? They are those that are called the War of Succession, and the Seven Years war. Now, it is certain, that previous to these wars, our peace establishment was lower than the peace establishments previous to other wars in which we were less successful. The peace establishment, after the peace of Utrecht, a period of the longest cessation of war, was likewise very low. But it may be said, that the establishments of France were even proportionably low. If relative proportion be made the rule, it will not be easy to apply it satisfactorily. The truth is, that the power of France is different in its principle, from the power of Great Britain, and hence arises a necessary variation in the principle of our offensive and defensive war. It is not a ratio of 30, or 40, or 60,000, men, to any given number in France, that will enable us to judge when our establishment is adequate. An hon. gentleman alluded to the establishment in 1763 and in 1783; of the latter, which out of doors was styled a scandalously low establishment, I, as one of the advisers of it, am willing to take the responsibility. It was mentioned by the secretary at war, that then we had not Holland against us. But in fact, at the time of that establishment, Holland was as much in the hands of France as she is now. In effect, France, who had her colonies, made the peace for her, and under the influence of France, Holland remained till the events of 1787 overthrew it. We now come to the power of France, and really I am doubtful whether those who speak of that power in the most exaggerated terms, are not, in fact, speaking what is more agreeable and more useful to the French government, than those who talk of that power with greater moderation. Regardless of the certain misrepresentation to which I shall be subject, and the probable charge of maintaining paradoxes, I will maintain, that the government of France is less in a situation than formerly to make any attempt upon this country; if it be by invasions that we are to be menaced, and if it be against invasion that high establishment is intended. If we consider the state of the French navy, compared with our own, we must see that for this species of attack there cannot, for several years at least, be any well-founded alarm.—The acquisition of Switzerland has been insisted upon as showing a hostile spirit. But is this the first time we knew that the government of France, past, as well as present, were actuated by ambition? But it is admitted, that the conduct of France to Switzerland, which touches the feelings of all so much, and of which no man can entertain a stronger sense than I do, does not form an aggression against this country. Why, then, should it be an argument for adding 20 or 30,000 men to our establishment? How is the danger of our situation, which my hon. friend, as well as others, laboured by admirable powers of declamation so much to exaggerate, increased by that measure? Is 20,000 men added to our expenses, a remedy against the French attack on Switzerland? Is men's talking bravely then to be the remedy? Brave words are easily spoken, and prove no courage. "He did speak prave words in the preach," says, captain Fluellen, in Henry the 5th, of Pistol, who imposed upon the honest Welchman with fine words. But instead of augmenting our army now, might not, upon the old foundation of our army, as many more troops be added in a short space as any emergency might require? Is the danger of invasion to be feared? In 1779 and 1780, I was apprehensive of invasion, because the superiority by sea being then doubtful, the French having landed an army, might have been able to send reinforcements, and compel us to sustain a war upon English ground, though I have no doubt that the spirit and courage of the country might have finally prevailed. But now our superiority by sea is unquestionable, and must so continue for at least some time. The French then must evade our fleet. They might, perhaps, succeed in landing an army, and the possession of Belgium certainly gives new facilities. But then, if an army were landed, all succour would be cut off, and the whole must be either taken or destroyed. When I hear it said, that we know not what so desperate a people may do; in the first place, I do not see that the French do such desperate things.

In all the last war, when they may be supposed as desperate as they ever were, they never did think seriously of an invasion. The expedition to Egypt was not a desperate enterprise, for till the glorious victory of Nelson, the French thought they could cope with us in the Mediterranean. Some may say, let the French come, we are ready to meet them. Now, I confess I neither wish the French had come, nor that they would come; though I have not a doubt that the spirit and energy of the nation would quickly have decided the fate of the invaders. They would do mischief; but surely ten millions of men attached to the constitution, and all are so, would have shown that whatever mischief they might do, they could not subject us. Those who choose to exaggerate the courage, strength, force, genius, or desperation of the French, cannot think there is any danger that we should finally be subjected by any force the French could steal over to this country. Do they really believe, that there is any danger of seeing the tri-coloured flag flying on the Tower of London? Is it possible that a people so numerous, however dastardly, (and I think the people of England as brave as any nation in the world) could be subdued by 40,000 men—the greatest number that could be conveyed over to this country in the relative state of the navies of France and England? It is ridiculous to think so, if any thing connected with so serious a subject can be thought ridiculous. Indeed, those who paint our situation and our prospects in the most gloomy colours do not want good humour enough to enliven the canvass with many ludicrous touches; so that if they describe us as ruined, it is in the temper of the man in the play, who is told "if you are an undone man, you really are the merriest undone man in Christendom." But an invasion, though it would neither destroy our laws, our government, nor our constitution, might do serious mischief, I confess. It would perhaps destroy or suspend that credit and that wealth, of which some gentlemen speak so contemptuously, in comparison of guns and bayonets. But if we are not vulnerable by invasion of the soil of Great Britain, there are vulnerable points in our situation. Are we not vulnerable through our finances? Might not the French think that, to harass this country by expensive establishments; to divert in useless and cumbrous forces, the resources that might be employed in accelerating the extinction of the national debt, was no very unsuccessful way of carrying on war with us? It was lately said, that the greatest part of the population of Ireland was disaffected; but, without ascribing great effects to the Union, nay, unless we suppose the government outrageously bad, the people of Ireland must, in a few years, be much less disaffected than they now are. Thus, a few years of peace and moderate establishment would enable us to throw off a considerable part of that debt which in war was called the best ally of France; while peace would equally tend to fortify us in Ireland—a point where it is evident we now are vulnerable. Is not France, then, much more likely to direct her efforts against our finances than to invasion, in which, at any time, there is so little prospect of success, and in which, for some time, there can be no prospect of success at all? The funds by the late war, fell from 97 to 47; 50 per cent! They again have risen to 67; but, supposing a new war to take place, what would be the consequence of the funds losing 50, or even 30 per cent on the price of 67? Instead, however, of such a loss, if peace is preserved, and our resources, increased by economy, applied to the extinction of the public debt, I am almost sure that the funds would again rise to 97.—I have already remarked, that the strength of France and England is different; their offensive and defensive systems are different; the credit of this country is a main spring of its greatness and of its wealth. In France there was no great deal of credit before the Revolution, but the utter destruction of it by the war, and the events of the war though it spread much misery through France, did not unnerve that country. It rather contributed to swell the armies of the republic; and to add to the conquests they made. In England, the destruction of credit, though it would not be attended with the loss of the independence of the country (for we might still possess men and arms) yet it would spread infinite misery over the land. Let us therefore ward off from our finances and from our credit every danger; because though not fatal to our existence their overthrow would be fatal to our well-being. I confess that I never could enter so far into the sentiment, common in ancient times, of being able to love my country, independently of loving my countrymen, and I should not be glad to see us reduced to a state of things, in which the country alone should be preserved, and every means of happiness and comfort finally torn from its inhabitants. High establishments would form no security against the danger which has been held out to us. Wise economy is the resource from which we shall draw the means of defending ourselves against every danger. If we have 25,000 men less, we shall in return in a short time have 25,000,000*l.* more to apply to our defence and to enable us to repel any aggression.—Hitherto I have argued the question upon the ground that war was an event which we might expect in no very distant period. But I do not think that we are obliged to anticipate a speedy war. Again, at the hazard of misrepresentation I must declare it to be my opinion, that it is for the interest of the French nation and of the French government, and that it is their wish to cultivate peace, and that with good management, without any particle of submission, peace may be preserved. Though this be my opinion, I would not risk one iota of the public safety and interest on that which must be very vague and loose speculation. I have shown, however, that in regard to your finances, you would by economical establishments, fortify your credit, and enlarge your resources for any future exigency.—The question of the navy establishment has been mixed with the consideration of the army; and I think strangely. It seems to be taken as a matter of course, that you must have a large army, because you have 50,000 seamen. Now, it appears to me, that the conclusion should be directly the reverse. It operates two ways. You need employ fewer soldiers for your defence, because you have augmented your navy: and the additional expense by sea, is an argument for additional economy in the establishment of your land forces. There is a way, too, in which a large army establishment may be raised; and it is hitherto unnoticed. Is there no constitutional consideration arising from a large standing army? A standing army without consent of parliament, is illegal; with the approbation of parliament, it may still be dangerous. I do not mean to say that the officers of the army are not friends to the constitution of their country. But consider the source of influence which the army affords; there is scarcely a gentleman in this House, who by himself, or relation, has not some one to look to in the army. I do not say, that this influence is pushed to carry a particular vote; but its effects in procuring a general support to the measures of administration is obvious. I would not, however exclude officers of the army from sitting in parliament; that would render the evil worse, because it would too much separate the characters of soldier and citizen. How is an army to be viewed, as soldiers distinct, or as citizens forming a part of the country? In the one case, they may have no sympathies with the people; in the other, they may, in the exercise of civil privileges, give a dangerous preponderance in an election, for instance, to any side they might espouse: but in fact they are to many purposes already, and wisely so, put under a control different from their fellow subjects. To these remarks, however, the naval establishment is not subject; and for that reason I agree with an hon. gentleman, that the naval establishment is on that account less liable to objection, while it affords us all the security we can have against the danger, magnified as it has been.—There is another view of the subject which, though not avowed, is perhaps entertained by some. It may be thought right to have a large establishment in order to go to war immediately, or very soon; certainly, if we are to go to war in a month or two, it would be idle to reduce our establishments. I can judge of ministers only from their words and their actions. The chancellor of the exchequer, if I rightly understood, said a few nights ago, that he saw no danger to the peace of Europe at present; and the secretary at war to day spoke out distinctly and candidly. He said it was our business to be armed against any danger. He and I differ as to the extent to which we should be armed; but he says, that we should provoke no war, that we should commit no aggression, that we should execute the treaty of Amiens, and that we should repel any insult or aggression with firmness and dignity. This is my creed. Is it probable then, that the aggression may come from France? An hon. general gave a very ugly reason why the peace should be agreeable to the late secretary at war, because the spirit of the country was become warlike; whereas, if the war had continued, the table would have been loaded with petitions against it. This is rather a suspicious argument, because it seems to say, that we have only got rid of the bad war which could not be continued in order to get another more acceptable. My hon. friend himself, I am sure, rejoices in the peace, and does not wish to begin the war on a new score. But in fact every thing convinces me more and more that the people are decidedly for peace. Gentlemen, however brave and warlike in their language, always conclude with saying, “nevertheless I am for peace!” They naturally wish to stand well with their constituents, and they do not fail to utter a sentiment which they know will be agreeable to them. Much has been said of the tone we ought to assume, but what is the object to which all this tends? My hon. friend with much humour, alluded to those who, with their arms a-kimboo would sit stock-still, notwithstanding all their complaints against France. Now, whether my hon. friend could sit stock-still, with his arms a-kimboo, I cannot tell; he does little more than leave the tongue at liberty, and recommends you to acquiesce in peace after a bluster at proceedings with which we are not to interfere. It has been said, indeed, that a remonstrance has been presented respecting the attack on Switzerland. I know not whether in the precise circumstances or manner of that remonstrance it was proper, though I have no reason to believe that it was not. Remonstrances may be presented in cases where no war is deemed expedient, even if the remonstrance be ineffectual. This happened in the case of Corsica in 1769. As to philippics, sure we must have philippics to keep up the national spirit. I am very willing that they be taken into account as provision for our security, but I hope that 30,000 men will, in lieu of them, be deducted from our establishments. But if we are to have the 30,000 men into the bargain, I do not see what benefit they will produce. If danger really did appear, if invasion actually were effected, every feeling would be absorbed in those of repelling the invader, from the sovereign motive of self defence; so that all the declamation which was to nourish the spirit of the nation, would be fruitless and unnecessary.—Much had been said about men and measures: if he, who had always opposed the measures of the late administration, should say he hesitated to support the present ministers because they had always approved of the conduct of the last, he should speak a language, which, whether right or wrong, would at least be intelligible. But he could not see on what ground the gentleman near him, should object to a ministry who had always supported the measures they pretended to have admired. If the noble earl (Temple) and his friends had any advice to give to the crown, why did they not move an address to his majesty? But they had no advice to give—nothing to propose—and this was what distinguished an honourable party from an interested faction. They, were satisfied with the measures of ministers, but they wanted their places. The late chancellor of the exchequer was called for by the noble lord and his friends; but he had gone out, it seemed, on the catholic question. If that was the cause of his going out, how could he come in now? Their opinion of the present ministers was spoken plainly enough. It was not exactly what it had been described by an honourable gentleman opposite. They did not

And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer.

Theirs was certainly no praise at all; and, as certainly, nothing like civility; but, as to sneers, they were abundant enough. With regard to the views of Buonaparté, he saw no reason why, having gained great military glory, his ambition might not now induce him to turn his attention to the improvement of the commerce of his country. There was nothing improbable, nothing unnatural in this. Years of peace would enable this country to renew the war with increased means, but would not add, in the same proportion, to the resources of France.

Mr. Windham said, he felt it his duty to make some observations on the speeches of gentlemen who had delivered themselves early in the debate; but some parts of the speech of the hon. member who spoke last first deserved animadversion. That gentleman was certainly, in one respect, true to his principle. He always had entertained the same earnest desire for a peace with the French republic. He was now the apologist of their ambition and guilt. His language ever since the commencement of their revolution had been that of an apologist, often of an eulogist. He had exhausted volumes of encomiums on "that wonderful and stupendous fabric of human wisdom:" and up to this day he continued to look on it with affection. All the French enormities he keeps out of sight. Now and then, perhaps, they are lamented, but not censured and exposed. At all times, as on this night, he endeavours to lead away the feelings of his countrymen from their abhorrence of French conduct and French principles. He treats the new system as an old government; and seeks out similar instances of perfidy and oppression in the old government. Look at old times, says he—meaning that the morals of the republic had not been worse than those of the monarchy. But those who had seen them would best judge. These things had operated a wonderful change on his mind! They had operated that surprising love of peace which he did not feel before. On former occasions, particularly in 1787, what was his language? Did he not say that the treaty would stand in the way of future wars, and that was one among other reasons for his opposing it? And what was? Why, to interfere with the balance of power in Europe. But what was that but to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries? Now, the whole colour of his mind was changed by the revolution. Before that, his sentiments were English—he was English to the backbone. Now, the hon. gentleman wishes to make it out that we are in no danger. He finds out, that, by the diminution of her navy, France has much less power to hurt us; but the extent of the sea-coast, from the Texel to the Mediterranean, with all her other means, made a very different appearance. Reasons as good might have been advanced against her successes in other countries. We know something of her activity. What was the case with the battle of Marengo? Had general Melas not listened to the idea of the impracticability of passing the Alps, he might have stopped the consular march. When the news came over, that the Austrian general felt himself quite safe and sound, there was reason to fear for his real state. The hon. gentleman may know, that in the last war, those in military stations were generally the least afraid of a bold and daring enterprise of the enemy, who had the least means of resisting them in such cases. They were most desirous of guarding every point, who knew by their own experience what talents and boldness might accomplish. The hon. gentleman had said, that though an invasion would be productive of much mischief, it would stop short of subjugation. But the whole question was, what, in case of invasion, would be the best means of defending the country—the troops or the money? Twenty thousand men were far better than any equivalent sum of money in our pockets for such a purpose. Should the hon. gentleman's opinion of the pacific disposition fail him, then another part of his argument comes in question—that of the finances. But what was this but the same sort of comparative question? He had kept out of sight the other great dangers arising from the French revolution, as if that of an invasion was the only one. We ought to consider what was the French navy, now that it consisted not only of the French, but Spanish, Dutch, and other ships; and what were the French means of commerce; and how they could make their military power bear upon matters of trade. So far as to troops and money compared. Then, as to the comparison the hon. gentleman made between our establishments after former pacifications. No inference was to be drawn from an antecedent state, as no times resembled these. He had said that, starting with low establishments, we had obtained splendid successes. But, does it follow, that a higher establishment would prevent similar success? At the commencement of the Seven Years war, we had very ill success—the consequence of that fallen state we were placed in by a low peace establishment. The hon. gentleman mentioned Ireland. Why, had we not had there two invasions? And was not that the most formidable which even disembarked her troops, that of Bantry Bay? Fleets may get across, then, and may land them in spite of our navy. Every measure was taken in France to promote conquest and hostility. This wonderful representative government, that was to give such liberty to all the world, has lately made another compulsory military conscription. He did not hear these matters from such high authority as the hon. gentleman; but he heard from very judicious, intelligent, and correct persons, who had been in France, that the idea of liberty had long been treated by all sober people as a government not fit for them; and the only consolation they had in view was, the grand consolidation of the grand empire of the world, by humbling or destroying us under their feet. There was a speech delivered in the course of the debate by an hon. gentleman (Mr.

Sheridan), of which he must speak in terms of very high praise, excepting one part of it; which, however, was not such as to make him alter his opinion of it as a whole. He did not like to speak of persons instead of measures and principles; but it was a custom to say of him, that he wished to plunge the nation into a war. It was utterly incorrect and unfounded. When asked, what he would advise to the House and to ministers, he had distinctly marked out the line. It was, not to give up any thing which success or accident might have thrown in our hands, and that some places had been imprudently parted with already. He would not give an opinion grounded upon imperfect evidence. Therefore, that we should have done well in making war at present, he could not take upon him to say. The hon. gentleman had said that French principles were the object of war with him (Mr. W.) and his friends. Now, his objection was to French principles and French power. His sentiments were, that their principles led to power. Another paltry expedient was, attributing to him an attachment to the Bourbons. He hated French power under any family; but he thought peace safer under them, than under the consul. Their temple of liberty was transformed into the temple of Mars. All the decoration and scrolls, &c. were destroyed, and fire and destruction went forth to consume the earth. The whole question lay in this—money or money's worth. He preferred the latter.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, it had been asked, whether there was any thing in the state of the country at this time which so peculiarly distinguished it from other situations of the country, as to render the present establishment necessary? He should not act fairly, if he said that any circumstances were known to his majesty's ministers, that could justify their adopting any thing less than the establishment proposed. He had no scruple in declaring, that if the war had terminated in a manner conformable to the wishes of this House; if it had terminated by the attainment of those objects for which it was entered into; if France had been confined within her original limits, he still should have exhorted the House to have acceded to a much larger peace establishment than at any former period: he should have done so for the reasons alluded to by a noble lord; reasons which proved, that, by an increase of our peace establishment, we should not only have a much better chance of the continuance of peace, but of entering upon a war, in case circumstances should render hostile measures indispensable. But the condition in which the late treaty had left France, furnished still stronger arguments for the necessity of a formidable force. Her acquisitions in the Austrian Netherlands, her influence in Holland, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, and, in fact, over the whole continent, sufficiently evinced the necessity of a larger armament than would have been requisite, had peace been made under more favourable auspices. He should not act fairly by the committee, if he did not state, that, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, circumstances had occurred, which furnished additional arguments for increasing our establishment. Taking, then, into consideration the necessity of having a larger establishment than that which existed at former periods, it was a duty imposed on him to recommend the force which had been moved for. Something had been said by an hon. gentleman behind him, to which it was impossible not to advert; referring to what had fallen from another right hon. gentleman, for whom he felt as much respect and regard as could actuate the breast of one human being towards another, he felt himself called upon to answer the insinuation he had thrown out. He had stated, that the right hon. gentleman to whom he alluded was still responsible for the measures of government. He should be ashamed if such charge could be supposed to be correct. For himself, and those who acted with him, he had only to say, that could they be supposed capable of subjecting themselves to the influence of others, they would have been totally undeserving of those marks of favour which their sovereign had bestowed upon them. He trusted he should at all times be ready to vindicate his own personal and official honour.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Dec. 9. The resolutions being reported,

Mr. T. Grenfell said, that those who heard what he had advanced when the navy estimates were under consideration, would recollect what were the grounds which he urged on that occasion. His assertion then was, that the House had passed that vote with less information to guide them in the propriety of passing it, than ever was before submitted to parliament on similar occasions. The answer given then to this observation by a noble lord was, that there was nothing in the history of parliament respecting the granting of the information required, that made the late proceedings of the House differ from those of former times. Till now he had no opportunity of answering these contradictions; but he would endeavour briefly to restate his objections. What is our situation, and what lights have we to enable us to judge of it? If we call for those lights we are referred to the speeches of ministers, which convey no information; and even if they did, are such speeches fit parliamentary documents to justify the House in coming to a decision on matters of the gravest moment? He might firmly maintain that no one instance has occurred in the parliamentary history of the country, in which ministers have come down, after the signing of a definitive treaty of peace, to call for supplies or large establishments without having advised his majesty to make some communication from the throne, intimating the probability that the peace would be lasting, or that it might be precarious, or if any dangers of a fresh rupture existed, without alluding to those dangers. The hon. gentleman then appealed to several speeches and messages recorded in the Journals, in corroboration of what he had advanced. The notoriety of a fact did not form a proper parliamentary ground of proceeding. Parliament should have real, solid, substantial documents before them to judge by. The want of such documents on the present occasion appeared to him to be a departure from the usual practice, dangerous to the constitution. Should not the House know what garrisons are to be supplied by the sums now to be voted? It is true that Malta has not yet been evacuated; it is equally known that orders have been sent out to retain the Cape. These were two considerable military points, and their fate should be known before an accurate judgment could be formed of the extent of the supply necessary. The hon. gentleman next proceeded to observe on the manner on which the army estimates were yesterday opened by the secretary at war. Nothing could be more clear, explicit, and manly than that opening; yet at the conclusion of his speech, there were some expressions that called for particular attention. The expressions he alluded to were these:—"The object of government in proposing to vote the present force, has two purposes in view, viz. to repel national insult and hostile aggression. He did not object to this use of the force. What he disliked was, that these expressions narrowed too much the effect which might be otherwise expected from it. Were we to vote 130,000 men merely for the purpose of sitting still till the French armies had actually invaded us? Too many of those who spoke on this subject seemed to be of that opinion. Such, however, has rarely been the mode of arguing adopted by that House, nor could he believe that the force now proposed would be limited to the simple purpose of resisting the invasion of the enemy—[a cry of hear! hear! from the treasury bench]. The hon. gentleman professed himself happy in hearing that expression of approbation. He hoped ministers would avail themselves of the force placed at their disposal, to speak a language to France, which should have its due impression. The present government of France, if such language was held out to them, would see the necessity of avoiding what might be fatal to them. To forbear holding a firm and determined language, was only encouraging the first consul to persist in his present wild career of conquest and aggrandizement. He felt much struck with the language held of late upon the subject of continental alliances. Were it our intention to look for an alliance with any great power on the continent, it was no doubt our duty to examine how far such a power might be able or willing to co-operate with us effectually; and when the continental powers saw that we intended to concentrate the whole of our force within our own island, and merely for our own defence, what encouragement could they feel to form an alliance with us? But his surprise was raised to an extraordinary degree, when he observed a man (Mr. Fox) whose opinion must always have so much weight in the country, broach doctrines so novel on this topic, and so inconsistent with his former sentiments. When the fate of the king of Sardinia was introduced into a late debate, that hon. gentleman had asked whose fault it was that the king of Sardinia was not restored? Was it the fault of France? no; he had said, it was the fault of Austria, that opposed his restoration, lest it should be purchased at the expense of her Venetian territories. That such an assertion had any foundation he could never bring himself to believe. Did Venice belong to Sardinia? or rather, might not this be a story told to the hon. gentleman by the French secretary of state in the foreign department? Talleyrand might have hinted that France would have given Piedmont to the king of Sardinia, if Austria would consent to cede Venice. It was said that partiality for the character and principles of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) prompted him to wish to place that right hon. gentleman at the head of affairs. To this charge he was ready to answer, Habes confitentem reum. Indeed it was his conscientious belief, that, if the country were to be canvassed, 99 out of 100 would be found of the same opinion. Were that great majority of the country to see him placed at the helm, their apprehensions would vanish, and a new vigour would be infused into the nation.

Lord Hawkesbury contended, that every part of the conduct of government had fully explained the system they had adopted, as far as had been usual, with regard to foreign affairs. It was not consistent with the general practice of the constitution, to bring the details of such discussions before parliament, unless ministers called for some vote or opinion founded upon those details. It had been maintained, that even when a general case had been made out by ministers, without the production of the details, they had a right to call for the support of parliament. This was the case at the period of the Russian armament, and it was afterwards said, on the other side of the House, that while the question was in discussion they had not inquired, but that when ministers called for a direct vote, they had a right to give the House full information upon the subject. With respect to the general system adopted by ministers, it had been asserted, that it was impossible to understand what that system was; as if ministers had never explained themselves upon the general principle of their conduct to France and other powers. He ought, perhaps, upon this subject, to refer to authentic documents, such as the speeches from the throne, and the addresses of that House; but from the nature of those records, they must be taken subject to the explanation of his majesty's confidential servants. It was impossible, in a speech or message from the throne, to enter into such a minute detail as would be necessary for the full explanation of the subject; but he admitted, that in those documents the general principle of the measure proposed ought always to be found. He was ready to contend, that it was impossible to conceive (as far as the circumstance would admit) a more complete explanation of the system which government had adopted, than was to be found in an amendment which he had moved to an address proposed last session by an hon. friend of his. He wished to ask any gentleman the meaning he would put upon the words of that amendment. It contained two propositions, which he did not mean to say could be separated entirely, but which were, however, in some degree distinct. The right hon. gentleman complained, that ministers had not explained whether they would interfere with the continental powers; his answer was, that that point was completely explained in the amendment he had read. He begged shortly to call the attention of the House to the late treaty, and to the address to which he had alluded. When other treaties of peace were concluded, the country negotiated for peace in conjunction with other powers; but when the late treaty was concluded, every power on the continent had been induced or compelled to make separate treaties of peace. We were by those circumstances insulated, and forced to make a separate peace, unconnected with any of the continental powers. His majesty's ministers rested the defence of that treaty upon the circumstances under which it had been proposed and concluded. They stated the line of conduct they had adopted in consequence of the unfortunate events which had happened on the continent; but they at the same time stated, that, so far from abandoning all continental connexions, it must always form a part of the system of this country. If he was asked for the application of that principle, his answer would be, that the application of it must depend upon circumstances and events; they had therefore engrafted that principle into the address to which he had alluded. That address, therefore, contained the system which the king's ministers had adopted, viz. that they would defend our own empire against all encroachments, and look with vigilance to the state of the continent. They had not attempted to define minutely what that line of conduct would be, because it must always be governed by circumstances. If this record wanted any confirmation, he might refer to the king's speech at the opening of the present session. This speech was conformable to the address to which he had before alluded; it maintained the same principles, and held the same language. As far, therefore, as language went, the system of the king's government had been explicitly avowed. The right hon. gentleman might assert, that ministers had not acted upon that system, that they had gone beyond, or had fallen short of it; but he had no right to say that they had not laid down any system. He should have thought, that upon the general principle of continental alliances it was almost unnecessary for him to make any profession. Whenever he had spoken upon the subject, he had uniformly maintained one opinion. It was a subject which had very early occupied his attention, and upon which he had given his opinion the first time he had had the honour of speaking in that House. He recollected that upon that occasion a right hon. friend of his had made a most able and ingenious speech, which contained the best case he had ever heard against the balance of power. But certainly that principle, like all others, might be pushed to an extreme. It appeared to him that it was one of those questions upon which there was great danger of our over-refining; and he thought it was the duty of government to guard against the extremes which a degree of over-refinement might sometimes occasion. That the interests of this country were not materially connected with those of the continent, or that we could exclude ourselves wholly, or even in a great degree, from all continental connexions, it would be absurd to contend. Our commerce, our wealth, our importance in the eyes of Europe, were such, that we could not say that we would entirely insulate ourselves. He knew it had been said upon this subject, that all continental connexions were in their nature dissoluble. This proposition was undoubtedly true; but what was the consequence that was to be inferred from it,—that no human work was in its nature perfect, and that continental alliances, because they were liable to dissolution, ought never to be entered into? That those alliances often contained in themselves the seeds of dissolution, was true; but the question was, whether, with all their defects, we were better with or without them? This was the only practical way of considering the subject. If he looked into the examples contained in history upon this point, he was compelled to draw a very different inference from that which had been drawn by an hon. friend of his (Mr. Canning) on a former occasion. It had been asserted, that we had often been involved in wars by continental alliances; but it remained to be proved, that any of the wars in which we had been engaged had arisen from these alliances. The fact was directly the reverse. In no war which we had undertaken since the Revolution, had we engaged in it in consequence of continental alliances. It might perhaps be said, that we entered into the late war in consequence of an engagement with Holland respecting the opening of the Scheldt; but it must be admitted, that that only formed a part of the general question. He therefore thought it important, that we should not suffer ourselves to be carried away by any general cry that might be raised upon the subject, without ascertaining the facts.—But there was another point to consider, and that was a material one. He wished the House to recollect in what wars we had continental connexions, and in what wars we had not, and to compare the result. The only war in which we had been engaged since the Revolution, in which we had not had any continental alliances was the American war, and that was the only war in which we were not successful. It was true, that in other wars we had sometimes failed, as far as they related to continental objects; but as far as British interests were concerned, we had been constantly successful, except only in the case of the American war. With this view of the subject, he was not disposed to renounce the opinion he had formerly entertained upon it; at the same time he was ready to admit, that there ought to be great prudence used in entering into continental alliances, not only with respect to the connexions themselves, but to the engagements we entered into. We ought not to enter into engagements so loose and so generally worded, as might, in the application of them, defeat their own object; and he also thought, that care ought to be taken not to pledge the country too deeply, because circumstances were frequently liable to change. He had no difficulty in saying, that he should not think he should do his duty, if, maintaining the general principle, he should not endeavour to give it effect whenever he was able, according to circumstances, circumscribed by prudence and wisdom. Insinuations had been thrown out, that this country had met with nothing but treachery and breach of faith from our allies, and that assertion had been particularly exemplified in the case of Austria. If we were to look at that country throughout the whole course of the war, there were periods when that power not only displayed the most inflexible fidelity to her engagements, but the most heroic resolution. She did not conclude the treaties of Leoben or Luneville, till the very last extremity; and when she was prevented by the pressure of circumstances from sending a minister for the purpose of obtaining our consent, which consent, if she had asked, we could not for a moment have refused. Before the conclusion of the last treaty, she showed a degree of fidelity to her engagements with us that never was surpassed; for after the battle of Marengo, she was strongly and repeatedly urged by France to conclude a separate treaty, and terms were offered much more favourable than she afterwards obtained. Notwithstanding every effort on the part of France, Austria would not make peace till she was compelled by the fatal battle of Hohenlinden. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) seemed to think that no change which had taken place in the situation of Europe required an increase in our establishment. It could not be denied that the great extent of coast which France had now obtained, and the number of harbours which she had acquired, must make a great difference in our relative situation. It had been said, that the House of Bourbon were actuated by the same motives of ambition with the revolutionary governments of France, and were as much disposed to violate treaties as any government whatever. This was true to a certain extent; and he was as ready as any man to condemn this part of the policy of the House of Bourbon. But it was necessary to consider not only their will, but their power to do mischief. The present government of France had the power of doing things which the House of Bourbon, whatever its disposition might be, had not the means to accomplish. A great deal had been said, about persons looking only at measures and not at men: he confessed he was very much inclined to consider this as mere cant and hypocrisy, or at least as proceeding from ignorance. In one sense, and to a certain degree, they must go together. If any gentleman brought a charge against ministers, it was absurd to suppose that a man could condemn measures, and not wish to remove the men by whom they were adopted. If that House were to agree in a resolution to censure the conduct of ministers, it ought to be followed up with a motion for the removal of those ministers. Nothing could be more absurd than to suppose, that the system of ministers could be disapproved of, and yet that they ought to be kept in office, in hopes that they would adopt a line of conduct contrary to that of which they were known to approve. But this principle had been pushed a little farther, and to an extent to which he could not assent. If a gentleman said he disapproved of the measures of administration, and therefore he would, if possible, remove the ministers, he could understand him; it was fair, constitutional language. The right of that House to address his majesty to remove his ministers, on proper grounds, was incontestable; but to suppose that the House had a right to remove ministers without assigning any public ground whatever, was inconsistent with every principle of the constitution. It would take from the crown the right of choosing its own servants, and make the office of minister the subject of personal canvass. It is true, that in 1784, there was an address to remove ministers, without any charge against their public conduct; but even in that case there was an allegation of their having come improperly into office, though that was found by no means to be the public opinion. He wished merely to be tried by his public conduct; and he could answer for himself, and he believed for his colleagues, that if parliament disapproved of their measures, they would not wish to continue one moment longer in office. If their measures were not found to be consistent with the honour and interests of the country, they would not attempt to set up prerogative against privilege, in any case where the exercise of the latter was really constitutional. If the king had the nomination of his ministers, parliament ought to control them, to watch over them, and to examine their measures, and upon this principal the safety of the constitution depended. He hoped that parliament would always endeavour to preserve to the crown its proper place in the constitution, while they maintained their own privileges; and to the opinion of parliament his majesty's ministers would always submit themselves whenever it was expressed.

Sir Francis Burdett said, he agreed with Mr. Grenville, that when, in answer to the just objections which had been urged to this unprecedented military establishment, ministers stated, that the unprecedented situation of the country called for it, they ought to have brought down some communication from the throne as to the nature of that situation. In reference to the hon. gentleman's arguments on the subject of the balance of power, that hon. gentleman had thought proper to denominate that a new doctrine which was very old indeed, namely, that which had been maintained on a former evening by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce), and in which he most perfectly concurred. It had been mentioned that that hon. gentleman had argued that we should not at all interfere with the affairs of the continent, but confine ourselves entirely to our insular situation. That opinion he believed to be overstated. That hon. gentleman had argued thus—that we should not be forward to provoke continental quarrels; that we should not form such connexions as would be likely to involve us in such quarrels; and that, though policy or interest might urge us to take a share in their disputes, we should never be the first to attack. Such had been the decided opinion of some of our ablest statesmen, by whom it was uniformly held, that if we should have any thing to do in continental contests, it should never be as principals; that we might become rather arbiters if necessary; that if we interfered, it should be for the purpose of throwing weight into the scale, but not to exhaust our strength. For his part, he had no objection to the principle of the balance of power, subject to these modifications, but he had the strongest objections to the use which had been generally made of that principle. It was too generally the apology which ministers had resorted to for going to war. It was the pretence for throwing dust in the eyes of the country, for it appeared to him impossible to make such a war, a war of the people; the object of it could not be made intelligible to their comprehension, as being materially connected with their interests. Much had been said in the course of the debate of the talents of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the late administration. However unpleasant it might be to censure any man in his absence, he must observe, that the whole of the consequences of which the hon. gentleman and his friends were so fond of drawing such gloomy descriptions, arose from the measures of the late ministers, assisted by their active co-operation. This part of their language was not less inconsistent than that of recommending the return of the same man to office who supported the "disastrous" peace they so vehemently reprobated, and they had also the confidence to assert; that this return was desired by the country. Now, if public opinion was to be attended to, he had no hesitation in maintaining that that opinion was decidedly adverse to such a change. From all he could learn, no minister was ever more completely covered with public indignation and hatred, than the right hon. gentleman alluded to.—A vote for 60,000 soldiers would not alarm him so much, if it were not accompanied by barracks and all those other appendages of a standing army; if it formed not a part of that system which, fatally for the interests of the crown itself, tended to break those constitutional springs which kept up the spirit of the people, which would attach them warmly to their government, and render them ready to defend them from any attack. He had heard much of the economy of ministers; but in his judgment they were beginning the work of reform at the wrong end. In looking over the pension-list, and perusing the number of marriage settlements for earls' daughters, and annuities for the wives of treasury clerks, which it contained, it was enough to make the eyes of any plain Englishman ache. If there really was a necessity for this increased establishment, that necessity was among the legacies which the late ministers left the country. They reduced it to such a situation, that according to the confession of their active friends, a state of war would be dangerous, and yet peace is unattended by security. No state of society could be imagined more discouraging, and such was the consequence of the mischievous system so long and so obstinately persisted in by the late ministers! It had been well observed by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce), that without the affections of the people, no establishment could protect the country; no degree of talents could conciliate that affection, or could excite a proper spirit. No. That could only be done by abolishing solitary cells, barracks, and useless pensions—but above all, the people must be adequately represented in parliament. Policy and interest should urge that at the present crisis, which honesty and justice would recommend in any circumstances. To restore our ancient institutions, to replace those old landmarks which the violence of the late ministers removed, was the way to recover that public spirit which is the only sure defence of a country. With regard to the remarks which have been made on measures and men, and the illustration adduced respecting horses and harness, he should say, that if the harness were good, even though the horses were bad, the carriage would be drawn in safety; but if the latter were ever so good and the former bad, the safe movement of the carriage would be endangered. However, it would be much better that both should be good. He should like good men and good measures; and he really did not think either the late or present ministers fit to govern the country. To the present he was not disposed to say any thing harsh, because it was neither provoked nor justified; but he could not help saying, that they did not possess the confidence of the country. Perhaps the colossal power of France, now so much dreaded, might ere long fall to pieces; but, as an Englishman, he did not feel it right to rely on that calculation. Supposing that power solid and secure, he would wish to provide for the protection of this country, and its best protection would consist in strong measures of defence. Those measures, in his judgment, should be, a strong parliament (including a fair representation of the country), strong councils, and above all, a strong and united people.

Mr. I. H. Browne combated the arguments of the hon. baronet, respecting the late and present ministers; and gave it as his decided opinion, that Mr. Pitt had been the means, by his great talents and wise measures, of saving both the constitution and the country from utter ruin; and that but for him the Speaker would not now be sitting in the chair of that House. He defended the present establishment, and said it should have his support; and he felt no check to his confidence in voting such a force, to strengthen the hands of those ministers.

who had formed the treaty of Amiens, and given peace to the country. He did not vote that force for the purpose of recommencing war; for he was sure it was neither their wish nor intention, but for the purpose of maintaining peace, and with it the security and the honour of the country.

Mr. Calcraft said, that upon the fullest conviction of the wisdom and good conduct of his majesty's ministers, as well as that the force voted the preceding night, was necessary to the maintenance of peace, national honour, and national security, he gave that vote his most hearty approbation. He believed the ministers had the universal confidence of the people.

Dr. Laurence condemned the system upon which ministers acted; particularly in reducing the navy so much since the peace, and proposing to keep up a large standing army, though the former force was our natural defence, and the latter was ever an object of constitutional jealousy. He animadverted on the observations of the noble secretary of state, on the subject of continental alliances, and the balance of power, and compared them with his assertion on a former occasion, that the capture of Oczakow, a fortress on the Black Sea, by the Russians, would endanger the safety of Europe. He reprobated the idea of abandoning that policy, with respect to the continent, upon which this country had acted for the last century and a half. He also reproved the practice of perpetually referring to the conduct of ministers during the last war. The House should not be so goaded. If gentlemen wished to investigate that conduct fully, let it be brought forward in a proper form, and solemnly discussed. He was anxious to know what ideas were meant to be attached to national insults and hostile aggression. Ministers did not explain in what sense these terms were to be understood, and it therefore became necessary to attend a little to facts, so far as they might be useful in determining whether, on the part of France, there had been since the conclusion of the treaty of peace, any acts, with regard to foreign powers, which this country would be entitled to make a ground of remonstrance. On this part of his argument he accordingly examined in detail the system of German indemnities, which he reprobated as subversive of the constitution of the Germanic empire, and destructive of our influence on the con-continent. He touched slightly on the conduct of the French government towards Switzerland, and the total subjugation of Italy to its will. On the subject of Holland, he descanted with great energy, and pointed out the alarming consequences which French influence in that country presented in the event of a renewal of war. On the importance of our connexion with Holland, he believed there was no difference of opinion. He described with great force the claims which the House of Orange had to our protection, from ancient connexion cemented by common friendship; and the more he considered the fate of this illustrious family, the more was he convinced of the inefficacy of the article in the definitive treaty, which professed to guarantee them a full and complete indemnity. He called the attention of the House to the treatment which captain D'Auvergne had experienced in Paris, in consequence of orders issued by the French government. What he meant to state he did not pretend to state on authority. That respectable officer, even under the protection of a British commission and a regular passport, had been arrested, thrown into a dungeon, and subjected to interrogatories of the most insulting kind. Could any thing be reckoned an attack on our national honour, if such an outrage did not come under that description? He took occasion to allude to a prosecution instituted against M. Peltier, for a supposed libel on the French government. He did not mean to give any opinion against the propriety of such a prosecution, but was pointed on articles which had appeared in the French official journal, containing unbecoming allusions, and indecent reflexions, on the character of our own sovereign.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, it seemed to be urged constantly, as the systematic opinion of the learned member and his friends, that ministers, by the measures they adopted, had compromised the dignity, and tarnished the honour of the empire; without, however, substantiating their accusations by any specific charge. But if they really conceived themselves founded in their assertion, the manly way would be, to bring it forward, and give those whom they accused an opportunity of vindication. The charge of abandoning the indemnity to the prince of Orange was wholly unfounded. Before the approaching recess, he hoped to make such a communication to the House as would manifest that his majesty's feelings were by no means dormant to the situation of the illustrious personage alluded to. The next point he thought necessary to notice was, the prosecution commenced against the publisher of a libel upon the chief consul of France. But though the British government certainly were not responsible for the publication which contained that libel, he conceived the first consul was entitled, by the justice of the country, to reparation, as well as every other person in such a case. The next point was the affair of captain D'Auvergne. The moment his situation was made known to his majesty's minister at Paris, a demand was made to the French government for his release, which was instantly obtained; so that the apprehensions of the learned member for the honour and dignity of this country, on this as well as the other occasions, were utterly unfounded. Another topic with the learned member was, the aggrandizing power of France. No man lamented it more than he did; but he could not allow that it was a matter that would warrant the revival of hostilities. The next objection of the learned member was, that ministers called for a large force, without stating any specific necessity; at the same time that his own speech and those of his friends, were fraught with alarm for our situation, and the avowal of that necessity. If the learned member was not disposed to confide in the assurances which ministers were warranted to give, the right way of proceeding would be, to move an address to his majesty, for the documents to show that necessity. The hon. member might do so now; and when produced, they would furnish a justification of the measures adopted by ministers.

Mr. Fox alluded to the representation given by Dr. Laurence, of the treatment which had been experienced by a British officer from the French government. Allowing that a remonstrance had been made on the subject by ministers without obtaining satisfaction, he had no hesitation in saying, agreeably to the ideas of national honour which he had often had occasion to express, that he should reckon this an insult of such magnitude as to form a legitimate ground of renewing hostilities. If captain D'Auvergne had been arrested without the smallest pretext, thrown into a dungeon, and subjected to insulting interrogatories; or if the French government had refused to give satisfaction to the honour of the country, wounded in the person of a British officer, this would, in his opinion, be a ten thousand times more justifiable ground of war than any thing drawn from the conduct of France in the system of German indemnities, in the invasion of Switzerland, or any other act of usurpation on the continent. Strongly disposed as he was for the preservation of peace, he declared, without difficulty, that war was an alternative ever to be preferred to insult and infamy. After a few observations on the influence which the state of our finances ought to have in deterring us from hastily plunging again into war, the hon. gentleman vindicated the system he had recommended with regard to continental connexions. Continental connexions were not to be estimated according to a general system. They were to be judged of by a consideration of the circumstances in which the country was placed. He was a friend to continental connexions when they could be advantageous; and at the commencement of the late war he had resisted our entering into them, because the manner in which they were formed was such as to promote nothing but disappointment and disaster. His opinion now was, that the war had left the continent in that state, that if we had an opportunity of forming an alliance with Austria, and even Russia, he should not think such an alliance justified by policy. Gentlemen might ask, were we never again to form any continental alliances? His answer was, that this must depend on circumstances which might hereafter appear in the situation of Europe. He would not say that such alliances might not be hereafter renewed with advantage; but this was not the moment for such a renewal. Adverting merely to the interests of Austria, he could not conceive it to be either fair or friendly in this country, to seek the renewal of any alliance with that power, when such an alliance might only have the effect of exposing her to attacks from France, which she was unable to resist. No man was more anxious than himself to keep up a high spirit in the country; but the time for exerting that spirit was to be regulated by circumstances. What might be very wise and political under certain circumstances, might under circumstances of a different nature, be ruinous to our best interests, and he thought that to embark in foreign connexions at this time, would be to expose ourselves to such consequences. If the House and the country had acquiesced in the peace, and the unsatisfactory state of the continent on which the peace was concluded, the same acquiescence was demanded on every principle of policy and common sense. The learned gentleman had been offended at charges produced against the late administration, and had called on an hon. baronet to come forward and produce the proof on a regular inquiry. He was really astonished to hear gentlemen making use of such language. Had he and those with whom he had the honour of acting been slack in demanding inquiry into the conduct of the late ministers? Had they not from year to year proposed inquiry, and had not the friends of ministers as generally resisted all investigation? With much more justice might this charge be retorted on the learned gentleman and his friends of the new opposition. They were indeed liable to a charge of inconsistency, which they would not find it so easy to repel. Supporting every public measure, they still were dissatisfied with ministers. They were perpetually accusing them of imbecility, and yet never had they the manliness to prefer against them a specific charge. He was very pointed on the subject of the German indemnities, which he condemned as a system of the most gross violation of all honesty and justice, and adduced this as an additional reason why, for the present at least, German alliances should be avoided. He should rejoice in any plan to reduce French influence on the continent, but of this there was at present no rational prospect. With regard to Holland, there was nothing he so much lamented as the acquisition of influence which France had gained in that country, connected as it was with Belgium; but he saw no use in constantly complaining on this subject, unless some means could be pointed out of redressing the grievance.

Mr. Windham said, that the speech of his learned friend had been complained of as long. Long it might be by the clock; but certainly not by the matter it contained. With regard to the affair of the prince of Orange, his learned friend had been called to that subject by what an hon. gentleman had stated respecting foreign powers. That was a very erroneous opinion; and it was proper that his learned friend should refute the charge against Austria and other states. By our honesty, "of which the hon. gentleman had said so much, was, perhaps, meant this, that foreign powers should be bound to us, but not we to them. If this country had been in such danger as Austria was previous to the treaty of Luneville, he believed those who held this language would have been the first to cry out that we ought to take care of ourselves, and think no more of our allies. The business with regard to the prince of Orange was a gross fraud upon this country. It might be guessed, from what the right hon. gentleman had stated, that this indemnity was to be made up by hard English guineas. What, then, became of our point of honour? Capt. D'Auvergne's case was another point which he thought might convince the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox), that the honour of the country was not perfectly safe. It was said, that ministers practised at once conciliation and firmness. This brought to his recollection the story of a man, reputed religious, who having committed a dishonourable transaction, excused himself by saying to a bishop, "my lord, it was only a pious fraud." The bishop, however, answered, that he could distinguish the fraud, but not the piety; so he, with respect to ministers, could easily see the conciliation, but could not discover an atom of the firmness. He agreed perfectly that there was no retreat for this country in meanness. It was with us, aut Cæsar, aut nullus. We must be a great nation or nothing? He wished to know where the point of honour so much talked of was to be found. It did not exist in the case of the prince of Orange, or of captain D'Auvergne, where did it exist? This shifting of the point of honour reminded him of what was said to happen to travellers in a part of Essex, who, when they asked for a district remarkable for being visited by fevers and agues, were always told by the inhabitants, that the place was not just where they were, but a little farther on. He had often been accused of entertaining high chivalresque notions with respect to the relations of this country and France. He, however, disclaimed all such ideas. He grounded the whole of his arguments upon the plain vulgar prosaic ground of safety. His opinion was, that the places to be given by the treaty ought to be retained; but certainly not, unless there were just pretexts for doing so.

Lord Castlereagh thought that Mr. Fox under-rated the danger in which this country was placed and that Mr. Windham over-rated it. The powers of the present French government being greater than any former, to call forth the resources and population of the country, was one reason for an increased establishment in this country. It ought not at the same time to be forgotten that there were too many appearances of a disposition in the French government to interfere with other nations. One hon. gentleman thought that our military establishment might be lower, since our navy was so much superior to that of the rest of Europe. Much as he rejoiced in the superiority of our navy, he did not think that was a mode of defence on which the country ought entirely to rely. To show that an invasion might take place notwithstanding the superiority of our navy, he instanced the arrival of the French expedition in Bantry Bay, when the landing was prevented only by a storm. He blamed the practice of running down continental alliances. He did not think that any of the acts of the French government since the treaty of Amiens formed a ground of war. He saw much in the state of France and Europe which he deeply regretted; but should we not make things worse if we interfered? He was aware of the commercial and maritime faculties of France. But we had got a start of her, which it would be impossible for her to overtake, if we were true to ourselves.

The report was agreed to.

Debate on the Budget.] Dec. 10. The House having resolved itself into a committee of Ways and Means,

Mr. Chancellor Addington then rose, and began by observing, that before he entered upon the subjects to which his notice referred, he was desirous of submitting to the committee the grounds on which he was induced to bring them forward so early in the session. It would appear from the notice, that it was his intention to propose a vote of 4,000,000*l.* on the credit of the growing produce of the consolidated fund; and also to take a general view of the financial situation of the country, as far as it could be explained with any degree of accuracy at the present period of the year.

The immediate occasion of the motion which he had to propose was to be found in the extraordinary produce of the revenue during the last half year. It would be recollected, that 4,500,000*l.* had been voted on the credit of the consolidated fund for one year, to the 5th of April 1803. Of that sum no less than 3,800,000*l.* had been realized on the 10th of October last; and there was little doubt that, at the end of the current quarter, viz. on the 5th of January, the surplus of the consolidated fund would exceed the 700,000*l.* necessary to complete the whole sum. The committee, therefore, would be aware, that, unless a power were given to his majesty to apply to the public service such further surplus as might accrue, a considerable sum might remain dead and useless in the exchequer, whilst money must be raised by other means to defray the necessary expenses.

The reason for the second part of the notice was, the intimate and inseparable connexion between the state of the consolidated fund and the general financial situation of the country; and as the House had already voted a large part of the supplies for the ensuing year, it could not but be material that the public should be apprized of the means by which those supplies were to be raised.

Mr. Addington then proceeded to advert to the financial operations of the year 1802. The committee would recollect, that, in the last session of the late parliament, a capital of 97,000,000*l.* had been provided for; of which, 56,500,000*l.* was the amount of the sum, for the redemption of which the income tax had been made responsible; about 11,000,000*l.* arose from the funding of exchequer bills, and the remaining 30,000,000*l.* from the loan of the present year.

For this sum, the charge to be provided somewhat exceeded 3,100,000*l.* It would not be forgotten that a hope had been expressed on his part, that the produce of the taxes intended to cover the amount of this charge would prove considerably more than adequate to that object; and he had peculiar satisfaction in stating, that the hope so expressed had been realized. A complaint had, at the time, been made, of his having proposed taxes, the produce of which would greatly exceed what was requisite to defray the charge of the debt to be provided for. To this accusation he had pleaded guilty, and had admitted his expectation to be, that their produce would not fall short of 4,000,000*l.* How did the matter stand?

In the first quarter, the taxes on malt, beer, on exports and imports, and on the tonnage of shipping, actually yielded 926,000*l*. To this might be added the additional assessed taxes, of which scarcely any part had yet been received, and which were estimated at 1,000,000*l*. per annum. With the addition therefore of one-fourth of this sum to that which had been realized, it would appear that the produce of the taxes of 1802, in the quarter ending the 10th of October in that year, might be fairly estimated at 1,170,000*l*.

Mr. Addington then said, that it would be remembered he had stated on a former day, that one effect of the ample provision made in the last session had been, that it had afforded the means of accomplishing a considerable reduction of the outstanding unfunded debt, of which no less than 18,000,000*l*. had been taken out of the market.

The unfunded debt, in exchequer bills and navy debt, which, in November 1801, amounted to upwards of 37,300,000*l*. had been reduced to about 19,500,000*l*.; of which 3,000,000*l*. which had been advanced by the Bank as a consideration for the renewal of their charter, bore no interest, and was not payable till the year 1806; and 900,000*l*. was charged on the annual taxes of the present year, the arrears of which would be sufficient for the liquidation of that sum. Deducting therefore 3,900,000*l*. which never came into the market, and 4,500,000*l*. of navy debt, the remaining exchequer bills scarcely exceeded 11,000,000*l*. and of these parliament, since its meeting, had provided for the discharge of 4,281,000*l*.; and it would appear by the accounts laid before the House, that the outstanding exchequer bills, previous to the commencement of the war, amounted to 9,500,000*l*.

It also afforded him the greatest satisfaction to be enabled to state, that with the exception only of the army extraordinaries, the grants of the last session had been found sufficient to provide for all the services of the year. Gentlemen, he was sure, would recollect, that he had formerly expressed his apprehensions that the sum of 1,600,000*l*. which had been voted for army extraordinaries, would prove inadequate to the demand. Every one must be aware of the impossibility at all times of making a correct estimate for that branch of the public service; and in the present instance an unavoidable increase of expense had been occasioned by the detention of our troops on foreign stations longer than there had been reason to expect. He could not but feel concern in estimating the excess in that particular branch of the expenditure at upwards of one million; but he had the consolation of being able to state, that the total expenses of the extraordinaries of the army in 1802 would not be found to exceed one-half of their amount in the preceding year. It was also satisfactory to reflect, that the economical management of the naval service had effected a reduction of no less than 4,500,000*l*. of the navy debt, which had been discharged out of the votes of the year.

He next proceeded to lay before the committee a statement of the supplies and Ways and Means for the ensuing year. For the navy there had been voted 50,000 seamen, at 7*l*. per man per month, the expense of which would amount to 4,550,000*l*.

By the estimates on the table it would appear, that the remaining naval services, for which votes would shortly be proposed to parliament, amounted, under the head of Ordinary and Extraordinary, to 1,218,238*l.* and for building and repairing ships of war, to 901,140*l.*; making a total expense, for this great branch of our national defence, of 6,669,378*l.*

For the army there had been voted about 5,500,000*l.* and when the amount of the extraordinaries was laid before parliament, which could not take place till the end of the year, a farther vote would be proposed for repaying the excess which had arisen under that head, and for providing an estimated sum for the service of the ensuing year. These sums, as nearly as he now could judge, would amount to 2,000,000*l.*, making a total of military expense of 7,500,000*l.*

For the ordnance there had been voted 787,947*l.*

For the repayment to the consolidated fund for bounties on the importation of corn, advanced out of the revenue of customs, 524,573*l.*

Of the miscellaneous services for the united kingdom, he could not at present form an accurate statement; but judging from the expenditure of former years, he thought they might probably amount to about 1,000,000*l.*; to which were to be added the permanent grants for the civil government of Ireland, amounting to 363,339*l.*

The total of these various sums, amounting to 16,845,237*l.* formed the joint charge to be provided for by the different parts of the united kingdom, in the proportions settled by the act of union.

The proportion of Ireland, being two-seventeenths, would be 1,981,792*l.* and that part of the united kingdom was likewise bound to contribute two-seventeenths of the expense of the civil list of Great Britain, and of the other charges on the consolidated fund, not connected with the public debt, amounting to 141,223*l.*

He should now proceed to state the separate charges to be provided for by Great Britain, omitting those of Ireland, which would, on a future occasion, be stated by his right hon. friend, the chancellor of the exchequer for Ireland.

The first sum arose from a vote, which had lately been agreed to by the House, to pay off exchequer bills charged upon the aids of 1801, amounting to 2,781,000*l.*

The next to be considered was, a sum, of which an account was on the table, and for which a vote would shortly be proposed, being the remainder of an advance of 3,000,000*l.* made by the Bank in the year 1798, upon the credit of exchequer bills, and which had been annually renewed till the present year, when one-half of them had been paid off. The remaining sum amounted to 1,500,000*l.*

A farther charge arose from an account subsisting between government and the East India company, for military expenses incurred in different expeditions. As the accounts of the armament which had been sent from India to Egypt were not yet brought home, no precise estimate could at present be formed of the balance. But it appeared probable, from an investigation which had already taken place, that a considerable sum would be due to the East India company, and he should for the present make provision for a payment on account, of 1,000,000*l*.

There were other separate charges, the amount of which could not at present be ascertained with complete accuracy; they arose from interest on exchequer bills, discounts on the loan and lottery, and certain other payments which, in the account annually laid before parliament, of the distribution of the money granted for public service, were classed under the title of payments, not being part of the supplies of the year. He should estimate them at 700,000*l*. and he had no reason to think they would exceed that amount. The total of these separate charges was 5,981,000*l*.; which, added to the total of the joint charge before stated, at 16,845,237*l*. amounted to the sum of 22,826,237*l*. From this sum deducting 2,123,015*l*. to be contributed by Ireland, it would appear that the expense to be provided for by Great Britain was 20,703,222*l*.

To meet this supply Mr. Addington said he should propose the following Ways and Means: The annual malt tax, and the other taxes usually granted from year to year in the room of the land tax had already been voted by this House. Their amount had been taken at 2,750,000*l*. and there was no probability of a deficiency arising upon these annual grants, as had formerly been the case, the land tax having usually fallen short of its nominal amount, while the taxes substituted for it have constantly produced the estimated sum.

The next head to which he should proceed, was the surplus of the consolidated fund, which he should estimate at 6,500,000*l*. His reasons for expecting a produce to that amount, and for the difference between that sum and 4,000,000*l*. for which a vote would be proposed to the committee, he begged leave to defer to another part of his statement.

The produce of the lottery for the ensuing year he should estimate at 500,000*l*.; and without entering at present into any detail on that part of the subject, it would be a satisfaction to the committee to know that the new system which had been introduced into the drawing and regulations of the lottery, had been productive of the most beneficial effects.

The only remaining article he had to state, was an issue of exchequer bills on the aids of 1804, to the extent of 11,000,000*l*. Gentlemen might be surprised at his mentioning so large a sum, and it might be necessary for him to explain the grounds of this proposition, and the mode by which it was intended to carry it into effect. He had already observed, that the exchequer bills now in circulation amounted to about 11,000,000*l*. only exclusive of those which were held by the Bank and bore no interest; and that the amount of those outstanding, previous to the war, was about 9,500,000*l*. The increase of our trade, and the enlarged sphere of our money transactions since that period, made that additional sum no more than was commensurate with, perhaps necessary for, the convenience of our pecuniary dealings, and our commerce. Of this there were abundant proofs in the premium which exchequer bills now bore, notwithstanding the reduction of their interest; in the unwillingness of the holders to pay them into the exchequer in discharge of taxes; and in the applications made for fresh bills in place of such as were advertised to be paid off.—Assuming, therefore, that the quantity of exchequer bills now in the market was not greater than public convenience required, he should proceed to show that it was not his intention to make any considerable addition to it, but that, at the end of the year, they would not be more than equal to their present amount.

The exchequer bills now outstanding including the sum advanced by the Bank amounted to 14,180,000*l*. of which it was proposed to vote the re-payment of 4,281,000*l*. This sum would be replaced by the gradual issue of the 5,000,000*l*. which have lately been voted on the aids of 1803; and when, by the addition of further sums which parliament might vote after the recess, such a number of exchequer bills should have been issued as to admit of the measure, without too great a reduction of their amount, it was his intention to propose that a part of them, to the extent of from 6 to 8,000,000*l*. should be funded. This, however, would not take place till a late period of the session; and it was the only financial operation which he had at present in contemplation. The committee would understand, that if at the time it should be found impracticable to make a bargain with the holders of the bills proposed to be funded, on terms sufficiently favourable to the public, it would be necessary to propose a loan to the same extent, for the purpose of paying them off. He should not now trouble the committee with any statement of the means which had occurred to him for defraying the additional charge which would thus be created; but he had a confident hope, that he should, at the proper time, be able to propose such as would be sufficient for the purpose, without any material addition to the burdens of the public. Supposing, therefore, 7,000,000*l.* of exchequer bills to be either funded or paid off, and adding that sum to 4,281,000*l.* for which parliament had already provided, it would appear, by deducting that aggregate sum from 14,180,000*l.* the amount of exchequer bills now outstanding added to the 11,000,000*l.* proposed to be issued, that the exchequer bills at the close of the year 1803, would be reduced to near 300,000*l.* below their present amount. In this statement he had supposed the 5,000,000*l.* lately voted, although charged on the aids of 1803, to form part of the 11,000,000*l.* intended for the service of the ensuing year, because such part of that sum as might be paid off, would be replaced by other bills; and so many as might remain in circulation would be considered as constituting part of that sum. Upon a recapitulation of the Ways and Means, they would be found to amount to 20,750,000*l.* exceeding by 47,000*l.* the amount of the supply.

Mr. Addington then stated it to be important to take a review of the services of the ensuing year, distinguishing such as were of a permanent nature from such as were merely occasional and temporary. It was only by such a review that it would be possible for the committee to form a judgment how far the ordinary resources of the country were capable of meeting its permanent expenditure.

Amongst the permanent services, he included the navy and army, except such a part of the supply as might be necessary for defraying the excess of the extraordinaries for the present year, which which was to be considered, not as a part of the services for the year 1803, but as the repayment of a debt contracted in 1802. To these were to be added the ordnance, the miscellaneous services of Great Britain and Ireland, and the interest on such exchequer bills as might be usually kept in circulation. In speaking of these services as permanent, he by no means meant to infer, that they were likely to continue at their present amount, but merely that they were heads of expenditure which might always be expected to exist, although varying in their extent according to the circumstances of the times. The total of these charges in the ensuing year would be about 16,000,000*l.* of which the British proportion would somewhat exceed 14,000,000*l.*

In the class of occasional payments, he should place the corn bounties, the repayment of the excess of army extraordinaries of 1802, the payment of the exchequer bills charged upon the aids of 1801, and of the loan from the Bank in 1798, and the discharge of the balance which might be found to be due to the East India company. The total amount of these several sums he estimated at 6,800,000*l.*

With respect to the permanent expenses, he was deeply impressed with the conviction, which he trusted was no less strongly felt by the House, and by the country, that whatever might be the permanent expenditure, which a due regard to the support of public credit, and to our actual situation, might require, we ought resolutely to determine that the amount of our permanent revenue should be made to correspond with its demands. Even if, instead of the prospect of an increasing revenue, he had been obliged to lay before the committee the statement of a deficiency, his opinion on this subject would be the same. We must not attempt to compromise by endeavouring to reduce our expenditure to our revenue, but resolve to keep our revenue on a level with our necessary expenditure. In such a system alone could he see solid wisdom, or discern the probability of future honour and security.

He next called the recollection of the committee to the difference which appeared between the vote which it was his intention to propose to them on the credit of the consolidated fund, namely 4,000,000*l.* and the sum of 6,500,000*l.* which in his statement of the ways and means he had estimated as the surplus in the ensuing year. He had proposed a vote so moderate, because it would answer the immediate purpose of enabling him to apply to the public service the sums which might be realised as the surplus of the consolidated fund in the two next quarters, and would afford the means of ascertaining by actual experience, whether the expectations, which he thought himself fully justified in entertaining of its produce during the remainder of the year, were likely to be accomplished. By so cautious a proceeding, the public service would be guarded against the effects of any possible disappointment. He would, however, shortly state to the committee the grounds of the confidence which he was disposed to entertain: it was founded on the actual produce of the three last quarters, ending the 10th of October last. The amount of the surplus of the consolidated fund in that period was 5,508,067*l*. To this was to be added the bounties paid on the importation of corn within that interval, and not yet repaid by parliament, being 431,729*l*.; and the sum which might have been expected from the produce of the taxes of the present year, which were not in collection during the two first of those quarters, these might be taken at 2,000,000*l*. and the total would be 7,939,796*l*. From this was to be deducted the sums which had been paid into the consolidated fund during the same period on account of the income tax, and which amounted to 2,054,893*l*. Allowing for this deduction, the total produce of the three quarters would be 5,884,903*l*. If the ensuing year proved equally productive, the total of the surplus in four quarters would be no less than 7,845,000*l*. And it was satisfactory to observe, that this sum greatly exceeded the produce of the most favourable year on record, as the largest amount ever known of the surplus of the consolidated fund, which was in the year ending 5th Jan. 1792, a period of increasing wealth and acknowledged prosperity, was no more than 4,300,000*l*. Yet though he saw no reason to apprehend a diminution of any part of the revenue, he would not reckon upon a sum so large as might have been inferred from the experience of the three last quarters, and he had therefore limited his expectations to 6,500,000*l*.

Inferences no less favourable might be drawn from the produce of the permanent taxes in the year ending the 10th of October. It would appear from the account referred to the committee, that the nett produce of the old permanent taxes in that period was 13,853,724*l*. To this should be added the payments for corn bounties, amounting to 1,630,000*l*. This made a total of 15,483,724*l*. Comparing this sum with the produce of the same taxes in the year 1792, the most productive year previous to the war, and with the year 1799, the most productive year ever known, it will appear to exceed the amount in the former year by about a million, and to fall short of it in the latter by about 250,000*l*.; but it must be recollected, that for one quarter of the last year the distilleries were stopped, in consequence of which a very material branch of the revenue was considerably reduced; and as the distilleries were chiefly carried on during the interval between the months of September and April, the loss in the quarter, which ended on the 5th January, was nearly equal to the loss of half a year's produce. To the sum just mentioned of 15,483,724*l*. was to be added the produce of the taxes imposed since the commencement of the war, which in the same period was 11,345,364*l*. making a total of permanent taxes of 26,829,088*l*.

These statements, with reference to the last year, would be admitted to be satisfactory. Our future prospects were no less so. It would be found, by a reference to the accounts which from time to time had been laid before the House, that a progressive increase had for several years past taken place in the produce of the permanent taxes; not that every year had exhibited proofs of increase, as, indeed, the course of the seasons, and many other accidental circumstances must necessarily occasion frequent fluctuations; but if periods of three, four, or five years were compared, the average of the latter would be constantly found to exceed that of the preceding period. Considering how much the produce of the revenue was connected with the prosperity and comforts of the people, as evinced by their consumption of the articles on which it was levied, this continual increase was an undeniable proof of the growing wealth and resources of the country. But there were other indications not less satisfactory and decisive of its increasing prosperity—he meant those which were to be found in the accounts of our commerce and navigation.

It was not possible till the conclusion of the year, when all these accounts were made up, that they could be laid regularly before the House, or stated with exactness. Great pains had, however, been taken to procure the most accurate and complete information which the period of the year admitted, and he thought himself justified, by what had been obtained, in pronouncing the commerce of the country to be in a state of unrivalled and unexampled prosperity. It appeared that the real value of the principal articles of British produce and manufactures exported during the year ending 10th of October 1802, was 27,900,000*l.*, while, in the preceding year, it was something less than 24,500,000*l.* Supposing these articles to bear the same proportion to the whole of our exports which they had done in former years, the total value of British manufactures exported in the year 1802 would not fall short of 50,000,000*l.* sterling, being an increase of 8,000,000*l.* above the year preceding; and, compared with any former year, the increase would be still more extraordinary.

The accounts of shipping were more imperfect than those of trade, as no quarterly account was made up, except in the port of London; but so far as the fact could be ascertained, it was no less satisfactory, especially with regard to the important circumstance of the increase of British shipping and seamen.

In the year ending the 10th of October 1801, 1,762 British ships, measuring 418,631 tons, and manned with 23,096 men, had entered that port, and 1,331 ships, measuring 350,634 tons, and carrying 24,070 men, had cleared outwards. In the year 1802, the British ships which entered inwards were 2,459, the tonnage 574,700, the men 33,743. The British ships which cleared outwards were 1,933, the tonnage 419,067, the men 28,112.—The diminution of foreign shipping was not less remarkable than the increase of British. In 1801, the number of foreign ships which entered inwards was 3,385, their tonnage 452,677, their men 20,388. The foreign ships which cleared outwards were 3,381, their tonnage 445,651, the men 23,302. In the year 1802, the number of foreign ships entering inwards was reduced to 1,549, their tonnage 214,117, the men 10,555. The foreign ships which cleared outwards were 1,868, their tonnage 262,006, the men 14,826.—These details he feared might be tedious; but he was persuaded the committee would excuse him for having entered with minuteness into the proofs of the increase of our commerce and maritime strength, which were the great sources of our prosperity, and of our power.

Mr. Addington then said, that he was aware it would be useless for him to take up the time of the committee by any comments on these statements, or to attempt to strengthen the impression, which he trusted had been made by the plain and incontrovertible facts which he had laid before them. He might, however, be permitted to express some satisfaction in looking back to the period to which this statement applied, and to the circumstances which had, as it now appeared, justified the hopes he had held out in the last session of parliament. It would be recollected, that strong apprehensions were then expressed, that the conclusion of peace would be followed by a diminution of our commerce, and consequently of our revenue. The event had happily proved that such apprehensions were ill founded. He added, that whilst every individual in the united kingdom, capable of feeling for the welfare of his country, must rejoice at these unquestionable indications of our commercial prosperity, there was perhaps no country in Europe which might not justly participate in that feeling, as being interested in our commerce, and partaking of its benefits. What was gained by Great Britain, was very far from being lost by the continent. So far from the pre-eminence of Great Britain in this respect having proved injurious to other countries, it had not only enabled her to stand forward as the protectress of civilized Europe, but of the trade and commerce of the rest of the world. In the known and established policy of this country—in our resources—in our maritime strength, the greater part of Europe had, for more than a century past, found its best security. And he would affirm, that whatever might have been our views, whatever our principles, whatever our motives, in some of the contests in which we had been engaged, the general tendency of our connexions with the continent had been to preserve the due relation between the foreign powers, and to maintain their rights and their independence. Such had been the effect of our operations on the continent: such had been the consequence of our exertions on the ocean. He could not look forward to the renewal or improvement of the commerce of other countries with any apprehension of inconvenience or danger from their rivalry. It had been well said by a noble friend of his (lord Castlereagh) in a preceding debate, that we had the start of them all; and he could not entertain a doubt but that the combined operation of pre-eminent skill, credit, capital, and industry, would preserve to us the superiority which we now possessed.

Mr. Addington then adverted to the state of the sinking fund, which he considered as one of the most powerful instruments by which the country had been enabled to cope with and surmount its greatest difficulties. When that wise and salutary system was first adopted, the sum applied to the reduction of the national debt was about one-tenth of its interest, which then amounted to near 10,000,000*l.* Such, however, had been the happy operation of that system, that, at the present moment, when the amount of the interest is 18,000,000*l.* the sum applicable to the reduction of the debt is 6,000,000*l.* which, instead of one-tenth, is equal to one-third of the interest of the existing debt. The sum of 6,000,000*l.* was thus annually thrown into circulation, and was daily operating towards the improvement of our agriculture, the encouragement of our manufactures, and the extension of our commerce. The effects of this system were thus diffused in numberless channels through the whole body of the country, improving its resources, invigorating its strength, and gradually enlarging its means of prosperity.

Having stated circumstances so highly favourable to the revenue, the commerce, and the future prospects of Great Britain, Mr. Addington said, that it was impossible for him to refrain from troubling the committee with a few words on a subject of no less interest and importance, and which could not fail to afford the utmost satisfaction to every gentleman who heard him—he alluded to the rapid increase in the prosperity of Ireland. In considering the sources of this happy change, he could not hesitate to declare his decided conviction, that its primary cause was to be found in the important measure of the incorporation of the two kingdoms. Of this he thought there was abundant and substantial proof, though other collateral circumstances might probably have contributed to produce it. He had the satisfaction of being enabled to state, that in August last the revenue of Ireland had been found to exceed that of the corresponding period in the former year by the sum of 920,000*l.* He was not enabled to inform the committee what was the excess at the present moment, the accounts not having been made up; but from what he had mentioned, it was evident that the improvement in the revenue of Ireland had been even greater in proportion than that of Great Britain.

He then observed, in answer to some apprehensions which had been expressed in a late debate, that our finances might not prove equal to a permanent establishment so large as the present; that it was to be recollected, this was only the establishment of 1803, which it was not probable would increase, but might possibly admit of no inconsiderable diminution. He had not stated that our revenues (augmented as they had lately been) were equal to the support of all the establishments on such a scale as that of the ensuing year; but he had said that, with strict economy, a military establishment far greater than had ever been known in time of peace, and not very much inferior to the present, might be maintained by the revenue of the country, supposing its future produce to be in proportion to that of the three last quarters. To illustrate this statement, he would assume that a reduction to the extent of 1,000,000*l.* might, at a future time, be made in our military expenses. Deducing this sum from the army estimates of the present year, and allowing 500,000*l.* for extraordinaries, the expense of our military service would amount to 5,200,000*l.* For the naval service in its different branches he should allow 4,230,000*l.*, a sum capable of maintaining a force nearly double of that which had been kept up in any former peace. For the ordnance he should allow 800,000*l.*, which rather exceeded the sum voted this year; and for the miscellaneous services of the united kingdom, including the Irish permanent grants, 1,300,000*l.* The total amount of the joint contribution would in that case be 11,530,000*l.* Adding 500,000*l.* for the separate charges of Great Britain to the British proportion of the above sum, the total to be provided by Great Britain would be 10,533,000*l.* To meet this expense we might reckon on the following ways and means:

The usual annual taxes amounted to 2,750,000*l.* The surplus of the consolidated fund, estimated according to its produce in the three last quarters, 7,845,000*l.*; and the lottery 500,000*l.* The total of these sums was 11,095,000*l.* exceeding the supplies he had stated by upwards of 500,000*l.* To this might be added the contribution from India of 500,000*l.* a year; for he was convinced that his right hon. friend who lately presided in the Indian department, was fully justified in the confidence he had expressed in the solidity and progressive improvement of the resources of the East India company. He added, that this opinion was not hastily formed, for that he had recently thought it his duty to investigate the grounds upon which it was founded with all the minuteness and attention in his power.

Mr. Addington said, that he doubted not the committee would participate in the satisfaction with which he contemplated the result of the facts he had thus laid before them. But however sanguine might be our hopes, however well-founded our expectations, we ought not to give way to feelings of disappointment if they should not hereafter be realized to their full extent. Our minds should be made up to the result, whatever it might be. Should greater expenses prove necessary, the means of providing for them must be found. Should unforeseen difficulties present themselves, they must, and he had no doubt they would, be met with the firmness and spirit which they called for, and by which alone they could be surmounted. No one would deny that a frequent recourse to loans in time of peace would be injurious to the interests of the country. The estimate of our permanent peace establishment could not as yet be ascertained with precision; but he could not too often repeat, that at all events our revenue must be made to meet the demands of our expenditure.

Mr. Addington, after apologizing for having detained the committee with statements so much in detail, which, however, on such a subject, appeared almost unavoidable, requested their attention for a short time longer. The statement which he had made had chiefly been confined to matters of fact, and had required little illustration. He had hazarded no conjectures, except on grounds which appeared to him to be solid and substantial; and he was unwilling to trespass farther on the indulgence of the House, by entering into a detail of the causes which he conceived to have led to our present prosperous and flourishing condition: he should only say, in general, that much of it was to be ascribed to the eminent talents which had lately presided over the finances of the country;—much to the wisdom and fortitude of parliament;—much to the good sense and energy of the people. For himself he claimed no merit but that of having adopted the system, and of having endeavoured to follow the example which was before him. But he would venture to appeal even to those who had indicated no little asperity in commenting on his general conduct, whether he was justly chargeable with having shrunk from the financial difficulties of the country. It seemed to be admitted on a former night, that, during the continuance of the war, it could not be imputed to his majesty's present servants that they had neglected to prosecute it with energy and vigour.

Mr. Addington then adverted generally to the situation and prospects of the country, which appeared to him to afford abundant ground of satisfaction and hope; and concluded with moving, "That towards raising the supplies there be granted a sum of 4,000,000*l.* out of the growing produce of the consolidated fund."

The motion was agreed to.

Debate in the Lords on the Malt Duty Bill.] Dec. 13. On the motion, that this bill be read a first time,

Earl Spencer reminded the House, that this was the first bill of supply which had been offered to their lordships' consideration, in this first parliament which had been called since the Union; he therefore thought they should hesitate in letting it pass a single stage, before they had received more information as to the state of the country. It had been customary at every former period, to lay more precise information before parliament, of the state of the country with respect to its foreign relations, than had been done at the opening of the present session. He thought it strange, that those ministers who made the peace, and had given such strong assurances of its continuance, should now demand such a large establishment, without assigning sufficient reasons. He had heard it whispered, that it was partly through fear of offending France, that the usual communications had not been made to parliament; if this were true, and ministers had allowed themselves to be influenced by such unworthy considerations, they did not deserve to retain their situations a single hour. It had been, however, supposed that they were governed by that principle, both in the affair of Napper Tandy, and of count D'Auvergne.

Lord Pelham said, that in the latter instance, the French government had released count D'Auvergne as soon as application had been made for that purpose by the British minister, and the conduct of government with respect to Napper Tandy, was occasioned by circumstances very different from a fear of offending France.

The Earl of Carlisle supported the opinion which had been given by earl Spencer.

The Duke of Norfolk differed from both the noble earls. He thought the circumstances of the times were notorious enough, to justify ministers in proposing an increased establishment.

Lord Limerick justified the conduct of ministers. He thought peace had been necessary for the recovery of our strength, and he hoped before war was renewed, the disturbances which had existed in Ireland would be at an end, and the people of that country reconciled to the mild government and free constitution of the country.

Lord Grenville thought the House could proceed no farther in the bill, without information from his majesty, as to the causes which called for an extraordinary supply. It had been the invariable usage for the last hundred years, for the crown to demand such supply, and to state its reasons, before parliament voted it. The House had now no information that could warrant them in granting extraordinary supplies; they could not even guess whether ministers intended to keep Malta and the Cape of Good Hope, or to surrender them; and therefore could form no opinion about the probability of immediate war.

The Lord Chancellor replied, that the present bill was not for an extraordinary supply, but one of the usual supply bills, brought in at the beginning of every session. He contended, that public notoriety was a sufficient ground for parliamentary proceeding: he could not pretend to state positively, the words used by any other of his majesty's ministers: but he could positively say, that he never was of opinion that the peace was an advantageous one; but it was still better than continuing the war without object or possible advantage.

The bill was read a first time.

Dec 15. On the motion, that the bill be read a second time,

Earl Spencer addressed their lordships at considerable length, on the ground that he had before touched upon. His objections to the establishments, for which the supply of the year was to be voted, were reduced to three heads; first, he objected to the manner, as being to be raised without that communication from the crown to parliament which was usual and necessary; secondly, he objected to the extent of these establishments; for if it was necessary to have 130,000 soldiers, besides our militia and volunteers, 50,000 seamen could not be sufficient; and his majesty's ministers were blameable in reducing the number from 70,000 to 50,000; thirdly, he objected to the probable application of such a force from a firm conviction, that the present administration had not sufficient judgment and energy of character, to use it to advantage. At a time when France was every day extending her empire and her resources, ministers had disbanded our army, and diminished the number of seamen. He agreed perfectly with a noble friend of his, that in an administration he looked to the men, as well as the measures: as to measures, every body would allow, that buying a good gun was a good measure for the defence of a house; but it was an important consideration to whom that gun was entrusted. If we were at sea at a time of impending danger, it would be well to hear that the ship was sound; but it would be full as important to hear that the pilot was skilful.

The Earl of Suffolk condemned the conduct of the late administration in the whole of the war; and praised that of the present administration, whom he thought deserving of the confidence of the nation; and who should therefore receive his support. He alluded to the conduct of the late administration, with respect to confining persons for a long time, whom they suspected of treasonable practices, but whom they never brought to trial.

The Lord Chancellor, with great warmth, declared, that he would sooner suffer death upon the spot, than hear the conduct of the late administration aspersed upon that head without confutation. If it was criminal, he was as deeply criminal as they, and the only reason for pursuing a different conduct now was, that the country was under different circumstances. He also approved of the conduct of the late administration during the war, and had always supported it: the peace had been approved of by that great character, whom the opposers of the bill had so highly extolled (Mr. Pitt), and he was much surprised to hear the same noble lords, who so highly admired that exalted character, express opinions so very different. With respect to the present situation of Europe, he felt as an Englishman must feel, but would consider it inconsistent with his duty to give any detailed information upon the subject.

The Earl of Carlisle said, his principal objection to the establishment proposed was, that it was to be voted altogether on the credit of the minister; which was a degree of confidence not to be found on the records of parliament. He was not guided in his opposition by any paltry motive of obtaining place or power; but if in the hands of other ministers, the ambition of Buonaparté was likely to receive a greater check; if the tone and spirit of the country were more likely to be supported under the management of men of greater talents, and of more elevated minds; he must wish to see the government of the country in the hands of such men. He therefore voted against the bill.

The Earl of Darnley expressed his doubts, whether such a force as had been proposed, could be safely trusted in the hands of the present ministers; he considered the ambition of Buonaparté to be so gigantic, that he would never be satisfied till he forced the doors of the Bank of England with his legion of honour, and planted his flag upon the tower of London. Against such an enemy, this country should employ its ablest ministers.

Lord Hobart denied that government had compromised the honour of the country, either in the affair of Switzerland, or in any other respect. He stated, that a greater force than that which was now demanded had been entrusted to ministers in 1801: he complained that some noble lords who had promised an active and zealous support to the present administration, had, on the contrary, honoured them with an active, constant, and zealous opposition; which increased in proportion as they gained the confidence of the public.

The Duke of Norfolk expressed his surprise at the opposition of some members of the late administration, to the present measure: the person who was at the head of that administration, resigned his situation at a period which called for the exertion of his great talents. He was sure that the conclusion of peace had given general satisfaction; and that the majority of the nation wished for its continuance. He concluded by declaring his confidence in the present administration.

Lord Grenville commenced an animated speech, by denying that he or any of his noble friends wished to stop the supplies: they wished, that according to parliamentary usage, a message might be sent from his majesty to the House, to inform them of the causes for which an increased supply was necessary. Such a message might be sent down the next day, and then there would be no delay in passing the bill: at present the House was ignorant whether the establishment proposed was for peace, for war, or for preparations of war. There were abundant precedents of the line of conduct which ought to have been pursued. George 1st did not hesitate to tell his parliament in the first speech from the throne, after the conclusion of a peace, that that peace was insecure and precarious. In such a case, parliament knew what they were about, in voting the military establishments. As to a charge of inconsistency brought against him and his friends, he must reply, that he supported the present ministers as long as he could approve of their conduct. It was not till after the convention with Russia and the peace of Amiens, that he found himself obliged, in honour, to withdraw that support. After those events, he had no confidence in the wisdom of their councils. He did not wish to pry into the arcana of government; but he, and every noble lord who heard him, was constitutionally entitled to those communications which had been heretofore uniformly made. The power of France had, since the peace, been regularly increasing; while that of this country had been impaired. He had a right to ask ministers the reason of this change of system, or to infer that they were acting on a most unwise and impolitic system. He considered the idea of waiting for the changes which time might bring about, as completely ridiculous.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his regret, that ministers had lost the confidence of the noble lord. Were he at liberty to declare the circumstances which governed the conduct of ministers, in the measures they had adopted, he was convinced the noble lord would agree with him, that they were influenced by the best considerations for the prosperity of the empire.

Lord Pelham rose for the purpose of replying to some points of lord Grenville's speech. He thought, that if in his lordship's opinion, the present ministers were so unworthy of confidence, it would have been his lordship's duty to go further than in making speeches in opposition; he ought to have moved an address to his majesty for their removal. He had never coveted office; he assumed it with no other view than for the service of his country, in a critical and awful period. He acted to the best of his judgment, and did not wish to hold his situation a moment longer than he enjoyed the confidence of his country. He concluded by stating that no charges of incapacity in ministers could be a reason for not passing the present bill.

Lord Minto agreed in the objections that had been made by other noble lords to votes of supply, or their being offered to the House without the usual information. He strongly suspected that the honour of the country had been compromised with respect to Switzerland. He believed it was after a remonstrance made on the part of this country, that Switzerland was invaded; and yet ministers never gave any information to parliament upon this subject, though often asked for it.

The bill was then committed.

Protest against the Malt Duty Bill.]

Dec. 15. The following Protest was entered on the Journals:

"Dissentient,

"Because the constitutional argument which was urged for suspending the grant of any supply, until the accustomed communication had been made from the crown to parliament, rests on two propositions drawn from the law and usage of parliament and from the very essence of the British constitution.—First, that no grant of supply can in any case be made to the crown, except in consequence of a previous demand for aid. And secondly, that such demand must not only describe the general services for which the aid is asked, but must also specify whether those services are calculated on an expectation of peace or of war, or of preparation for war.

"These two propositions have been invariably adopted in the practice of our constitution. No instance has yet been alleged in which they have ever been violated, except in the present case, and their maintenance is essential to the discharge of all our most important duties. If parliament can alone decide upon the amount of the supply to be granted, it is obvious that parliament must be informed of the extent and nature of the services which that supply is to defray; a question which must always essentially depend on the probability or certainty of peace or war.

"For the solution of this question we are now referred to public notoriety alone. We answer, that the constitution of our country entitles us to more authentic information; that such is the course which the law and usage of the parliament have established; and that, unless the uniform practice of our ancestors be adhered to in this respect, we can neither satisfactorily regulate our own conduct, nor judge as we ought of the measures of government.

"But we deny that any notoriety as to the point in question does in fact exist. The dangers of the country are indeed sufficiently notorious; but parliament is yet to learn by what system of conduct the king's government proposes to avert or to encounter those dangers. The determinations of the ministers, as far as we know them, have been uncertain and fluctuating, their councils undecided, their measures inconsistent, and their language contradictory. We are called upon to provide for an establishment large beyond all former example; but we have not yet been distinctly told, not even in debate, much less in the constitutional way of communication from the throne, what is the purpose for which it is intended to provide—whether this be a peace establishment calculated to last until the power of France be reduced or her ambition satiated; or whether it be a measure of temporary preparation which is to apply to some actual pressure, or to support some depending negotiation; or lastly, whether it be intended to meet the imminent danger of immediate war, and to resist the continued growth of that power which hourly threatens our own destruction.

"In this situation, yielding to no men in duty, loyalty, and attachment to the crown, and feeling more anxious for the immediate adoption of all practical means of defence, in proportion as our sense of the impending danger is greater, we are still desirous that some short interval and pause should take place before the final grant of any supply; though we desire that such interval should be no more than will be sufficient to enable his majesty to show to us the same gracious confidence which his majesty and his royal ancestors have reposed in all preceding parliaments, and to place us in a situation in which we may, without violating the constitution of our country, cheerfully concur in granting to his majesty all such aids as the present exigency of affairs does, in our opinion, peculiarly demand.

Debate in the Commons on the Naval Commissioners Bill.] Dec. 13. Captain Markham rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of an inquiry into the abuses of the navy. He began by vindicating the late administration of that department from the reproach of not having put a stop to these abuses. They had instituted an inquiry, and many reports, ably drawn up, had been presented on the subject; but their attention had been so engrossed during the course of a long and laborious contest, that it was impossible for them to find leisure to pursue, as they wished to do, a system for the correction of these abuses. The bill which he should move for leave to bring in, would proceed on the same principle as that which they had then in contemplation and would have in view the naval department only. Its great and only object was the public utility. Besides, the board of Admiralty did not possess the necessary powers for prosecuting such an inquiry with effect, as they did not possess the power of examining witnesses upon oath, or of calling for papers and records which might be indispensable for a satisfactory inquiry into the subject. This object could be adequately attained only by the appointment of a commission named by parliament, and vested with all the requisite powers for bringing to light the irregularities and abuses complained of, and for devising the most effectual means of correcting and preventing them in future. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill to that effect.

Earl Temple thought that some specific grounds should have been adduced to justify the House in granting the power which the bill called for. The general assertion, that abuses existed, did not warrant the House in granting such powers. The navy board already possessed the powers that were necessary, and those powers might be transferred to the Admiralty.

Lord Hawkesbury contended, that it was not the object of the bill to confer any new powers upon the Admiralty, but merely to appoint a commission to put into execution those they already possessed.

After a short conversation, leave was given to bring in the bill.

Dec. 17. On the motion for re-committing the bill,

Mr. Canning said, that if the Admiralty had not sufficient power to correct the abuses which they had detected, he would rather give additional powers to that board, because it was an existing, known jurisdiction, than create this new tribunal. It had been said, that the board of Admiralty itself was to be subordinate to this commission; but he did not believe that this was the object of the bill; for though there was a clause making the Admiralty in some respects subordinate to the new board, yet it was enacted in another clause, that this new tribunal was to derive all its information from the board of Admiralty. When the bill had gone through the committee, time should be allowed to parliament to consider the subject. He saw no objection to its remaining till after the recess.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that if abuses did exist, no time ought to be lost in detecting them; if the House were of opinion that they did not exist, the bill should be rejected altogether. It would be recollected that these commissioners were only empowered to inquire, not to punish; and parliament had, in fact, in the year 1792, pledged itself to make such inquiry when peace was finally restored.

Admiral Berkeley could not perfectly approve of the persons appointed for commissioners with such extraordinary powers; for (excepting sir Charles Pole) he thought that they, though very respectable men in their own particular line, were not sufficiently acquainted with the persons or things with whom they would have to do.

Mr. Sturges objected to this bill, as having for a principal object, to extract confession of guilt from the delinquents, or punish them for perjury; this was contrary to the spirit of our constitution.

The Attorney General expressed his surprise at the new career of opposition, which gentlemen had embarked in. It was perhaps the first time, when ministers had called for an inquiry into abuses, that such inquiry was resisted by opposition.

Dr. Laurence thought that the bill was in opposition to an excellent principle, which had been laid down, that no man should be compelled to give evidence of his own delinquency: he thought it was the duty of the Admiralty to punish the delinquents when they found them out; but he did not approve of commissioners being now appointed, to overhaul every transaction of the late war.

After some farther conversation, the bill passed through the committee.

Dec. 18. On the motion, that the bill be now read a third time, lord Folkestone moved, that instead of the word "now," the "8th of February be inserted."

Mr. Lemon said, he considered the bill as an ex-post facto measure, and consequently unjust. He was apprehensive it would have the effect of overturning the rules of evidence.

Mr. Courtenay said, that not an hour should be lost in discovering and checking those frauds and corruptions which were generally admitted to exist. It was a bill recommended by a man who had added new lustre to the British flag, and whose name would shine with distinguished brilliancy in the naval annals of Britain. It had been objected, that the bill was retrospective. Certainly, it necessarily must be so; it was to discover frauds that had already taken place; a prophetic bill to discover frauds before their existence, could only be conceived by those who made the objection.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that every inquiry must, in the nature of things, be ex-post facto. It was an inquiry into abuses that have past, in order to prevent their recurrence.

Mr. Kinnaird approved of the principle of the bill, but disapproved of the means made use of for correcting abuses. He had moved for the patents, to see what powers they contained. He would maintain, that they contained an injunction from his majesty, directing the Admiralty to inquire into the abuses complained of.

He thought that, by taking away the duties of the greater offices, such as the bill proposed to do with respect to the Admiralty, and instituting an intermediate power between them and parliament, the responsibility was proportionably diminished. He would rather say give to the Admiralty Board additional powers, and make them responsible to the House. He regretted to see the House departing from its usual jealousy with respect to the influence of the crown, by the opening for its members new sources of employment.

Mr. Sturges observed, that much had been said of the great achievements of the noble earl at the head of the Admiralty, in which he was ready to concur; but he felt himself obliged to state, in justification of his own conduct, that he thought that noble earl's management, since his accession to office, not entitled to confidence, particularly when he recollected that he had brought two deserving officers to trial upon charges from which they were honorably acquitted. This was one reason for the jealousy he entertained of the proceedings of the Admiralty. He contended, that such parts of their conduct as had obtained popularity, were merely in the pursuance of the plans and recommendations of their predecessors.

Mr. R. Ward said, that in Keble's Reports there existed an account of the origin and powers of a commission appointed in the reign of Charles 2nd to inquire into a misapplication, under his majesty's authority, of money granted by the Commons for the expenditure of the navy. In the patent the commissioners were authorized to commit persons refusing to own the authority of their inquiry; so that those persons should stand committed without bail or mainprise. As the commission was intended to act with an inquisitorial and checking power in some sort against the king himself, the precedent could not be regarded as unduly hostile to the liberty of the subject. How, then, could gentlemen oppose this bill, on the pretence that the powers which it went to grant were novel and unconstitutional?

The Attorney-General said, he had not heard the slightest reason assigned for postponing the bill. It was therefore obvious, that gentlemen were fighting merely for the triumph of protracting a measure, against which they had been unable to assign any solid objection.

Earl Temple reprobated the practice of imputing improper views to gentlemen who opposed ministers. If it was resolved to press this measure, he wished to know whether the gentlemen nominated in the bill had signified their intention of accepting the office of commissioners, and also how far back it was proposed that they should go in their inquiries; whether they were to examine the abuses of the navy in the reign of James the 2nd.

Mr. Sheridan concurred in the sentiment of the noble lord, that it was improper to ascribe unworthy motives to any member; and that declaration, he ironically observed, came with peculiar grace from the noble lord; for he not only professed respect for the principle, but regard for the practice. The present ministers were, according to that noble lord's assertion, weak, incapable men: they were a milk and water composition, a mere mawkish mixture; but there was no personality in all this! When ministers stated that the bill was suggested by the report of the committee of finance, the noble lord denied the assertion, and charged them with using false pretences, but there was no personality in that! It was all consistent from the noble lord! The necessity for this bill was so glaring, that he was surprised at the objections that were made to it; when it was considered that the peculations committed in the naval department, for the last ten years, amounted to three millions a year. An hon. gentleman had stated that this would be an ex-post facto law; but how was it to be otherwise? A similar objection had been made to a similar proposition, in the reign of queen Elizabeth; and the answer of lord Burleigh was particularly applicable. That noble lord said, "If I lose my purse on the road, where am I to find it? why, by going back, to be sure." The purpose of this bill is to go back to the frauds that have been committed upon the public, and not merely to punish the defaulter, but to recover, if possible, the money we have lost. He heartily approved of the bill: its object was, the reform of abuses; and when such a signal was given from the main-top-mast of the Admiralty, he trusted it would be attended to in all the other departments of administration.

Mr. Chancellor Addington, in answer to two questions put to him by a noble lord, said, he did not know whether all the persons named in the commission would accept that dignity or not; and this he thought was a proof that ministers had nothing in view but the interests of the country, without any regard to the advancement or emolument of any particular description of persons. Several bills of a similar import with the present had received the assent of the House, in the progress of none of which had any mention been made of the acceptance or non-acceptance of the persons nominated to the commission. Four of the persons appointed to the commission, in the present instance, had notified their acceptance of the charge. The fifth, he believed, was as yet unacquainted with the honour designed to be conferred upon him. With regard to the second question, to what past period the retrospective view of abuses was meant to extend, this was a point that must be left to the discretion of the commissioners.

The amendment was negatived, and the bill read a third time. After which, Mr. Sheridan proposed, in order to guard against the influence of the crown, that in case of any vacancy among the commissioners, his majesty should not be at liberty to appoint any member of that House to supply the place.

This clause was adopted, and the bill passed.

Debate in the Lords on the Naval Commissioners Bill.] Dec. 21. On the motion that this bill be read a second time,

Lord Pelham lamented extremely that the noble earl who presided at the Admiralty board was prevented by ill health from attending his duty in that House. Had that not been the case, their lordships would doubtless have heard from the noble earl the reasons which made him think such a bill absolutely necessary. Generally speaking, he entertained great jealousy of every bill of this nature. He did not admire the delegating extraordinary powers to any commissioners whatever. Reposing, however, full confidence in the noble earl at the head of the Admiralty, reposing also a considerable degree of confidence in the House of Commons, and believing that they would not have passed the bill, if they had not been satisfied that the abuses in question could not be effectually corrected without it, he was ready to give his vote for the second reading.

Lord Nelson said, that great abuses existed in the navy; and most especially were they practised by the prize agents.

Men of his profession found great difficulty in getting their prize money out of the hands of the agents, and often did not get it all. He was sure the legislature was anxious that the poorest sea-boy should receive its protection. The admiral, the commandant of a fleet, or the captain, might find means to obtain their right, but the poor seaman had not a chance of being able to get his money. The bill gave great powers; but they were powers without which the abuses in question could not be effectually corrected; and the hands in which they were to be entrusted were such as were not likely to abuse them. One ground had presented itself to his mind, in which he thought, in the first view of it, great objection might be taken; and that was, the power of calling for merchants books, and by that means getting at all their concerns and connexions. Now, as the credit of a merchant was more precious even than his wealth, he felt some apprehensions lest that credit might, under the operations of the bill, suffer material injury; but as no merchant had made the slightest objection to the bill on that account, his apprehensions had subsided.

The Lord Chancellor said, he knew there had been commissioners of public accounts and commissioners on other grounds, from whose diligence and ability beneficial effects had resulted to the public; but even the recollection of that circumstance did not disarm his caution, in respect to the present bill, or convince him that the authorizing commissioners to exercise the powers vested in them by it, was the only, or the most effectual means of remedying the evils complained of. The whole of this bill rested upon the assertion of a fact, viz. that certain abuses, frauds, and irregularities, prevailed in the navy, which called for correction. Every man must feel anxious that those sailors who fought our battles should, without delay, vexation, or difficulty, receive the due reward of their valour; but possibly that desirable object would have been better obtained, if a separate commission had been authorized by a bill, for the single purpose of inquiring into the abuses of prize agents. The fact meant to be described in the preamble of the bill might, by one set of men, be termed an abuse; by another, a fraud; and by a third an irregularity. Would it not, therefore, be a more intelligible thing to have divided each of these, and, instead of instituting commissions to inquire into mixed and complicated objects, to have issued different commissions applicable to each of the three heads? One main consideration, under the powers granted to commissioners of any sort was, that the full benefit, not only of the law of England, but of the essential principle on which the existence of that law depended, should be secured to the subject, viz. that no man, whatever had been his conduct, should be called upon to criminate himself. Being a lawyer, he must watch vigilantly over the benefits meant to be extended to every British subject, from this important principle of law; and therefore too much pains could not be taken by their lordships, when they were called upon to pass a bill giving extraordinary powers of examining books and persons to commissioners, to guard against the exercise of those powers being so enforced as to endanger the freedom and security which the constitution intended every individual should enjoy. In the committee he would earnestly apply himself to assist, to the utmost of his power, in making it a safe and salutary bill.

The bill was read a second time.

Dec. 22. The House being in a committee on the bill,

The Lord Chancellor proposed the omission of one clause, and the insertion of a proviso in lieu of it, in order to secure to the persons called upon by the commissioners to answer, that principle of the common law which gave every man a right to refuse to answer, if his answer either criminated himself, or had a tendency to criminate him. He was aware that parliament had, in cases of aggravated abuse, gone beyond this bill, and, in the case of the South Sea business, thought it necessary to compel the parties interrogated to confess their guilt. But in the case of the present bill, which was not intended to operate as a bill of punishment, but merely as a bill of inquiry, there was no occasion for departing from the sacred principles of the common law of England.

Lord Ellenborough said, he thankfully received the noble lord's clause, because he agreed completely with him as to the propriety of its adoption in the present instance; but he trusted parliament would never think itself warranted to part with the right in flagrant abuses, to compel the offender to reveal the guilty secret that lay lurking in his bosom. The enormous frauds in respect to the public, which had come to his knowledge while he held the office of attorney-general, made this declaration necessary.

The bill then went through the committee.

Debate in the Commons on the Bank Restriction Bill.] February 7, 1803. Mr. Chancellor Addington rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to continue, for a time to be limited, the act which prohibits the issue of specie from the Bank. It was with the utmost reluctance he submitted this proposition to the House, but the reasons which suggested it were too strong, and the necessity too urgent to be resisted. That necessity, however, he hoped, would soon disappear; and, notwithstanding the opinions which had gone abroad, anxiously looked forward to the day, when the Bank would be at liberty to resume its payments in specie. As to the grounds upon which the expediency of the restriction originally rested, he did not now think it necessary to discuss them, still less did he think it necessary to enter into any inquiry respecting the sufficiency of the Bank to answer all the demands upon it. When such an inquiry was before instituted, the case was novel, and therefore to satisfy the public mind was proper and necessary. But what was the result of that inquiry? Why, it removed even the possibility of suspicion as to the circumstances of the Bank. He was confident that at this instant there did not exist in any quarter a doubt as to the solidity of the Bank; of course that could not now become a fit subject for inquiry, though it might be very strongly insisted on as an advisable preliminary to the motion he meant to propose. He observed, that many persons who originally condemned the order of council which produced the stoppage of the Bank, and who disapproved of the parliamentary proceedings which followed, were yet at a subsequent period, from a sense of duty, adverse to the idea of suffering the Bank suddenly to resume its operation. Such was the case in the last session, when some of those gentlemen concurred in the propriety of continuing the restriction, because the course of exchange was against this country. A similar reason prompted him on this occasion to move for a still farther continuance of this restriction. At present, the state of our exchange with Hamburgh was at par—with

Amsterdam it was unfavourable. If then our disadvantageous situation, with regard to exchange, was last session considered a sufficient argument for this measure, he would appeal to the House, under the present circumstances of the country, when no influx of bullion from the continent could be immediately looked for, whether it would be expedient to allow the restriction to cease? He would also ask, as it was found necessary to permit the issue of country bank notes, whether the sudden issue of cash from the Bank would not produce a run upon the country banks, and a consequent run upon the Bank of England, which might be productive of the most serious consequences. From these considerations, he would rather submit to the inconvenience of continuing the restriction even longer than might be actually necessary, than risk the consequences of setting aside that restriction too soon. From motives of precaution, therefore, he brought forward this measure. He did not mean to underrate the inconveniences which resulted from the stoppage of the Bank, but he would maintain that it was better to endure those inconveniences, than to expose the country to the effects which were likely to arise from prematurely removing the restriction. He hoped, however, the period would soon arrive when the progressive advancement of our commerce would produce such a steady inclination of the exchange in our favour, as would enable us with perfect safety to permit the Bank to resume its payments in specie. The causes of the present state of exchange, a very little reflection would explain to the House. The scarcity of the last three years had made it necessary for us to purchase a vast quantity of grain on the continent, and for this purpose not less than twenty millions of specie had been sent out of the country. When, then, such a drain as this, arising from a cause which was not likely soon to occur again, was combined with the drain of cash for the payment of our army and navy, it would be obvious that we should wait the operations of a flourishing commerce, to bring back some proportion of this vast amount of bullion, before we attempted to permit the Bank to issue specie. Upon these grounds he felt himself justified in proposing, "That leave be given to bring in a bill, to continue an act of last session, for continuing the restriction on payments of cash by the Bank."

Mr. Tierney admitted, that though originally hostile to the stoppage of the Bank, he thought that the peculiar circumstances of the country last session, rendered it inexpedient to take off the restriction; but those circumstances no longer existed, and he therefore objected to the motion without some previous inquiry respecting the Bank. He did not now intend to give any opinion whether the restriction ought to continue, or to be abolished altogether; but he wished to impress upon the House the propriety of previous inquiry. The right hon. gentleman, indeed, had mentioned the state of the exchange; but was the House to have no other information but from his speech? How few were the members of that House, whose habits or connexions gave them an opportunity of knowing any thing about the exchanges? Of the necessity of a committee of inquiry to satisfy the public mind, he was firmly persuaded; but though it appeared to him highly desirable, yet he would not wish to provoke a debate if the sentiments of the House did not seem to coincide with his own. If they did, his proposal would be to pass the bill for two months, and to appoint a committee in the interim, to consider how far it would be proper to continue the restriction farther, or to discontinue it altogether. No other ground was laid for the present motion, but that the exchange with Hamburgh was at par; and upon that naked fact it was proposed to do away the right of the public creditor to convert bank-notes into cash. He trusted the House would not adopt this monstrous bill at a time when there was no plausible pretext for it, when no money was likely to go out of the country, when no alarm prevailed in either domestic or foreign politics, when no fear of any sudden press on the Bank could be entertained. The Bank directors ought to show that there was no danger in their responsibility. They could not be afraid of a run upon them, for who could now think of any material advantage from hoarding gold? They should not plead any little expense or trouble which might occur in procuring bullion, if they want it, as a reason against accommodating the public by paying their own notes, particularly after the vast sums they had put in their pockets. The public had a right to say to them, "You have been for the last six years reaping a productive harvest from our inconvenience; we only ask of you now to convert into cash the notes for which we have given you credit so long," and the Bank ought to be provided to answer this reasonable request. They could have no apology for declining it, unless incapacity; and he did not suppose that to be the case. No director could dare to say, at a time when trade was flourishing, profound peace prevailing, and no alarm whatever appearing, that the exchange being at par would be a sufficient ground for the motion before the House. He exhorted the chancellor of the exchequer to allay the opinions which were afloat. Several factions agitated the public mind, and each had their literary advocates. One of these advocates, in defence of the system of his party, had lately written a pamphlet, entitled, "The Iniquity of Banking," and another immediately replied in a pamphlet, entitled, "Guineas an useless Incumbrance." Perhaps it would be very prudent in the House to step in between these disputants, and by the report of a committee set the public mind at ease. Something ought certainly to be done to put an end to a measure which injures our credit in the eyes of foreigners, and distracts the course of pecuniary dealings in our own country.

Mr. Fox began by observing, that if the right hon. gentleman felt the reluctance he had expressed to bring forward the present proposition, much more urgent reasons than those he had heard should, in his opinion, be adduced in its support. If, however, necessity called for its adoption, he was not disposed to object to it: at the same time, he should feel more satisfaction if there were laid before him sufficient grounds to justify his assent; and in that view he concurred with the hon. gentleman who spoke last, in thinking that some inquiry should be instituted into the causes of the continuance of the restriction, that it might appear whether they were of a nature to render the restriction necessary or not. The principal grounds on which the continuance of the suspension now seemed to be rested, were the state of the exchange, and the small quantity of bullion that of late had been imported. Was it then to be understood, that whenever the state of the exchange was so unfavourable as to leave no room to expect the importation of bullion, a restriction should be put on the cash payments of the Bank? Such a mode of reasoning would, on the face of it, go to establish it as a general axiom, that in all such cases the cash payments of the Bank should be suspended. To these reasons were added the great exportation of specie for corn, and on account of other circumstances connected with the war. If these additional reasons had any force, then the propriety of farther continuing the restriction should not be made to depend so entirely on the state of the exchange. Perhaps even it might happen that the unfavourable turn of the exchange against this country might be owing to the very restriction on the Bank; and as on this head doubts were entertained, that with him was a strong reason for inquiry, because a proposition for such inquiry might bring forth many opinions on the subject, more especially of commercial men, and of the directors of the Bank, whose pursuits and occupations enabled them to throw most light on such subjects. It was not into the conduct of the directors that the House should be anxious to inquire. They professed themselves to be ready to renew their payments in specie, if government had no political reasons for preventing them from doing so. They were ready even now to resume their cash payments; and if they, as bankers, saw no danger or inconvenience in resuming them, was it not incumbent upon the House to inquire into the grounds of the political objection that was opposed to that resumption? For his part, he could not conceive a possible case where the restriction could be necessary or useful, when the directors declared themselves to be able and willing to pay in specie. If such a case existed, it should be made out. When the Bank directors expressed no reluctance to recommence their payments in specie, must not the worst inferences be drawn, even from a suspicion that circumstances were such as to make it imprudent to suffer them to resume their payments? The House must recollect how closely the credit of the Bank was connected with the credit of the country, and how much it therefore must depend upon the management of the Bank. The credit of the country was not likely before to be much affected by that management; for, while the Bank continued to pay in specie, if the directors chanced to act improperly, the public were able to discover the impropriety of their conduct in the consequences to which it must have given rise; but now, as there was not the same check on them as that by which other bankers were bound, the public had no longer the same security, and the whole of the credit of the country was made to depend upon the administration of men whose conduct was under the control of government, and who owed no responsibility to the country. When the public credit was so endangered, it was not surprising that an impatience should be expressed to get rid of the restriction; at all events, he must hope that a short bill only would now be proposed, and that time would be allowed to examine how far it should be prolonged. It might also be proper to inquire how far the state of exchange should be admitted as a criterion whether the Bank should pay in specie or not. Allowing also that there might be some danger in taking off the restriction altogether, still might not some arrangement be adopted for paying a small part of the dividends and notes in cash? By adopting a gradual system of that kind, all danger from a sudden run might be avoided. But it is said, if the Bank renews its cash payments, the specie will be sent out of the country—that is very probable; but as long as there is a strong temptation to send guineas abroad, the most rigorous laws, even when most vigilantly enforced, will prove inadequate to prevent it. Neither can it be expected that the Bank Directors will serve the public at their own loss. They will not buy bullion that the public may have money, they will not lose in purchasing it, that others may gain by sending it out of the country. But with regard to the fluctuations in the state of the exchange between this country and others, there was a circumstance which now occurred to his mind, if he rightly recollected it, which tended to show that the state of the exchange does not always depend on the circumstances which are now supposed almost solely to affect it. In 1772, or 1773, when there was a great quantity of bad money in the country, the course of exchange was then also much against us; but when in the room of this adulterated money good gold was substituted, the consequence was, that the exchange turned almost immediately in our favour. As long as our currency continued bad, the exchange was against us; so is it now, because paper is not much better than bad gold; or, it is attended with the same inconveniences. May it not therefore be expected, that as, in the former case, when our currency was meliorated, the course of exchange turned in our favour, so also, if the Bank now resumed its cash payments, the same favourable circumstances might attend the change? This was a matter that well deserved to be inquired into. There were many other points to which an inquiry might be usefully directed, and he should not be sorry to see a motion made for instituting one.

Mr. Bankes felt rather undecided how he should act on the present occasion. If it was intended that the bill should go beyond a very short period, the dignity of the House and the security of the public credit might require that some investigation should be made into the unnatural state in which imperious circumstances had, for some time past, placed the Bank. Since peace was now restored, and those circumstances no longer continue to operate, the House should be slow in acceding to such a measure, as that now proposed, without very satisfactory grounds to justify them in adopting it.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that the only question now before them was, that leave be given to bring in a bill. When it came to the stage for filling up the blanks, then an opportunity would occur to discuss the time to which its operation should be limited, and to advance the reasons why a committee of inquiry should be appointed. Gentlemen seemed to imagine that his right hon. friend ascribed the necessity of the measure solely to the state of exchange. Now, his right hon. friend, in stating his opinion of the measure, looked back to the necessity which justified it at the time it was first proposed, and to the salutary consequences which its adoption had produced; and in that view he could not but applaud it as a wise precaution; but looking at it now generally and abstractedly, he could not but regard it as an evil, and he therefore felt anxious for the arrival of the period when the cash payments might be safely resumed. He entertained nearly the same opinion; but what added to his embarrassment was, the difficulty of taking off the restriction after it was once imposed. His right hon. friend had observed that the restriction had been continued for many years, without any inconvenience having resulted from it; and this he was ready to ascribe, to the excellence of the institution itself, and to the prudent conduct of the gentlemen who administered its affairs. If, therefore, no inconvenience has as yet accrued from the restriction, would it not be wise to pause awhile, and look for the period when the removing of it may be attended with as little danger as possible? The noble lord then enumerated the causes why the course of exchange was against this country, and why the quantity of its bullion was diminished. A great quantity of it was known to have been sent abroad, not only for the purchase of corn but for the maintenance and use of the army and navy. The exportation of our bullion was then a matter of necessity; for the exchanges were with regard to us reduced extremely low: but they are now improved, and may soon be expected to be at par. If, therefore, any inconvenience still remains that may be likely to arise from a premature change of system, is it not proper to look forward to a period when no obstacle may impede it? It was not upon any prospect of an unfavourable change that the present measure was grounded, but rather the delicacy of reverting to the old system without taking the advantage of a favourable moment. That moment was perhaps at no great distance, and prudence admonished, that it should be waited for with patience. As to the appointment of a committee of inquiry, he objected to it, chiefly because its only effect would be to create alarms that might be extremely prejudicial. The appointment of such a committee might be necessary if any doubts were entertained of the sufficiency of the Bank; but on that point the most perfect satisfaction had already been afforded. It might perhaps be proper, at a future period, to revise the whole system of our paper credit, but then that should be done merely with relation to that system itself, and without any reference whatever to the institution and conduct of the Bank. An hon. gentleman has observed, that in 1773 the course of exchange was against this country when our gold coin was of an inferior value, but that immediately after the recoinage, it turned round in our favour—but the fact is, that at that period the exchange was against us only in appearance, in substance it was in our favour. No inference can therefore be drawn from that circumstance, that restriction on the Bank is the cause of the unfavourable turn of the exchange, or that the exchange would turn in our favour, if that restriction were taken off.

Sir F. Baring observed, that circumstances wholly unnoticed or unattended to might have occasioned the unfavourable turn of the course of exchange against this country. Formerly, its fluctuations might be accurately calculated; but the commercial as well as the political frame of Europe, was so dislocated and disjointed, that nothing now could be calculated to a certainty. The disadvantages we now laboured under did not arise from common causes, but from extraordinary and unexpected efforts to cramp and to counteract our commercial enterprises. Our credit, however, was never safer or sounder than at the present moment, and the measure proposed was one of propriety, not of necessity.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Feb. 12. The House being in a Committee on the bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the duration of it should be until six weeks after the commencement of the next session.

Mr. Bankes urged a variety of reasons why a shorter time should be named; he principally relied on the state of exchange which was at par, and the balance of trade, which was now in our favour: he concluded by moving as an amendment, "that the 1st of May be the day on which the restriction should cease."

Mr. Princep supported the original motion, on the ground, that no loss or inconvenience, had been sustained, in consequence of the restriction.

Mr. Chancellor Addington declared, that if he supposed any considerable number of the reflecting part of the community doubted the sufficiency of the Bank, he would agree to an inquiry: if he resisted it now, it was because he was convinced it was unnecessary. He thought the whole object of the amendment would be accomplished, by declaring that it should be in the power of parliament to repeal or amend the act during the present session. He however had no expectation, that the circumstances of the times would allow it to be so soon repealed.

Mr. H. Thornton was fully aware of the great inconvenience which would attend the taking off the restriction. The present was no time for the adoption of such a measure. He at the same time was impressed with a degree of parliamentary jealousy on the occasion. He agreed that the Bank could not with safety be opened, unless the exchange was favourable to this country; but was of opinion that the first favourable season should be taken advantage of.

The original motion was then agreed to; and on the 14th the bill was passed.

Debate in the Lords on the Bank Restriction Bill.] Feb. 22. On moving the second reading,

Lord Pelham took a cursory retrospect of the operation of the restriction since 1797, and from that retrospect he thought himself warranted in asserting that no injurious consequences had arisen from it. Of the stability and solvency of the Bank, it was superfluous for him to bring forward any proof. Other reasons called for the continuance of the restriction, more particularly reasons of prudence and expediency. The idea of renewing the restriction at the present moment originated solely with government. Government had had no communication with the Bank, as a bank, upon the matter. It was the general opinion of men best enabled to form correct notions on such topics, that the restriction had proved highly beneficial to commerce. These, in concurrence with other motives, have induced ministers now to propose it anew. They see the course of exchange, which the very large remittances in specie for the purchase of corn in times of scarcity, for subsidies to foreign powers, and for the maintenance of our fleets and armies in distant stations, had occasioned to be so much against this country, now gradually turn in its favour; they see our trade and commerce gradually increasing and swelling into an extent beyond any former example; they have, consequently, just reason to expect that, in a short time, there will be such a reflux of bullion into the country as to make up for the enormous drain of specie. Did not, therefore, sound policy call for a temporary continuance of a measure from which no mischief had accrued, but from which much benefit had resulted?

Lord King could by no means agree that any thing like adequate reasons had been adduced for farther continuing the restriction, under the present circumstances of the country. It was a measure which he could not but look upon as a very extraordinary one—a measure that encroached on private property, that violated public faith, and that put the whole monied property of [the nation at the mercy of the Bank directors. It was an infringement of the solemn compact which the Bank had entered into with the public when government granted them a charter; and could their lordships precipitately assent to such a measure without such reasons having been adduced for its absolute necessity as ought to enforce the strongest conviction in their lordships' minds? But where were the proofs of that necessity? Did the country now labour under that extraordinary pressure, arising from a variety of difficulties and dangers which were advanced in support of the first adoption of the restriction? On the contrary, was it not confessed to be in a state of the highest commercial prosperity? Where then, could be the urgent necessity of its renewal? what would be the effect of it, but the encouraging of an enormous issue of paper, which raised the price of every article, and must continue to keep the state of exchange unfavourable to us? To prove that such must be the effect resulting from such a measure, the noble lord entered into a variety of comparative statements of the course of exchange at different periods. According to these statements it appeared, that from the time the restriction was first imposed, the course of exchange began to turn against this country in various proportions to the quantity of paper in circulation. Previous to the laying on the restriction, the Bank seldom issued notes to more than the amount of 10, 11, or 12 millions; but since that period, they issued to the amount of 15 and 16 millions. Hence the rise in the price of bullion; for it was justly remarked, that in proportion as paper was plenty, and therefore cheap, gold would be scarce, and consequently dear. The average amount of our circulating medium was about ten millions: that had been found fully sufficient to answer all the purposes of the country. When, therefore, an unnecessary addition was made to it, of one, two, or three millions, there was a depreciation in the value of paper in the same proportion. But it was not merely on account of the inconveniences arising from the measure that he objected to it: he objected to its principle, and to its being drawn into a precedent, which, he feared, would be the case whenever it might suit the convenience of ministers or the Bank; and thus parliament might be called upon not only to confide implicitly in ministers, but also to place the same confidence in the directors of the Bank.

The Earl of Moir perfectly concurred with the noble lord, that, when the Bank issued paper to an extraordinary amount, their notes must suffer a depreciation, and the price of bullion must also rise in proportion. Gold was not sold for gold, but for paper; and its price would always be in proportion to the greater scarcity or plenty of paper, or to that against which it was exchanged. He wished to direct their lordships attention to the compact, in which the Bank was bound towards all those who had intrusted their money to their integrity. Was a compact so sacred lightly to be trifled with? Look at the facility which the Bank might afford government for the issue of exchequer bills; the Bank might be screened on one side by the continuance of the restriction, and be tempted on the other by the superior advantage of buying up government paper of that description. Indeed, when this motive for the renewal of the restriction occurred to his mind, he discovered a quality in the transaction which rendered it altogether uncongenial to his mode of thinking, and he was sorry that ministers had advanced no plausible argument to do away that unfavourable impression.

The Earl of Westmoreland contended, that the present question had nothing to do with the stability of the Bank, or the expediency of the original restriction. These points were long since satisfactorily settled. The only question now was, with regard to the expediency of removing, at the present moment, a restriction, the beneficial effects of which have been already fully experienced. At the time when the restriction originally took place, the expediency of the measure did not originate from any idea of the inadequacy of the Bank to answer every just demand, but was the result of an extraordinary and unaccountable alarm, which gave rise to an unusual demand. It never was the intention of the establishment of the Bank that there never should be an issue of paper greater than, at a moment's notice, could be covered by an issue of cash. This, indeed, would be completely contrary to the very nature of such an establishment. It was only necessary that the funds of the Bank should bear a full proportion to the demands for which they might ultimately become responsible. That the resources of the Bank were completely adequate to every demand was questioned by no one, and therefore the question of continuing the restriction was simply one of expediency. On the principle of expediency, the restriction began in a moment when an extraordinary alarm was excited; and it was proper that when the Bank resumed its cash payments, no extraordinary demand should be created by precipitating the measure. Delay could be productive of no disadvantage, while a hasty renewal of the restriction might involve the Bank in very serious inconveniences.

Lord Auckland said, it was not on the state of exchange that he rested his support of the continuance of the restriction. A consideration of much greater importance determined his judgment; this consideration was derived from a view of the state of the country in its relations with foreign powers. He would offer no decided opinion on the probable period to which the continuance of peace might extend. Ministers, he doubted not, would omit nothing in their power to preserve a good understanding with foreign states; but it was impossible to determine how far their exertions might be successful. Before the expediency of discontinuing the restriction on the payments of the Bank could be established, it was necessary to wait to see how far there was a prospect of the durability of peace. Already the course of exchange was assuming a more favourable appearance, and the continuance of peace could not fail to increase this advantageous operation. In the view of a permanent peace, our financial prospects were of the most flattering kind, and it was agreeable to every principle of policy and expediency to wait for the operation of this financial prosperity before the restriction was precipitately withdrawn. He called the attention of the House to the very large drain of cash from this country for the last ten years. He produced calculations to show, that, during the few years previous to the original restriction in 1797, this drain had not amounted to less than 48 millions; and, including the drain which, from a variety of circumstances, had taken place during the last six years, the whole could not be estimated at less than 120 millions. Under such circumstances, policy required that the restriction should not be withdrawn till the operation of our financial prosperity began to be more fully experienced in the influence which it would necessarily produce in giving an advantageous turn to the course of the exchange, and the influx of bullion which it would create. In illustration of this position, his lordship laid before the House a calculation of the amount of the annual revenue, contrasted with the expenditure. The former he calculated at 34 millions, and the permanent charges at 25 millions, leaving for the ordinary expenses of the year a surplus of nine millions.

Lord Grenville said, that whatever the period of peace might be, and in his opinion it might be of very short duration, he trusted the revenue of the country would be raised to a degree fully adequate to meet the expenditure; and that no speculations would be formed on views of the surplus of the revenue above the expenditure, which might ultimately be found delusive. His lordship placed this part of the subject in a very striking light; but declined any minute discussion, till the subject came regularly before the House. The state of the finances was one of the deepest interest: and he felt no ordinary degree of anxiety, that a subject so intimately connected with the salvation of the country, should be fully understood.

Lord Sheffield said, he had not heard any argument which, in his opinion, could justify the risk of abandoning the Bank restriction at a crisis such as the present; nor had he heard any well-founded suggestion that mischief or inconvenience could arise from the continuance of it at this time. He conceived that neither the expediency of the original measure, nor the state of the finances of the country, were the question before their lordships. The difficulty and delicacy of removing the restriction were foreseen at the time of imposing it; and as the difficulty, in consequence of the present very precarious state of Europe, is still greater than was expected, it cannot be thought prudent to hazard the relinquishment of the restriction just now, without some obvious necessity, or perhaps, till there is an influx of specie into this country. Notwithstanding all that had been asserted, he insisted that paper money had not been depreciated, nor had coin borne a premium in this kingdom, which he conceived to be the true criterion by which we should judge of the matter; for, when paper money is not depreciated, we know there is not too great an emission of that kind of currency; and he was disposed to consider a judicious increased issue of it as very advantageous, inasmuch as it enabled us better to carry on the great commercial transactions of this country; and if the event has helped to prove that immense quantities of gold coin in circulation are not absolutely necessary, this measure which we now regret, may in some degree become serviceable, by preventing hereafter, unfounded alarm on such a subject. Scotland has improved in every shape, with scarce any coin, and has been greatly benefited by a plentiful issue of paper money; and we find that great quantities of coin or bullion give little public credit to France or Spain; and consequently it may be inferred that coin has little to do with public credit: and, in truth, the necessity of having immense quantities of gold and silver in an unproductive state, in those two countries, arose from the want of public credit. Holland, when she flourished most, depended almost entirely on her bank; and countries truly commercial, such as England and Holland, could not have carried on their extensive trade by any other means. A very great proportion of the wealth of England would be in an unproductive state if it were necessary to have a coin currency for all its commercial transactions; and without a plentiful issue of paper currency, we could carry on but a small part of our present trade. He scarcely comprehended the suggestion, that the unfavourable exchange against this country took place in consequence of the Bank restriction. It did not take place immediately on the adoption of that measure: even since that time, during a certain period, there has been a great influx of gold, and the exchange has latterly become much more favourable during the existence of the restriction. It was perfectly easy to account for the unfavourable exchange, by the great remittances to the continent; and, more especially, in return for the immense importation of grain, the value of which was twenty-four millions in little more than two years; or, on an average of ten years, we have imported, of foreign corn, which we might have raised at home, to the value of at least four millions yearly—not far short of the ordinary real balance of trade in our favour. As the importation of foreign corn diminished, the course of exchange became proportionably more favourable to us. It therefore seemed reasonable to suppose that the immense payments for foreign corn consumed more than the balance of trade in our favour; and it may be observed, that the payments for a very extraordinary importation of corn, in consequence of the scarcity of 1796, drained this country so much, as to become a principal cause of the Restriction act in the spring of 1797: so that instead of imputing the unfavourable exchange to the restriction, we must place it to its proper account, our own neglect and bad policy. We suffer quibbling objections to prevent a general enclosure and cultivation of the waste lands, and we neglect to remove the great discouragements to tillage. We do not give ourselves the trouble to examine our corn laws, which have been altered much for the worse within the last thirty years.

The bill was read a second time.

The King's Message respecting the Situation of the Prince of Wales.] Feb. 16.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought down the following message from his majesty:

“GEORGE R.

“His majesty having taken into consideration the period which has elapsed since the adoption of those arrangements which were deemed by the wisdom of parliament, to be necessary for the discharge of the incumbrances of the Prince of Wales, and having adverted to the progress which has been made in carrying them into effect, recommends the present situation of the prince to the attention of this House.

“Notwithstanding the reluctance and regret which his majesty must feel in suggesting any addition to the burthens of his people, he is induced to resort, in this instance, to the experienced liberality and attachment of his faithful Commons, in the persuasion that they will be disposed to take such measures as may be calculated to promote the comfort, and support the dignity of so distinguished a branch of his royal family. G. R.”

Ordered to be referred to a committee of the whole House.

The King's Message respecting Military Preparations in the Ports of France and Holland.] March 8. The Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered the following Message from his majesty:

“GEORGE R.

“His majesty thinks it necessary to acquaint the House of Commons, that, as very considerable military preparations are carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, he has judged it expedient to adopt additional measures of precaution for the security of his dominions: though the preparations to which his majesty refers, are avowedly directed to colonial service, yet, as discussions of great importance are now subsisting between his majesty and the French government, the result of which must at present be uncertain, his majesty is induced to make this communication to his faithful commons, in the full persuasion that, whilst they partake of his majesty's earnest and unvarying solicitude for the continuance of peace, he may rely with perfect confidence on their public spirit and liberality, to enable his majesty to adopt such measures as circumstances may appear to require, for supporting the honour of his crown, and the essential interests of his people. G. R."

Ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Debate in the Commons on the King's Message respecting Military Preparations in the Ports of France and Holland.]
March 9. The House having resolved itself into a committee on the King's Message,

Mr. Chancellor Addington rose and said:—I rise, Sir, to propose an address to his majesty on the subject of his gracious message; and I feel perfectly convinced that his majesty's appeal to the wisdom and to the public spirit of this House, will not have been made in vain. There are two points to which his majesty particularly refers; the state of the military preparations now going on in the ports of France and Holland, and the important discussions now pending between the governments of the two countries. Either of these points, Sir, would separately be ground for vigilance and circumspection; conjointly, they not only require vigilance and circumspection, but they further lay the foundation for such preparations as may be sufficient to meet any emergency to which circumstances may give rise. His majesty has stated distinctly that these preparations are ostensibly for colonial purposes. This is certainly declared to be their distinct object, and I hope it will be found that it is their real purpose. But when it is recollected what important discussions are now going forward between the government of this country and France, and what an intimate connection there may be between the issue of these discussions and the preparations to which his majesty's message alludes, it is impossible to determine how far armaments ostensibly, and perhaps really, prepared for one object, might be directed to another. With respect to the discussions referred to, it will not be expected that I should particularly refer to the points which are the subjects of dispute, or say any thing of the state to which those discussions have now arrived. I have, however, great satisfaction in stating, that there is reason to hope that these disputes will be amicably settled, on terms consistent with the interest and the honour of both countries. But, Sir, if unfortunately these expectations shall be disappointed; if the hopes which are entertained of an amicable adjustment shall prove too sanguine, and the renewal of hostilities shall become the only alternative consistent with our independence and our honour, I assure the House, that every communication which can throw light on the subject, and enable the House to form an opinion of the conduct which government has thought proper to pursue, will be unreservedly produced. As to the measures to be adopted, in consequence of the message, this is not the time for me to enter into any explanation. His majesty, by bringing forward the message, expresses his desire that some augmentation should take place in our naval forces. It is also expedient that means should be taken to augment our means of internal security. With respect to the latter, our obvious policy is, to have recourse to that constitutional force, the militia. In the situation in which the country is now placed, I am confident that public men will make up their minds to the necessity of considerable privation. I beg, however, that what I have said may be clearly understood. I desire that nothing of what is stated in his majesty's message, or what I have now mentioned, shall be construed into an idea that the preparations which circumstances require have any reference to offensive operations. I wish to be distinctly understood, that the preparations which are recommended in his majesty's message solely relate to measures of defence and of precaution. On this day I am anxious that unanimity should mark our proceedings. In the address which I shall propose I am anxious to have the concurrence of gentlemen of all descriptions in this House. Whatever may be their opinions of men and measures; whatever may be their sentiments of the policy of concluding the peace, or of the nature of the terms on which it was concluded; whatever may be their ideas of the comparative advantages of continuing the war, I am convinced that the address which I shall conclude with moving, is one to which they cannot in reason object. I shall now move, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this House for his most gracious message: to assure his majesty, that his faithful Commons are fully sensible of the fresh proof which his majesty has thus afforded of his unceasing attention to the welfare of his people: that under the circumstances which his majesty has been graciously pleased to communicate, they cannot hesitate to concur with his majesty in thinking it expedient to adopt additional precautions for the security of his dominions: that though the preparations, to which his majesty refers, are avowedly directed to colonial service, yet, as discussions of great importance appear to be subsisting between his majesty and the French government, the result of which is at present uncertain, his majesty's faithful Commons, whilst they partake of his majesty's earnest and unvarying solicitude for the continuance of peace, will, with the utmost cheerfulness, support his majesty in the adoption of such measures as circumstances may appear to require, for maintaining the honour of his majesty's crown and the essential interest of his people."

Mr. Fox said:—I have no intention to oppose the motion, at least in its present form. I have only one observation to make; and that is, that no vote was ever required from the House under circumstances of more utter darkness than the present. The proposal is, that "an address be presented to his majesty, stating, that the House concur with him, that under existing circumstances additional precautions are necessary to be adopted. The right hon. gentleman then states, that he trusts no one can refuse his assent to the present motion. Certainly not; no person can deny, that after the message yesterday received additional precaution is necessary and proper. The right hon. gentleman stated, that there were two points in his majesty's message, and that each of these was a sufficient ground for involving the country in war. Little was said by the right hon. gentleman respecting the fact, that preparations are carrying on in the ports of France. On the discussions that are subsisting between the government of this country and that of France he dwelt for some time. But not the smallest hint was dropped by him respecting the subjects to which those discussions refer; whether they relate to Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, we are left totally in the dark. When his majesty states these discussions to be of the utmost importance, I, without hesitation, believe the assertion; but certainly it might reasonably be expected, that when we are called upon to afford his majesty the means of additional defence, we should be informed of the particulars that render such additional defence necessary. This address has no other meaning whatever, than that the Commons are ready to support the honour of the crown, and the essential interest of the people—most certainly they are, and it is upon this ground solely that my vote is now given in its favour, not pledging myself to support the measures that may be adopted in consequence of existing circumstances. His majesty's ministers would do well to consider seriously the tendency of their measures. If through their negligence, rashness, or ill-concerted plans, they involve their country in war at this important period, I shall pronounce the present administration to be the most fatal and destructive that ever directed the affairs of Great Britain.

Lord Hawkesbury said:—The message and the address refer to two objects the preparations going forward in the ports of France and Holland, and the discussions pending betwixt this country and France. The hon. gentleman seems to conceive, that my right hon. friend stated that either of these taken separately would have been a sufficient ground for taking the measures of precaution to which the message refers. Now, this is not exactly what my right hon. friend stated: he declared explicitly that either taken separately would have been a ground of circumspection, and that united, they required something more; that they called on ministers to advise his majesty to send a message to the House, recommending measures of additional precaution. With respect to the address I allow that it does not pledge the House, or any individual member, to the opinion which he may hereafter give on the subject of the disputed points referred to in his majesty's message; and I have no difficulty in assuring the House, that if, unfortunately, those discussions shall terminate in a renewal of war, it will then become the duty of ministers to lay before them every degree of information that can guide their judgment of the conduct of ministers during the negotiation in question. But I even go further and say, that it will then become our duty to bring before the view of the House and the country documents to explain, not merely those points which were immediately depending, but the whole of our conduct, from the conclusion of peace up to the present moment. On a deliberate review of the whole of that conduct, there is not one atom of it which I see reason to repent of.

Mr. Windham said, he agreed with Mr. Fox, that, by the measure now proposed, the House was placed in rather a hard situation: because he did not think it was sufficient to be told, that hereafter they should be put into possession of the grounds of the present procedure. He was of opinion that the House ought to have been enabled to form a judgment, when measures of so serious a nature as the present were proposed. The House at present literally knew nothing. From the period of signing the definitive treaty, now a twelvemonth ago, and though another considerable armament was called for, yet no information had been afforded. He therefore must, for one, enter his protest against the mode adopted by ministers. The force now proposed to be got in readiness was stated to be merely a defensive force. But he thought it was proper to know whether such a force as that about to be raised ought not be considered as fit to be used prudentially, either as a defensive or an offensive force? Undoubtedly, every force at first must be considered as being of a defensive nature; but what he wished to know was, whether the right hon. gentleman meant that this force was of a nature only capable of being used as a defensive force? He felt very doubtful of the propriety of ministers placing the House in the situation in which it at present found itself; at the same time that he concurred in the propriety of what had been advanced, that by the present address the House pledged itself to nothing specifically. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) had said, in the perfect spirit of all his policy for these ten or fourteen years past, that peace was his first object. Be it so. But from the present want of information the House was completely at a loss to determine whether peace or war was necessary. He hoped it would not be thought that the opposers of the peace of Amiens would be the foremost to propose the renewal of hostilities. The very reverse would be found to be the legitimate result of the principles they embraced, for in proportion as they had opposed that peace, it must be unlikely that they should wish for a renewal of the war; inasmuch as one of the grounds of their opposition to that peace was, that the terms of it would put the country out of a condition to go to war again. Therefore no person holding those opinions could contemplate a renewal of the war without serious alarm. He would not, however, indulge that feeling so far as (like the hon. gentleman, Mr. Fox) only to view the evils of war. For the tendency of that hon. gentleman's opinion, that war was an evil with which no other stood in comparison. But he apprehended this country might be brought into such a situation as to be led to perceive the danger of peace as well as of war; and that we might go on as rapidly to destruction in a time of peace as in a state of war. Under this impression he could not say that the scope and tendency of the right hon. gentleman's unqualified opinion met with his entire concurrence. He rather wished to take out the sting of his concluding observation, whilst he ventured to tell ministers, that they were not only to regard the responsibility of making war, but the responsibility also of not making a proper peace. He only begged to mark the fact, and advance the position, that ministers were equally responsible in both respects.

Mr. Sheridan said, he should have been well content to have given his silent vote of approbation, but for some expressions in the speech of the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down. The right hon. gentleman had appeared to-day in a state of unusual anxiety to deprecate the idea that he, and those who had thought and acted with him, because they had been avowedly hostile to the peace, should now be otherwise considered than as the men the most zealously disposed to maintain it. Nay, the right hon. gentleman had maintained, that those who had condemned the peace on his principles were peculiarly entitled to the credit of being the persons now most reluctant to the renewal of war. He would not pause to examine the consistency of this claim; but he called on the House to look at the argument set up this day. We that opposed the peace, said the right hon. gentleman, must be presumed to be the persons most reluctant to renew the war; because our strongest argument for condemning the peace was, that it left us no means of future hostility. But he went further; for he declared that even if our existence as a nation was the question, the peace had left us without ability to meet the contest! Was this language to hold at such a moment as the present? He had heard, indeed, that the first consul had modestly proclaimed to the vassal thrones of Europe, that England was no longer able to contend single-handed with France—but he did not expect to hear this sentiment re-echoed and acquiesced in by a member of the British parliament. Whatever were the motives of that new reluctance to war which seemed so suddenly to have seized the right hon. gentleman, his reluctance could not be more earnest and sincere than his own was. He deprecated war from every feeling of his heart, and every suggestion of his reason. He adjured ministers to try what temper, what conciliation, what even concession, without forfeiture of honour, could do; but if all these, sincerely attempted, should fail, and the dire necessity of renewing the war should be forced on us, he would not endure for a moment to be told, that the energies of the country were so exhausted that we had no course left but submission. No; he trusted, in spite of the audacious boast of the first consul, that it would be manifested to him, and even to the right hon. gentleman that there were still left spirit and resources in British hearts, not merely to protect the existence of the country, but to avenge the slightest insult upon its honour.

Mr. Canning gave his cordial support to the address. He was unwilling to suppose that ministers, in the conduct of the discussions were exposed to censure. He wished to suspend his judgment till they had an opportunity of explaining to the House the circumstances of their conduct. The House were assured, that if the discussions should terminate in hostilities, ministers would feel it their duty to explain the whole cause of the negotiation. But no assurance was given of this explanation in the event of an amicable adjustment. The House, however, had as clear a right to explanation in the one case as in the other. A refusal to give such an explanation would be a striking evidence of the want of that good understanding which ought to exist betwixt the people and the government. Alarm and anxiety were excited, and the grounds were carefully involved in obscurity. He should, however, support the motion, putting in his claim to demand a full and satisfactory explanation.

Mr. Grenville defended Mr. Windham, from the perverted comment, which had been made upon his speech this evening. He supported the address, but, at the same time, thought the effect of it was much weakened, by its not touching the political opinions of any member of that House, or pledging them to any specific measure.

The Attorney-General defended the line of conduct, which ministers had taken, from the objections which had been made in the course of the debate.

Dr. Laurence expressed himself friendly to peace, but if, upon due information, war was necessary, he should cheerfully vote the supplies for conducting it with energy.

The address was agreed to nem. con.

Debate in the Lords on the King's Message respecting Military Preparations in the Ports of France.] March 9. The order of the day for taking his Majesty's Message into consideration, being read,

Lord Hobart rose to move an address to his majesty on the occasion. He thought there could not be a difference of opinion, when his majesty had communicated to them, that great military preparations were actually making on the coasts of France and Holland; and that important discussions were pending between him and the French government; the result of which was very uncertain. It was the earnest wish of ministers, that the tranquillity which subsisted between the two countries, should not be interrupted: and he relied upon it, that the country would enable them to preserve it, consistently with the honour and interest of the nation. He then moved an address, which was nearly a recapitulation of the message.

Earl Spencer rose, not to oppose the address, as he had been always a friend to vigorous measures: He rejoiced to find, that ministers were at length sensible, they had gone the full length of concession and negotiation: that they were now determined to act a manly part. There was no other chance of saving the country but by showing the first consul, that we are not afraid of meeting France single handed, and that rather than suffer the smallest particle of the national honour to be tarnished, we were ready to re-commence hostilities. He should wish however to know, whether the discussions alluded to in his majesty's message, were new or of a long standing?

Lord Grenville said, he perfectly agreed in opinion with the last noble lord. He rejoiced at this first instance of sound political wisdom in his majesty's present ministers: they had seen the consequences of a system concession and meanness; and he hoped they would act with due energy and perseverance in that now proposed. The reasonings of this day, were warranted by the experience of the last eighteen months, and he therefore cordially assented to the motion.

The Earl of Moira delivered a very animated speech in support of the address. He wished, however, to be satisfied, that sufficient cause existed for this appearance of energy; this sudden change in the conduct of his majesty's ministers. He hoped it was not a mere bravado, intended to cover some farther concession. The communication which had been made, had created a very general alarm, and materially affected those who had property in the funds. He hoped ministers would be able to show at a future day, that they had not done this unnecessarily. He wished ministers would speak out, and not be afraid of offending the first consul of France: as for his part, he had no notion of talking longer with compliment towards this new Hannibal; who had sworn on the altars of his ambition, deadly and eternal hatred to the interests and prosperity of this country. If we would consult our most immediate interests, and uphold our national character; we must show that man that we are not to be intimidated, by the menace of consequences. We must, in the language of our immortal bard,

"Be stirring as the time, be fire with fire;

"Threaten the threatener, and out-face the brow

"Of bragging horror!"

We must boldly look our danger in the face; and be prepared to meet it in its worst form.—No man could more sincerely wish for peace than himself; no man regretted war more as a great calamity; but constantly to submit to the domineering arrogance of an implacable rival, is positive ruin, to which war in its worst shape was preferable. He considered that an uniform, consistent, manly tone, might prevent war, by throwing all the blame upon the transgressor; and there was no man, however great his power, that was independent of public opinion; and above all, of the opinion of the people he governed. Whoever considered the history of the man who now governed France, would not consider attempts impracticable, because they are difficult. We should prepare our minds for an attempt upon this country. If it could only produce mischief and confusion, the person at the head of France, is the man who would coolly calculate upon the total destruction of an army, to accomplish a mighty mischief. But when he said that England was not able, single handed to contend with France, where did he get his information? Was it from the noble lords near him, whom he was proud to call his friends? (lords Nelson and Hutchinson) or at what period of our history was it, that he discovered England was not able to grapple with France? Should the enemy land, they would undoubtedly push for the capital; and certainly a pitched battle would be fought, which should end in the destruction of one army or the other, before he should be permitted to reach it. He concluded by exhorting ministers, in a very forcible manner, to make a common cause with the people, in the defence of their common country.

Lord Auckland said, it was a matter of serious inquiry whether this great measure had been advisedly taken. After the most deliberate investigation of every circumstance that had come to his knowledge, he was free to declare, that the present measure was likely to produce the blessings of a secure peace. He never had beheld the peace of Amiens in a sanguine point of view. He saw the whole line of coast in the hands of the French, from Italy to the Elbe, with the single exception of the rock of Gibraltar; and from the first moment of the conclusion of that treaty, he had seen no sign of the French government being disposed to tread in the paths of peace. This had been his view of the peace from the beginning; and he owned he was in dread that, with the projects of the most unbounded ambition in their hearts, the French might have succeeded in lulling Europe into a fatal security, and that they would not have been roused to a sense of their danger until France had matured her plans, and consolidated her means of carrying them into effect. Providentially this had not been the case. An early exposure of their designs had seasonably alarmed this country, who could not be inattentive to the arts by which the French disorganised all the states of Europe. He was sure he need not expatiate on the policy of this regard to neighbouring states. He never could admit that our interference in the affairs of Europe was an unwise policy for England. On the contrary, it was our duty to interfere whenever we could do it with effect. Ever since the treaty of Amiens the French government had shown a disposition to under-rate our resources, to agitate the public mind in England, to affect our credit, and to misrepresent our condition. He wished to declare to France, and to the world at large, that if we were forced to the renewal of hostilities, we possessed the means, both of offensive and defensive operations. We had at this time the appropriation of 17,000,000*l.* a year of an actual and efficient revenue, over and above the sum applied for the discharge of the interest of the national debt. Our revenue would very soon amount to 34,000,000*l.* sterling. When the French learnt these facts, they would not only respect our inexhaustible sources, but hesitate before they provoked us to warfare.

The motion was agreed to nem. diss.

“GEORGE R.

“In consequence of the preparations carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, whilst important discussions are subsisting between his Majesty and the French government, his majesty thinks it due to the care and concern which he feels for his faithful people, to omit no means in his power which may contribute to their security.

“In pursuance, therefore, of the acts of parliament enabling his majesty to call out and assemble the militia of the United Kingdom, his majesty has thought it right to make this communication to the House of Commons, to the end that his majesty may cause the said militia, or such part thereof as his majesty shall think necessary, to be forthwith drawn out and embodied, and to march as occasion shall require. G. R.”

Debate in the Commons on Voting an Additional Number of Seamen.] March 11. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Mr. Garthshore moved, “That an additional number of 10,000 men be employed for the sea-service, for eleven lunar months, to commence from the 26th Feb. 1803, including 3,400 marines.”

Mr. Francis rose and said:—I have no doubt, Sir, that the vote for an immediate augmentation to the navy will pass, as it ought to do, with perfect unanimity. I not only concur in it heartily, but, if a greater force had been proposed, I should not have thought it liable to objection. But, before we come to that conclusion, there are many important considerations which demand the attention of the House. On some of these points I wish to submit my thoughts to the House, declaring only, that they are not hastily adopted, that they are founded in sober reflection, as much as I am capable of giving to any subject, and that, in delivering them now, I act upon the strongest conviction. When the address in reply to his majesty's message was moved, I, for one, should have been better satisfied if it had been voted at once, as it were by acclamation, without debate or conversation of any kind. For, though the little that was said, was not at all in the way of opposition, and was thoroughly understood among ourselves, I know to what misconstruction it may be liable abroad, particularly in France. I say this the rather because the short debate that did occur produced no effect, and answered no purpose. They, who expected explanations from ministers, got none, and went out of the House no better informed than when they came into it. On that day there was no subject for deliberation. It was not, it could not be a question, what sort of answer we should return to such a communication from the throne. Neither this House collectively, nor any individual in it, need be told by ministers, that that which is our essential interest, is also our greatest duty, to unite with his majesty against any hostile aggression whatsoever, in defence of the safety of the country, in which our own is included. We do not want any pompous ministerial phrases about loyalty, and attachment, and unanimity, and such like, to make us sensible of our duties, or to animate us to perform them. The emergency itself, without any other consideration, is full enough to engage every heart and hand in the nation to join in its defence. The cause is common to every man in Britain. It is necessity as well as duty. In fact we have no choice. The part of this duty which relates to his majesty has been performed. We have promised him our cordial support; and here I think we ought to pause and consider well, how far it may be proper for this House to permit ministers to include themselves, as undoubtedly they will if they can, in that promise, and to what degree their conduct entitles them to a share in it. On this day the House returns to its deliberative capacity, one of the first objects of which should be, to weigh well what is past, in order to judge well of what is to come, the state we are in, from what causes, and by whose mismanagement. They who stand in the situation that I do, with respect to the present ministers, I think have a right, rather more than others, to try their conduct by its effects, and to see whether, on a fair view of the result of their administration, they have a just and rational claim to our future support. Out of this House I have given them all the assistance, little as it is, that such an opinion as mine could carry with it. In this House they have had my concurrence and vote in the measures they have recommended for precaution and security. The question now is, whether the confidence, so far reposed in them, ought or ought not to be continued. To them personally I have no sort of objection. For some among them I have great personal regard; to none of them the smallest sentiment of ill will. I am not their competitor; it is not possible I should be their enemy. But this is no time for compliments. Considering the state in which the country stands at this moment, and which, in the first instance, I must impute to those who have had the management of its affairs, these gentlemen appear before this House and their country, I will not say as criminals, but as men in the highest degree accountable for their conduct. This is not the language of reproach or offence. It is strictly parliamentary, and I have a right to hold it in this place.—I shall now state, as shortly and distinctly as I can, the grounds of my first opinion, and why I have changed it.

When the preliminaries were signed, and long before the articles were made public, I joined sincerely in the universal exultation which prevailed through the country, with very few exceptions, on that event. I was grateful for it, because it was a deliverance from the war. The country rejoiced at the peace, because it was peace, or they thought it so. I gave the ministers full trust that, in settling the definitive treaty, they would take care that, whatever the conditions might be, the peace itself would be real and secure. When the terms were known, considerable objections were made to them, and certainly not without reason. Still, Sir, I felt no disposition to canvass or object to the terms, considering them always as an equivalent yielded for the sake of obtaining with certainty in return a most important and most desirable object.—On this point I wish to state an opinion, which I have not taken up without due consideration. It leads to the same conclusion, and unites with other motives for not censuring or even examining the terms of a treaty of peace, except for some collateral purposes, which I shall presently mention. As long as it is in fact received and acknowledged as an established principle of the constitution, the truth of which I do not now mean to assert or deny, that the right of making treaties of peace is vested solely and exclusively in the crown, there can be no right in this House or any where else to try or to pass judgment on the merits of the terms, I mean always as a compact agreed upon with a foreign party. Factum valet. You have resigned all authority, you have abandoned all jurisdiction over that question to the executive power. In these transactions, the king is representative and agent of the nation, fully authorized to treat and conclude without appeal to any other tribunal. You cannot alter an iota in the articles agreed on, and therefore, if you had the right in question, it would be in vain to make use of it. In some other senses, undoubtedly, it is the right and the duty of parliament to examine the conduct of ministers in these transactions, and to call them to account, if the case should appear to require it. If you have reason to suspect treachery, you have a right to inquire for the purpose of punishing. If you suppose incapacity, you have a right to inquire for the purpose of removal. On your own principles you have no other. By the definitive treaty at Amiens, it did certainly appear, that great concessions and sacrifices had been made to France and her allies; but these I still considered as a price paid in one way for value received in another, and though the purchase might be dear, still the thing we bought was worth paying for even at that high rate. Well, Sir, when we had made all the concessions, when we had submitted to all the sacrifices, and paid the full price of a solid and secure peace, and much more than the full price as some persons think, have we obtained it? Is that the fact? No, Sir, the contrary is self evident. It appears now that all that his majesty's ministers have gained by their treaty, has been a hollow truce, a short cessation of arms, and war to be resumed at a greater expense and under greater disadvantages than if it had not been discontinued. They have parted with the pledges that were in their hands, and they have taken no security from the enemy. What explanations they may give hereafter, or whether they ever will give any, we know not. At present, the whole transaction on the face of it exhibits no proof of wisdom or ability. Then comes the question to the mind of every thinking man, in a prudential view; and without looking to direct crimination, is it rational, is it safe to commit the conduct of the war to the same persons, who have so poorly and lamely managed the transaction of the peace? Even in a pacific negotiation, it is no inconsiderable disadvantage, if they, who negotiate for you, are personally undervalued by the opposite party. Sir, we know not to what issue the present circumstances may lead us. I am far from thinking that England is not equal to a contest with France, especially in a cause which must and will unite all men. Availing ourselves wisely of our natural defences, and of the weapons that peculiarly belong to us, I am convinced we are more than equal to the task. Still, however, our situation is serious, and not at all fit to be trusted to weak councils or feeble hands. Within these few days, we have seen enough to judge of the further effects which a declared war will immediately produce. The sudden fall of public credit, with all its consequences to the general property, the repose and happiness of the country, is no light matter. As these effects continue to operate, they grow and increase until at last they cannot be endured, especially by a people who have so much reason to think that their affairs have been palpably mismanaged. There is one consideration more, which indeed deserves the attention of the House, as much as any other. With that I shall conclude, and leave it to the reflections of men of greater authority and knowledge, than I can pretend to, to weigh the consequence. The country is surrounded with difficulties, exposed to distresses, and possibly approaching to a contest for its existence. In this awful situation, whether I advert to some who are present, or to others who are absent, the melancholy and astonishing fact is, that out of the councils and government of the country, at such a moment as this, all the eminent abilities of England are excluded. In fair weather, a moderate share of skill may be sufficient. For the storm, that seems to be coming, other pilots should be provided. If the ship sinks, we must all go down with it. In so great a common danger, I cannot trust to the conduct of imprudence, proved by experiment, merely because imprudence is not criminal.

Mr. Chancellor Addington:—Sir, the hon. gentleman professes a desire that nothing which fell from him might be considered as designed to disturb the unanimity which prevailed when this subject was formerly before the House. Now, Sir, I ask, if prudential reasons existed which rendered any explanation inexpedient on a former evening, whether, acting on the same principle, his majesty's ministers ought now to give that explanation? The hon. gentleman has said, that at a crisis when we may be called upon to contend for our very existence as a nation, it is a matter of deep regret that the whole ability of the country is excluded from his majesty's government. I will readily allow for myself, and I believe I may make the same avowal for my colleagues, that we feel in their utmost extent the arduous duties which we are called upon to perform, and are sensible of the responsibility that we owe to the country. This, Sir, may be a very fair subject of observation to the hon. gentleman; but, on what principle is it that this gentleman, who tells the House distinctly, that a ministry enjoyed his confidence from which the whole ability of the country is excluded, should now bring forward against them the charge of weakness and incapacity? I leave the hon. gentleman to explain the reasons for withdrawing the confidence which he formerly reposed.—The hon. member has accurately laid down the principles by which the declaration of peace or war is regulated. This declaration is wisely made to rest with the chief magistrate. If, however, a peace inconsistent with national honour and safety is concluded, I admit, that his majesty's confidential servants are deeply responsible for the advice which they have given to their sovereign. The hon. gentleman has applied the general doctrine to the present situation of the country; and has argued, that if by the misconduct of ministers the country has been brought into its present perilous situation, they are responsible for this situation. To this sentiment I explicitly assent.—But, Sir, I aver that no advice has been given respecting the discussions now depending betwixt the two governments, which was not founded in the true spirit of peace. It was solely with the view to the continuance of peace that additional preparations have been recommended. I do not mean to dispute the ultimate right of the House to a full and fair explanation on this subject. I contend, however, that it has not a constitutional right to demand explanation at a moment when explanation would essentially injure the advantages which government might derive from existing discussions.

Mr. Dent said, he had heard various reports as to what was the cause of these discussions and armaments. But whether the object was Malta, or Egypt, he did not wish to pry into objects which ministers had thought fit not to disclose. He thought them entitled to his confidence, and gave it accordingly. There was one point, however, which he could not help lamenting; which was, that we had now come to the eve of war, when we had given up almost every conquest; and had returned several thousands of seamen to France. In the fullest conviction of the propriety of the measure, he should move "That instead of 10,000 seamen and marines, 25,000 be inserted in the vote now upon the table."

Mr. Fox said:—I cannot help feeling some degree of surprise at the language which my hon. friend who began the discussion, and the chancellor of the exchequer have used respecting the conversation which took place on the motion for the address. I myself began that discussion; but I do not feel that I was guilty of bringing out a single sentiment which could produce a feeling of animosity in France, in this country, or in any other part of Europe. My hon. friend is unwilling to negative the present motion, though he is desirous of an explanation of the grounds on which it is proposed; and the right hon. gentleman is surprised that this explanation is demanded, when my hon. friend expresses his readiness to vote for even a much larger number of seamen, if such a number were necessary to the public service. I am, Sir, as ready as any member to vote for the proposed addition of seamen, on the principle that they are necessary for the public service; but I have at present no better ground for my vote than if 25,000, 100,000, or any other number had been proposed. My objection rests on this plain, constitutional ground, that as representatives of the people, in the proper discharge of our duty, we have a right to have the causes of these increased preparations explained, and not be called upon to vote on the unlimited confidence which we choose to repose for a time in ministers. I have always understood, that the prerogative of the crown to conclude a peace was clear and undisputed; and I agree with my hon. friend, that those who have counselled his majesty to conclude any peace are responsible for the terms of that peace. I cannot however allow, that after the peace has been concluded, and after its terms have been canvassed and approved, if circumstances occur which render the continuance of peace impossible, ministers are to be necessarily accused of having, by their conduct, produced these circumstances. With respect to his majesty's right of declaring war, there is as little doubt in theory; but in practice a very important distinction exists. In this declaration might be involved every principle of a free constitution, every thing connected with the property, nay, the very existence of the subject. The sovereign might be ill-advised, and experience has proved that this is not merely a possible case. The country might be plunged into a war, of which it would be impossible to see either the equity or the necessity. It might be continued against the will of the parliament or the people, and the whole, or part of every man's property might be wrested from him, if in practice this prerogative of the crown were carried to all the extent which theory supposed. But, Sir, such a construction of the prerogative strikes every one in a moment as monstrous; and while in theory we admit the power of the sovereign to declare war, in practice and in substance we possess the privilege by which alone that declaration can be carried into effect. This privilege is founded in the means that we possess of giving or withholding the necessary supplies. This has an operation to the prevention of war to a considerable degree, though it is only the privilege of the purse which we enjoy. This House must therefore be necessarily parties to every war. How, is this to be done? Why, Sir, the mode of our becoming parties is simple. His majesty in all cases states to us the grounds on which he has thought a declaration of war necessary; and he calls upon us to grant the supplies necessary for the prosecution of the contest. We all know, that instances are not wanting in which the sovereign has been compelled to relinquish a war, because parliament, convinced of its injustice and ruinous effects, no longer afforded the supplies. I will not here determine how far the American war was put an end to by the voice of parliament; but there is one striking instance in which a war was put an end to by the exercise of this constitutional power, and that was, the instance in which the parliament of Charles 2nd, compelled that prince to relinquish the Dutch war. Now, Sir, how does the case stand at present? and here I will rest my argument. We know, that in practice, armaments precede any official communication from the throne, or any vote of supply; and I trust that, if danger really exists, armaments are now going on with a rapidity correspondent to the emergency on which they are founded. The certain effect of the vote is only to make us direct parties to any war to which these armaments may be applied. What I object to, then, is simply, that I have heard no grounds stated to justify any extraordinary preparation; and therefore I must, on constitutional principles, enter my protest against the mode of proceeding which has been adopted. The case of the Russian armament is one in which many persons were desirous to pursue a course similar to that now proposed to be adopted; but I do not think that, when the consequences of that armament are considered, the proceeding then adopted will be very likely to encourage imitation. I hope, Sir, I may be allowed to reason hypothetically respecting the independence of parliament in granting supplies for carrying on any war. I trust that we are not necessarily to be constantly guided by a spirit of humble docility, though our independence may appear more clearly in theory, than in any cases of modern or recent experience. In whatever we choose to exercise our constitutional right, the possibility of its exercise will not be disputed. Possibly we might think that negotiation was preferable at a moment when ministers had plunged the country in war; or, on the other hand, we might suppose, that measures of a more vigorous description would have done much more for the national honour than any negotiation; and how is our opinion to be expressed, except in withholding the supplies, before we bind ourselves to become parties to a war? I therefore, Sir, for one, contend against the House of Commons being a mere echo, a mere docile receiver of whatever communication ministers may think proper to make under the form of a message from the throne. I do not wish to flatter ministers, when I say I believe that the preparations which have been recommended are founded on a firm and honest conviction of their expediency. I will not suppose that they would willingly, and without reference to any one object of advantage, take such steps, if they did not imagine that they were essential to the interests of the country. Their interests, as well as their character, equally forbid me to suppose, that in this instance they are deceiving the House or the public. This I have no difficulty in stating generally, though I must add, that instances of the guilt, to which I have now alluded, are not entirely unknown. But let gentlemen recollect, that, with the best intentions in the world, ministers are liable to error; and that what they conceive to be wise and politic, might, if explained, appear unwise and inexpedient. This I must only say, that we are totally without all means of forming any judgment. In the message of his majesty, or in the speech of the right hon. gentleman, there is not a single word stated by which I can venture to form any opinion of the points in dispute.—A good deal has been said, with the view of showing, that if a rupture should take place, it would be only the natural result of the treaty of Amiens. Now, Sir, I am one of those who hold a very different opinion; and without hesitation I say, that if war does now take place, there is no necessity for supposing that it has the slightest connexion with that treaty, or that that was a treaty not fit to be concluded. I thought, and I have seen no reason to alter my opinion, that the treaty of Amiens was an eligible treaty; not eligible compared with other treaties, which under other circumstances might have been formed, but eligible as freeing the country from a most destructive war. Are we to be told, Sir, that ministers dare to make no peace, because the unreasonable ambition of France may now drive us to the renewal of hostilities? Are we to be told, that we were to wage warfare till we had obtained a satisfactory assurance, on the part of the enemy, of a sincere desire to cultivate all the blessings of tranquillity in the true spirit of peace? No reasonable man will, I believe, hold so extraordinary an opinion. It may be further urged against ministers, that since the conclusion of peace, they have acted too much in the spirit of concession. How far this charge is true, I have no means of determining, though there appears no reason to conclude that their disposition to conciliation has gone beyond a commendable desire to preserve the peace. If they have been guilty of such concession as has in the smallest degree compromised the honour or safety of the country, unquestionably their conduct has been highly criminal; but this is no consequence of their having concluded the treaty of Amiens. But, Sir, perhaps we are to be told, that it was impolitic to make peace till we had a vigorous administration to support it. I certainly do not think that want of vigour in an administration is a sufficient reason for not entering into a war, if a legitimate cause of war exists. As an objection to the conclusion of peace, it is one of the most ridiculous and inconclusive that ever was brought forward. If ministers have conceded too much, or done too little, for the support of the honour of the country, they have incurred a very grave responsibility; but let not this be laid to the charge of the treaty of Amiens. If I am fond of that treaty, it is because it was the means of ridding us of incumbrances of the most oppressive kind. Not that it freed us from connection with allies (for allies we had none at the time it was concluded); but that it delivered us from the detestable and abominable principles on which the late war was conducted. I do sincerely hope, Sir, that we shall hear nothing more of wars undertaken for religion and social order. I speak not disrespectfully of religion, or of the blessings of social order: but I speak of that detestable hypocrisy which held forth these as the ostensible objects of contest, while we were all along fighting for ends of a nature totally opposite. I believe that such hypocrisy is for ever destroyed; and I trust, that as long as a detestation of such base and infamous deception shall be reprobated among men, such attempts to impose on a generous people must be held in eternal execration. If, unfortunately, we are to be doomed to a renewal of hostilities, I hope that the object of the war will be clearly and distinctly understood. What are the subjects which may eventually lead to such an unfortunate result, I profess to be totally ignorant. Whether they refer to the possession of Malta, the evacuation of Alexandria, or whatever other point of discussion they involve, I have no means of forming an opinion. I shall just say generally, that if our national rights are involved, if attempts have been made to lower that rank which we have been accustomed to hold among the states of Europe, and if all attempts at amicable adjustment have failed, then I have no difficulty in saying, that a war undertaken under such circumstances would be just. Of the necessity and policy of such a war no man can for a moment doubt. But, sir, I know it is said, that it is necessary to hold out to the people some ostensible object of war beyond what is the real object of contest—without this sort of language the national enthusiasm cannot be animated. This I hold to be a very false and pernicious doctrine. If a war be really necessary, I am convinced that no measure of this sort need be resorted to, to animate the national spirit. False pretensions and high-sounding words do not appear to me to be likely to animate the energies of a people. Nothing so much dispirits a people called upon to make great exertions, as ignorance of the precise object of contest; and this ignorance was one of the leading causes of the evils which the late calamitous contest entailed on the country. After the experience of those calamities, no one would surely wish to go to war for a light object. On this point I shall speak in very plain terms. If war be unavoidable for great national objects, then I am convinced it will be sustained with a corresponding national energy. But, at all events, let that object be fairly and fully defined: do not let us again involve the country in the same calamities which the want of a specific object has already made us so severely experience. The right hon. gentleman has said a great deal of the responsibility which attaches to ministers from their present conduct, and in this I fully agree with him. He has said something of the reproach which he may have to encounter for too great liberality of concession. On this point allow me just to express my confidence, that he will never be induced, by any fear of reproach, to abandon a system of conciliation, so long as it is consistent with honour, and promises to lead to an amicable result. I shall not readily be accused of endeavouring to influence ministers to go to the opposite extreme. But while I am the advocate of conciliation I shall never be the apologist of dishonour. My hon. friend has spoken of the present government as excluding the whole ability of the kingdom. On this point I wish not at present to enter. But I may be just permitted to say, that in the prospect of war, with such a man as earl St. Vincent at the head of the Admiralty, there would be little reason to dread the want of suitable preparation; and the signal naval triumphs of the late war afford us the best grounds to hope for future success. Of the merits of our land forces, no man thinks more highly than I do. I believe that we have officers equal in skill and in courage to any officers in Europe. Of our troops, my opinion is not less favourable. I am convinced, that in any contest in which they might be called upon to engage, they would be found fully to support the character which they have so long maintained. Of what, then, should I be afraid in the event of the renewal of war? Of subjugation to France! the idea cannot, for a moment, be indulged. When, however, I consider the many vulnerable points in our situation, when I take a view of the whole state of the empire, when I look even to our financial resources, though in some points of view their appearance is flourishing; when I take all these things into consideration, I cannot but consider the renewal of war as a most grievous calamity. Though for years we should on every occasion be successful—though every expedition should be crowned with glory, still, prolongation even of a successful contest could not but be infinitely calamitous.

Mr. Barroughs, in a maiden speech, said:—Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us, that without a disclosure of the objects and state of the discussions now depending with France, he will not be a party to the resolution before us. The drift of his speech has been, to complain of being left in the dark as to the objects and state of the discussions, and to press ministers for a disclosure of them. The conclusion of treaties, he has admitted to be exclusively within the province of the executive power, and surely it must be obvious, that we should encroach on that province, if we were to call for a disclosure while negotiations are depending. The hon. gentleman tells us, that we are bound to withhold supplies for carrying on war, until we know the grounds and causes of the rupture. But though I concur in that position, I beg leave to remind the committee that we are not at war. We are engaged in discussions which may end in war or may end in peace; and it is to me matter of much consolation that the present proposition of voting 10,000 seamen, is so limited, as to show that it is really for the cautionary purpose stated by the king's message. Can any man, acquainted with the perfidy of the French government, deny the necessity of such a precaution? We did not begin the armament. The French began, and we should be most imprudent to delay following their example. I shall therefore give my support to the resolution.

Lord Hawkesbury said:—Sir, I chiefly rise shortly to observe on the doctrine which the hon. gentleman opposite me (Mr. Fox) has endeavoured to inculcate. I perfectly acquiesce with him on the general constitutional principle on which he seemed disposed to ground his observations; and differ with him only respecting the application which he has made of it. No doubt there is a wide difference between the prerogative of the crown, when it is exercised in negotiating and concluding peace, and when it is exerted in preparations for and a declaration of war. In opening negotiations for peace, and in concluding them, the exercise of the prerogative is unlimited; though it be competent afterwards for parliament to canvass the nature of the conditions upon which peace has been concluded, and to impeach ministers, and propose their removal from office, if the terms of the treaty betray incapacity on their part. But as the question of war involves a much greater magnitude of difficulties and dangers, so should the House be placed (and in reality it so stands) in a very different posture respecting that momentous question. Most undoubtedly, the hon. gentleman is perfectly justified in asserting that the prerogative of this House in granting or withholding the supplies should be held as sacred as that of his majesty in declaring war; and though the House may not possess a negative on the act of declaring war, yet it most certainly can exert a practical negative on the continuance or the termination of a war, by granting or withholding the supplies necessary to its prosecution. This privilege of the House grows out of the nature of the constitution, and I hold it, with the hon. gentleman, as highly essential to the interests and rights of the nation.—As to the degree of information which, on points like the present, the House is entitled to call on ministers for, I must now offer a few observations. In cases like the present, where the objects in view are not brought to a conclusion, and where measures, simply of precaution, are proposed, ministers may think it their duty not to afford more than what may justify the measure they bring forward. After the circumstances which called for that measure are brought to issue, then, if the degree of information that has been afforded to the House appear insufficient, it is in the power of the House to move an address to his majesty, for the production of more satisfactory information.—The case of war is no doubt, a case which primâ facie would justify parliament in calling for all possible information. It is the serious duty of parliament to inquire into the grounds and causes of war, and cautiously to examine whether they be necessary and just. But in a case of peace, although the terms of that peace might not be looked upon as satisfactory, yet the same degree of information respecting the mode in which it was negotiated should not be insisted upon. Besides, Sir, the two cases differ materially from each other. The inconveniences that may attend the one, are much greater than what might ensue from the other. In the case of war, those inconveniences are comparatively small; but, in that of peace, after all differences and bickerings were amicably adjusted and composed, how serious might be the inconveniences that would result from exposing to parliament all the irritating circumstances that may have attended the progress of a negotiation, while no one adequate advantage could be expected from an un-called-for revealing of them? Neither, Sir, am I here going so far as to say, that, if peace should be the result, no information should be afforded respecting such an event. I merely contend, that such disclosures should be allowed much to depend on circumstances, much on the nature of the arrangement concluded, and much on the prudence of ministers, respecting what might be proper for them to disclose. These few observations, I imagine, were called for upon the general principle, and the nature of the doctrine which the hon. gentleman has laid down. The House, I trust, will now indulge me in a remark or two upon the application of it; but first I must beg leave to advert to an expression which dropt from the hon. gentleman. The expression I allude to, Sir, is, that in which the hon. gentleman seemed to insinuate, that by the vote given on the question now before the House, the House would be committed to approve a war. I here again am ready to repeat, that the House should not give its countenance to any war, unless it were in complete possession of the grounds on which that war was to be entered on, and thereby be enabled to judge whether it was just and necessary, or otherwise. But neither by the vote of this night, nor by that given on a former night on the question of the address, was the House by any means committed to support a war. Ministers called merely for the means of taking such precautions as prudence might suggest, while negotiations were subsisting, and while preparations were making on the part of one of the powers which, on a contrary issue to that which was earnestly looked for, might be converted into means of hostile aggression. The same information was therefore not to be expected in the case of an armament, proposed under such circumstances, as if it was definitively intended for the resumption of hostilities. The hon. gentleman, in alluding to the Russian armament, seemed inclined to assimilate it to the present case; but the comparison I do not think very just. That was a question upon which a great difference of opinion prevailed, and the hon. gentleman's own reasoning upon it did not well apply to the present measure. Could a war between Russia and Turkey, immediately affect our security? or rather, was not that armament intended to maintain the political balance of power?—If that armament had no other object in view than the maintenance of the balance of power, and was embarked in for political reasons only, then perhaps I might say, let us have no war with Russia for such reasons. There have, however, been times and circumstances, when a mere armament in the ports of a rival power, in the port of Brest for example, though there appeared no adequate reason to suppose it to be intended for hostile purposes, yet I conceive it should induce government to arm; and how could such an armament be prepared without a message from his majesty, such as has been brought down upon the present occasion? If then, in such a case, an armament is judged advisable, how much more expedient, or rather necessary, must it be to adopt a similar precaution, when not only a large armament is fitting out in the ports of a rival nation, but even while to that circumstance is added a pending negotiation of considerable importance? For even, although that armament should really be intended for its avowed purposes, yet if the negotiation ended in a rupture, would the House hesitate to vote the number of seamen now proposed, even as a measure of mere precaution? In that light alone it should now be viewed; nor would the vote of this night pledge parliament to any thing farther. The subject would still be open to inquiry and discussion when farther communications should be received respecting the progress or issue of the negotiation. Now, Sir, let me assure gentlemen, that ministers do not pretend to call for any greater degree of confidence than what the spirit of the constitution usually grants to persons in their situation: a degree of confidence which is generally afforded to government, to whatever hands it may be entrusted; and no greater degree of confidence has any minister a right to demand than what is founded on the opinion parliament entertains of their principles and conduct. As to the proposed amendment, I do not well see how the House can adopt it. It was usual for the House to agree to the number of men proposed to be voted; but there were few instances in which a greater number was proposed. If the present question was agreed to, our naval force would consist of 60,000 men; and if it should hereafter appear that a larger number was necessary, there would be no difficulty in increasing it.

Mr. Elliot said, he was always willing to give every support in his power towards the defence of the country, whenever its necessities appeared to demand it; but he must complain of the sort of systematic darkness in which ministers wished to keep that House. In former times, the custom constantly prevailed, whenever such a vote was submitted, to afford the most satisfactory information as to the nature of the case; that they might judge whether it was such as required the vote proposed. Ever since the treaty of Amiens had been concluded, that House had not been put in possession of any information as to the exterior relations of the country. It was extremely improper to go on, session after session, without such information as we had formerly been accustomed to receive when votes of men and money were demanded. However, considering himself pledged only to a measure of precaution, he should give his vote for the motion.

Mr. Canning said:—Sir, I have no thoughts of pursuing the discussion of the constitutional doctrine, respecting information and confidence which has been carried to such a length between the hon. gentleman opposite to me (Mr. Fox) and my noble friend. I have sufficiently declared my opinion upon this subject, by the question which I took the liberty of putting to ministers on a former night, and to which I received an answer not very mildly worded, nor such, perhaps, as, under all circumstances, a minister was very well warranted in giving. No matter. That answer, such as it was, completely satisfied my purpose in asking the question. My purpose was, to ascertain, whether, in the event of the present armament not leading to war, any ground for it would be laid before parliament, any account of the reasons which had led to it, or of the purposes which it had answered. Nor was this an inquiry of idle curiosity. The answer to it was, in fact, to influence not indeed my vote, but the manner in which I should give it, the reasons and qualifications with which I should accompany it. If I had been told, that in case of either result, whether of war or of accommodation, ministers would at the proper time, lay before parliament, all the information requisite for enabling them to form a judgment upon the propriety and policy of the present extraordinary preparation and alarm, I should have felt completely satisfied in concurring silently in the vote of this night, as well as that upon the address, knowing that the question of "whether rightly called for, or not, by the executive government," would come in a natural course to be matter of discussion. I would not in that case have encumbered my vote with any statement of my view of its extent or meaning. But ministers having called for a vote of this sort without any statement of the grounds of it, or the promise of any such statement except in one alternative,—that of war, I have an additional duty to perform; I must, from the best observation that I can make, form my own opinion of the necessity of the measure which is proposed, and of the results to which it ought to lead; and as ministers will not tell me the grounds on which they ask my vote, I feel it the more incumbent on me to make myself understood as to the grounds on which I give it to them.—The advantage of the course which ministers have preferred is not so obvious to my mind, as it seems to be to that of some other gentlemen. It secures unanimity to be sure; for that which pledges no man to any thing, may very naturally obtain a pretty general concurrence. But I doubt whether the same latitude of interpretation, which embraces all opinions in one vote, does not weaken in a proportionable degree its force as well as its precision. The hon. gentleman opposite to me, for instance, considers his vote of this night as pledging him absolutely to nothing—nothing but that 10,000 seamen shall be raised; but as to what is to follow the raising them; nay, if the mere fact of raising them, if this armament itself (no impossible supposition) should be the cause of hostile discussion with France, and ultimately of war, he does not consider himself as pledged in the smallest degree; he does not engage to countenance ministers in that discussion, or to support them in the prosecution of that war.—My noble friend has told us, and truly, that in all times the single fact of the fitting out of armaments in the ports of a neighbouring and rival power, would have been held to justify a similar armament here. Undoubtedly it would; undoubtedly too the fact of the armament abroad must be taken in this, as in former instances, on the king's word, on the faith of the message which ministers have advised his majesty to send down. But here the question with me is, not, would this be a sufficient reason? but, is this the reason? If the message had said no more; if my noble friend would tell us plainly (which, however, consistently with the message it is impossible for him to do), "this is all—the French are arming, therefore it behoves us to arm too," I should not have a moment's hesitation in voting any number of seamen that ministers might propose, or in concurring in any other vote for enabling them to meet, and defeat, the possible designs of the enemy.—I should give my vote without a word of explanation; and should perfectly understand the vote that I was giving.—But that this is not a true statement, that it is not the whole truth of the present case, is manifest, as well from the message itself, as from a comparison of the conduct of ministers on this occasion, with what it has been at former, not very distant periods, when armaments to a much greater extent were carrying on in the ports of France. I allude to the first expedition to the West Indies last year, between the signing of the preliminaries and the definitive treaty;—when so far from expressing any jealousy, so far from putting parliament and the country upon their guard, so far from sending down a message to call for increased preparation, and to excite the idea of an approaching renewal of the war ministers professed themselves perfectly at ease; and those persons in this House who ventured to intimate a suspicion, that such an armament, at so delicate a moment when the peace was yet raw and unsettled, might possibly be intended for other objects than those which were given out, such persons, I say, were vehemently reprehended and rebuked by ministers and their admirers in this House, as entertaining unwarrantable jealousies, as creating ill blood between new friends, as aspersing the character of the first consul of France and ascribing to him a disposition to falsehood and treachery which could not be imputed without the grossest injustice.—Now what is the state of the case? Those same ministers put into the mouth of the king a message complaining of armaments in France, in nearly the same terms as those which last year so much excited their indignation and reprehension; and insinuating that these armaments, though "avowedly" intended for colonial purposes (meaning, I suppose, for the purpose of taking possession of their own colonies, for otherwise the information, however authentic, would not be very comfortable, nor the "avowal" on the part of the enemy a very modest one,) are in fact destined against the shores of this empire. I cannot, therefore, be satisfied with the general argument, that, in all cases, preparation against preparation, outfit against outfit, armament against armament, has been the uniform policy of this country, and a sufficient foundation for the proceedings of parliament. It has not been so in the instance of the present ministers; and the contrast between their former and present conduct, between what they did and said on the expedition to Saint Domingo, and what they are saying and doing now, between their rebukes at that time of those who presumed to doubt the good faith of Buonaparté, and their plain declaration, in the royal message, of their own heavy suspicions of him at the present moment, is a sufficient proof that some great and ominous change has taken place in the relation between this country and France, and that when ministers call upon me for my vote for 10,000 additional seamen, or whatever other sort or description of force they may please to call for, I am not to conceive myself to be voting that force on the old constitutional ground of necessary precaution only; but that there are in truth other objects in contemplation, that there are in truth nearer and more precise questions at issue.—The message itself states plainly the existence of these other objects: and at length, in his second speech this night, my noble friend has admitted that the "important discussions still pending between this country and France" have their share in originating the proposition for an increased military force, and are in fact in the contemplation of the vote for which we are now called upon. This, Sir, is the very admission which I wanted, but which it was so difficult to obtain. What! says my noble friend, if the mere circumstance of an armament in a neighbouring country would justify the government in requiring an augmentation of force, does not the additional circumstance of important discussions being actually pending between that country and this, give additional weight to the requisition? Undoubtedly, Sir, most undoubtedly. But does it not also entitle the House of Commons to more precise information? I do not mean at the instant—that is matter of discretion—but to a promise at least of information hereafter; when the discussions shall have been terminated, and when the objects of them can therefore be disclosed without danger. Do not let me be mistaken, as if I were pressing for full information now, beforehand, as if I desired to be let into the secret of negotiations at this moment carrying on, and the success of which may possibly depend upon their being managed with prudence and secrecy? No such thing. All that common place is thrown away in answer to my proposition: which is this only, that some time or other, at a proper season, and when the disclosure can be made without hazarding any interest, the House of Commons will have a right to expect that the use which has been made of their grants, the purpose to which they have been applied, and the effect with which they have been employed, should be fairly stated to them. That is the only rational confidence in which they can vote. With that confidence they may reasonably vote even in the dark; trusting that their darkness is not to continue for ever.—Here then, Sir, in the union of these two grounds stated in the king's message, in the statement that armaments are going on in the ports of the enemy, and that there are at this moment important discussions pending between us and France, do I find the justification of this night's vote; and upon these grounds, taken together, do I cheerfully concur in it.—I vote for 10,000 seamen, or any other number that ministers please to ask, not only to enable government to be prepared against any sudden invasion, or any hostile aggression which may be committed by the armaments in France and Holland in any part of the world, against the rights and interests of this country; but farther to enable them to bring at length to a point all the discussions which are at this moment pending between them and the first consul of France. I inquire not, I have no wish to know, on what subjects those discussions turn. It is notorious enough that there are but too many possible grounds for them; that some of the articles of the treaty of Amiens are yet unexecuted, some of them perhaps unexecutable; and that there have been on the part of France acts of insult, violence, and outrage, innumerable, unexampled, intolerable, for which ministers are perfectly justified in demanding reparation and atonement. I ask not for any information at this moment. I express only my confident hope that ministers have asked for this armament, and that they will employ it effectually, to bring to a final settlement all these vexatious and perplexing differences which have already, God knows, been suffered to subsist too long; that they are determined to be trifled with, mocked, and wronged no longer; that they think the country has already suffered enough by delay and irritation; that they will not lay by the means of exertion which they have now acquired, nor let them languish in their hands, until they shall have converted the present ambiguous and feverish repose, which is at once the disgrace and danger of the country, into solid and real peace. This I expect of them. I trust that they, in common with the public, are weary and ashamed of the state in which we have been kept; a state anomalous and undefinable; a state, for which the annals of history afford no precedent, and the vocabulary of politics furnishes no name; a state, not of profound peace, as it was most whimsically and unaccountably described by a right hon. gentleman below me (the chancellor of the exchequer) a few nights ago! but a state neither of peace nor of war; neither of secure rest, nor of honourable or hopeful exertions; peace, if peace it must be called, without tranquillity, without economy, without safety; and subject to all the anxieties, more than all the dangers, and no small part of the expenses of war, without the chance of its advantages, without the consolation of its glories, and without that prospect which war, vigorously conducted, always affords, of leading to a termination in secure, settled, and permanent peace.—This state, I say, I hope ministers are determined by every exertion to change into a definite and durable state of things; by war, if war for that purpose shall be unavoidable; but by firmness, by spirit, by a resolution to be trampled upon no longer, I believe it may be effected; and I believe, if these means had been sooner resorted to, the effect might have been produced long ago. In this confidence, and in the confidence that, when they surrender up an account of the trust which we are now committing to them, they will show us what they have done with it, and satisfy us that they have employed it to the best advantage, I heartily concur in the present vote; but I warn them, that if they should relax their efforts before they have accomplished all that is required of them, if they should come down to parliament with a history that the armament in the hostile ports had, after all, sailed to its avowed destination, and that therefore there is an end of jealousy and preparation on our part; if they shall attempt to put this fraud and trick upon the country; if they shall no otherwise atone and account for the shock to public confidence and public quiet, which their late message has produced,—unnecessarily: if no other result than that which I am here cautioning them against should be apparent; if, in a word, instead of a complete, honourable, and durable settlement and consolidation of the peace, they shall do no more than restore the country, after this shock, to the same feverish, unwholesome repose from which they roused it; to that slumber which is disturbed by constant alarms, and perpetually recurring horrors and dangers, by which the country is not refreshed and recruited, but exhausted, harassed, and agitated, even more than by war in its worst form; if this should be the end of all our preparations, the produce and reward of all our confidence, I shall then accuse ministers of having disappointed the vote of this night, and abused the trust reposed in them, of having deceived parliament, and betrayed and undone the nation. This, Sir, is the meaning of my vote. And with this explanation I heartily concur in the proposition upon your table.—One word only upon a subject which has been introduced into the debate of this night, the persons and characters of those who fill responsible situations in his majesty's service, and their capacity to conduct the affairs of the country in a crisis of such difficulty and danger. Sir, at a moment like the present, I, for one, cannot pause to inquire who are the ministers of the crown. The crown calls upon us for instant help to avert instant danger. This is not a time to consider into what hands the management of what we grant is to be committed. We have no leisure to choose. Awful indeed is the responsibility of those who advise the call that is thus made upon us; and the time of this account must come. But for the present let us give without hesitation all that can be required by the executive government, be it in whose hands it may; trusting that the means which are thus cheerfully furnished to them will be employed in a manner suitable to the importance of the interests at stake, and such as shall deserve the unqualified support which is afforded by parliament, and the zealous and enthusiastic unanimity which pervades all ranks of the people.

Sir W. Pulteney observed, that the people might be reluctant to enter into a war, of which they could not perceive the precise object. But if once they were shown and enabled to see that a war was unavoidable, they would cordially determine upon a vigorous prosecution of it. Now was the time to show all Europe that this country was prepared for any alternative. He hoped, indeed, it was so prepared as to be enabled to meet any hostile attempt. That the country was not able to enter into such a contest, he could not agree. It was as able as ever; and since, to every considerate observer, it must appear that a struggle must come between England and France, it was better it should come now than hereafter.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con.

Debate in the Commons on the King's Message respecting the Situation of the Prince of Wales.] Feb. 23. The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved, that the House should resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, on the King's Message respecting the Prince of Wales, Colonel Stanley asked, whether it was intended to raise money for the purpose of relieving the embarrassments of the prince; or whether this measure was not a compromise for certain claims of money, which had not been appropriated to his use? If it was a compromise on account of claims on the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall he must say that the House could not know whether he had any legal claim or not, as lawyers were very much divided in opinion upon that subject. In any other light, his duty to his constituents, would not allow him to lay any additional burdens upon them on this account.

Mr. Chancellor Addington denied, that the present motion was founded at all upon a compromise of claims; neither was it for the purpose of paying the prince's debts, as they had been already provided for by a former arrangement; it was merely with the view of re-establishing his Royal Highness in that splendor which belonged to his rank in the state.

The House having resolved itself into a committee,

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he rose to submit a proposition, which he flattered himself would meet with the general acquiescence of the committee; for it was impossible for him to entertain a doubt that every member felt that he had a constitutional share of interest in the splendor and dignity of the heir apparent. He was perfectly convinced, that those who proposed the measure in 1795, and those who supported it, felt it a painful but indispensable part of their duty to adopt the measure, which was afterwards agreed to, and made a legislative provision. It would be recollected, that in April 1795, a message came from his majesty recommending an extension of the establishment of the prince of Wales; expressing a regret that the income of his Royal Highness had not been adequate to the support of his station; and stating distinctly, that his majesty had no idea of proposing to parliament to make a provision for the discharge of the debts of his Royal Highness, otherwise than by appropriating a part of his income for that purpose. Upon this message the House had acted; the measure was proposed by his right hon. friend the late minister, who brought forward the proposition, founded on a just comparison of the means to support the establishment of the prince of Wales, with the amount of his incumbrances; and a comparison was also made between the state and condition of things in the year 1795, and those of former periods. His right hon. friend had stated, that in 1742, a provision was made by parliament to the then prince of Wales, of 100,000*l.* per annum, exclusive of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall; and all that his right hon. friend asked of the committee at that time was, to consider the change which had taken place in the value of money from the year 1742 to the year 1795, and desiring them also to consider the necessary increase of the establishment of the prince of Wales in consequence of such changes. There had been also an increase of 25,000*l.* per annum granted on that establishment, an addition which very few persons thought exorbitant, and to which, therefore, little objection was made. His right hon. friend then argued, that the income of his Royal Highness, in 1795, would not, in reality, become greater by what he proposed, than that which had been enjoyed by his royal grand-father. In 1745, a motion was made, that 60,000*l.* should be received by his then royal highness, which was adopted by a large majority of that House. Thus, his right hon. friend had argued in support of his then proposition, which was adopted by the House. Then there came another part of his majesty's message under the consideration of the committee, and on which there was more difference of opinion than on the former. Some thought that no discharge of the debts of the prince of Wales should be considered in that House; that no arrangements should be made, and that the charge of it should be borne by the public. Others concurred in thinking, that provision should be made for the liquidation of the debts of his Royal Highness, but that the burthen should not be borne by the public, but should come out of the income of his Royal Highness himself. It was, however, the opinion of his right hon. friend, who wished to combine the true interests of his Royal Highness with a just regard to the interest of his creditors, that provision should be made for the payment of their claims, by the appropriation of 60,000*l.* per annum, of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, and that means must be found for the liquidation of the debts of his Royal Highness. The distinct proposition was assented to; and this was the general wish of the House, namely, that some measure should take place for liquidating the debts of his Royal Highness; the means to accomplish which end produced a variety of conflicting opinions; but the House was relieved from further difficulties by a gracious communication from his Royal Highness himself. [Here the chancellor of the exchequer read the message of his Royal Highness to the House, which was brought down by Mr. Anstruther]. This gracious message was received with respect and gratitude: and the House proceeded to instruct its committee as to the mode in which the bill should be brought in, in which provision was made for the management of his Royal Highness's household—what was to be allotted for that purpose, and what part of the income of his Royal Highness should be appropriated to the liquidation of his debts. It was the opinion of the House at that time, that they would better discharge their duty to his Royal Highness and to their constituents, by adopting a measure which applied part of the income of his Royal Highness for the satisfaction of his creditors; but the primary object of the measure which was then adopted was, to liquidate the debts, under which parliament gave to his Royal Highness an admonition; for, applying so large a proportion of his income to the payment of his debts, was an admonition. But if any persons were now present who concurred in that measure, he would ask them, if they had made up their minds to this, that such measure being to be continued for twelve years, and his Royal Highness having sustained it for eight years, they did not think that he had already continued a sufficient time in that situation? By the bill to which he had alluded, it was provided, that the debts of the prince should be investigated, and an appropriation was made out of the revenues of his Royal Highness, which appropriation was 13,000*l.* per annum, the revenue of the duchy of Cornwall, and 60,000*l.* per annum out of his income to discharge debts which were estimated at 650,000*l.* so that 13,000*l.* and 60,000*l.* per annum, together, were employed in discharging a capital debt of 650,000*l.* and debentures were issued for that purpose. Here he entered into the detail of the application of those funds for the liquidation of his Royal Highness's debts. The result of which was, that on the 5th of January last, there had been paid off 563,895*l.* and the whole would be discharged in July 1806. He desired it to be recollected, that his Royal Highness had passed eight years of his life in a state of comparative obscurity. Was the committee prepared to say, that his Royal Highness should remain in this situation of comparative obscurity four years longer? It should be recollected, that the House had not paid one shilling towards the discharge of the debts of his Royal Highness for the last eight years. He wished it to be remembered also, that parliament had no embarrassment whatever in this case; for, at the time of the last arrangement, no pledge whatever was entered into of not considering the subject again: every member was therefore at liberty to act as a due sense of duty should dictate. He did not wish to interrupt the plan adopted to prevent the accumulation of any future debts. What he wished to do was, to enable his majesty to grant to the prince the same income as he had previous to the arrangement of his affairs, namely, 60,000*l.* per annum. This, he was persuaded, would not appear excessive, when it was considered, that 90 years ago, a prince of Wales had 90,000*l.* per annum, and that his Royal Highness, in 1795, had only 138,000*l.* and which was not then supposed to be more than sufficient to support his state and dignity; and that which was in 1795 deemed no more than sufficient, must be admitted to be moderate indeed at the present moment, considering the great change which had taken place in the value of money during the last eight years. He was as much attached to economy, as any one; but he would ask with confidence, was the state of this country such as to make us doubt its sufficiency to provide for his Royal Highness the additional sum of 60,000*l.* thereby placing him only in the situation he was in at a period of war, and now we were in a period of peace? An hon. gentleman was desirous of knowing, whether any compromise had taken place on the occasion. He wished to be distinctly understood on this subject. He could say with perfect satisfaction, that if he had never heard one word of the petition of right, the proposition he was about to submit he should have voted for, let it come from whatever quarter it might in that House. He thought it essentially necessary to the splendor of the prince of Wales. And when he said splendor, he did not mean that vain ostentation which thoughtless persons mistook for splendor. He spoke not merely of equipage and external appearance, though these were not to be totally disregarded in such an elevated station, but he meant something of much greater value, that of enabling his Royal Highness to be munificent to merit, to promote, by his countenance, great and liberal undertakings. He wished to see the prince of Wales placed in a situation to receive the due attentions of the nobility and gentry, to be able to return them the comforts of hospitality, and to receive them in a manner suitable to his own rank and their wishes; for on this much depended of that intercourse between a prince and the higher classes of the subjects of this realm, which contributed so much to the harmony of the state, and which was therefore much to be cherished. He should now move, "That his majesty be enabled to grant a yearly sum, or sums of money, out of the consolidated fund of Great Britain, not exceeding, in the whole, the sum of sixty thousand pounds; to take place, and be computed from the 5th day of January 1803, and to continue until the 5th day of July 1806, towards providing for the better support of the station and dignity of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales."

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Manners Sutton) said:—Sir, in offering my sentiments to the committee I feel, in common with them, the great importance of the subject, as well as the dignity of the illustrious personage to whom it relates. But although I cease to have the honour of being in the service of his Royal Highness, yet I have the satisfaction of retaining, what to my mind is much more valuable, the confidence of his Royal Highness. In stating to the House the sentiments of the prince of Wales, I am desired to express, in the strongest terms, his unfeigned gratitude to his majesty for the interest that he has been pleased to take in what regards the dignity and comforts of his Royal Highness's situation, evinced as it has been in the gracious message which has been sent to this House I am also desired to state, in terms no less strong, that his Royal Highness submits with the utmost cheerfulness to the wisdom and justice of the House, in whatever resolution they may adopt with respect to the present subject. I am convinced, that it has ever been the first object of the prince to show his sincere respect and duty for his country. Of his ardent desire to preserve, without the possibility of diminution, the harmony which should exist between him and his royal father, every one is deeply convinced; and he would forego every claim of right, rather than enter into a contest, the event of which, however successful, must be to his Royal Highness the subject of serious regret. The House will, I am sure, readily admit, from the statements which I have made, the propriety of the prince's sentiments; and they will be able to appreciate how very just and dignified his ideas are on the present occasion, since no doubt can be entertained of the legality of his right. For, notwithstanding what has been thrown out by an hon. gentleman on the diversity of legal opinions, I feel no hesitation in maintaining, that the claims of his Royal Highness are too firmly established to be shaken by any opinion which may be brought forward to invalidate them. I assure the committee that I feared no results from the prosecution of the right, but those which might unfortunately lead to a difference between his majesty and his eldest son ; and it was by that consideration that his Royal Highness was solely influenced. In adverting to the grounds for his majesty's gracious message, I can discover none but those public grounds which have been so ably stated by my right hon. friend. It must be obvious from their nature, and the candour with which they have been brought forward, that there are no other. There certainly has been no compromise, nor has any circumstance occurred which can warrant such a supposition. I assure the committee, that the intimation of the present measure, when communicated to his Royal Highness, came altogether unexpected ; that no terms were attempted to be imposed upon him ; and that he was left at full liberty to prosecute the justice of his claim. When this subject was submitted last session to the consideration of the House, I stated, that, however great the expenses incurred by the heir apparent had been, they had not fallen upon the public. I now repeat that statement. Let those who are inclined to doubt it, consider the material difference which exist between the present and former times, between the situation of his Royal Highness and that of his illustrious predecessors.

Sir Ralph Milbank said, that it was notorious, that the prince had lived in a state of comparative obscurity, for the last eight years, and that it was time to restore him to that state and splendor, which became his exalted rank.

Mr. Harrison objected to the manner of granting this annuity, as a boon to his Royal Highness, when it was clear, that he was a creditor to the public, for more than the amount of his outstanding debts. The solicitor general had informed them, that legal opinions were agreed upon that subject. Although for his part, he did not think the dignity of monarchy depended upon its trappings, yet when he saw splendor in every corner of the court, and in all its appendages, he saw no reason why the prince of Wales should be the only person from whom it was withheld.

Lord Castlereagh was of opinion last year, when this matter was first suggested, that the time was come for restoring the prince to the full dignity and comforts, which became his rank ; but as the claims of the prince then came forward in a more legal shape, it was necessary to await a legal decision. He perfectly approved however of the feeling which dictated that course, namely, that the prince wished rather that his debts should be paid out of his own means, than that he should appear burthensome to the public.

Mr. Sheridan said, he preferred so much the character of his Royal Highness to his comforts, that if this was to be represented to the public as a boon to the prince (who had come down to parliament a third time for payment of his debts), he was not prepared to say that he should support it. The fact was this, the prince had in the course of the last session, applied for the restoration of his right, not on his own account, but for the sake of his creditors : there was a long discussion both historical and political, on his claims, but the house resolved that they could do nothing in it. A petition of right was then proceeded upon, but suddenly the proceedings were stopped, and this message came down to the House. The right hon. gentleman objected to the word compromise, but it was because he considered it a fair and honourable compromise, that he supported it. As to the petition of right, it would have been very doubtful when it could have been decided. The glorious uncertainty of the law, was a thing well known and complained of, by all ignorant people, but all learned gentlemen considered it as its greatest excellency. He therefore thought this was a fair and honourable compromise, but he wished the House to bear in their minds, that his Royal Highness considered himself in honour and in justice bound to pay his creditors the 10% per cent which the commissioners had reduced of their demands ; and until that was done, his Royal Highness could not resume conscientiously, nor in honour, his state and dignity.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained this circumstance in the following manner : for all the debts which were fairly and justly due, there were given to the creditors, who were at liberty to accept them at their option, debentures of 100% bearing 3 per cent interest, or 90% bearing 5 per cent : those who preferred the 90% could not be said to have their debt reduced, as by law, no interest at all was due on debts, which were merely book debts. He was glad that this measure would silence for ever the petition of right. Although legal opinions had said, that the prince was entitled to an account of the revenues of Cornwall, no one had said, that in that account, no allowances were to be made for money expended for his use; but at all events, if there were a legal judgment, the fund was gone on which it was to be a lien; and if the prince should be obliged at length to come to parliament for its equitable interpretation of the judgment, it would let in an account between the public and the prince, which it was much better not to go into. He concluded by maintaining, that there had been no deduction made from the debts of the creditors.

Mr. Fox said:—Sir; I feel myself called upon to rise in consequence of the allusion made to the transactions of 1795, in which I took so considerable a part. In that year I considered the business was closed, and therefore I conceive any allusion to the business of 1787 extremely improper. The only question is, whether, after eight years of privation, the prince shall be restored to the possession of his full income, and be enabled to resume that state which it is consistent with the dignity of the nation that he should maintain. If we were arguing this proposition simply, and without reference to any thing that may add strength to the claim, I should say, we should be guilty of the greatest severity, if we did not agree in the propriety of such a measure. But if for eight years his Royal Highness has submitted to a system of restraint and privation, if there are, besides, other reasons which enforce his Royal Highness's title, are not these grounds why an addition should now be made to his income?—Is there any one member who did not believe at the time the system so long pursued was established, that before eight years should have elapsed his Royal Highness's income would have received an addition? The claim of his Royal Highness for the arrears of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall should enter seriously into the consideration of the House. I am ready to believe the right hon. gentleman, when he declares, that if that claim had never been agitated, he should have conceived it his duty to support the grant which he now proposes; but, is that a reason why parliament should not take the claim into account, when a grant is to be made to his Royal Highness? It is true, the precise amount of the claim is not made out; but at least it is universally acknowledged, that he has a right to an account, and to whatever balance may appear on that account to be owing to him. The right hon. gentleman says also, that if his Royal Highness's claim was made out, and established in law, he would yet have no remedy, because the law allows no lien on the property of the king. But surely we are not to be seriously told, that his Royal Highness would in such case, be left entirely without redress? For who is there that would suffer it to be said, "It is true the prince of Wales has the right; he has established the justice and legality of his demand; but the law affords no remedy against the king, and therefore his Royal Highness is in just the same situation that he was." Who is there that would, for an instant, suffer the prerogative of the crown to remain burthened with so odious an imputation? His Royal Highness was prosecuting his just claim in the modes most respectful to his majesty and to parliament. On being informed that the measure proposed this night was in agitation, he compromised those claims. I do not mean a compromise in the strict sense of the word; but I think it very material to be known, that in consequence of the grant to be made this night, his Royal Highness abandons claims of such magnitude, and so well-founded. But when gentlemen talk of this as a third application to parliament for the liquidation of debts, I think it material to state, that this claim, or rather this right, exists on the part of his Royal Highness; and that this is no application on his part. His Royal Highness is not in the situation of an applicant to the bounty of parliament. Surely, it is not extraordinary that, after a lapse of eight years, accompanied with circumstances which have materially affected the income of every man, his majesty should send down a message, recommending to his parliament to make some addition to the income of the prince of Wales. In 1795, there were some persons who thought that, burthened as this country then was, 125,000*l.* was too great an income. I did not; but I wished to abide by it, because I thought it right that a fixed system should be established with respect to every branch of the royal family, and even with respect to his majesty himself, rather than that a practice should become prevalent of making applications to parliament every five or ten years for increased provisions on the ground of variations in the value of money. But certainly, while the practice continues, the prince is among the first to whom parliament would be ready to allow the benefit of it. We were given to understand by the right hon. gentleman in the first instance, that the prince was immediately to resume his state: then the right hon. gentleman, on better information, said, that his Royal Highness would for sometime be prevented from resuming it by motives highly honourable to himself. The right hon. gentleman comes next with a still further explanation; and says, that he meant, in speaking of the motives by which his Royal Highness was actuated in determining on this further privation, merely to do justice to his Royal Highness's honourable feelings, without giving any opinion as to the justice of the further claims by which his Royal Highness still held himself bound. We are told that the whole of the British debt has been included under the arrangement for the liquidation; but that the foreign debt has not been included under it, because it could not be examined by the commissioners. But will the right hon. gentleman say, that because it could not be so examined, it is not justly and honourably due. He says, that no allowance should be made for the reduction of 10 per cent because he had proposed an alternative. But that alternative was such that it must even be preferred to submit to a deduction of 10 per cent than to make the other choice. The right hon. gentleman says, that there was still an advantage, because book debts bear no interest. It is true, they do not while they continue in that shape; but when they are converted, by settlement, into regular securities, these securities are, in every case, liable to interest. The right hon. gentleman says, that the loss by discount is matter of no consideration, because it would not have been incurred if the debentures had been kept up. It is true; but I should be glad to know what use the debentures are of, if one cannot buy and sell them? We are told, that if the money had been vested in the consols, it would have been subject to the same depreciation. That may be, but then an allowance would have been made in the investment. It has been said, that subsequent to the arrangement of 1795, no legal debts affect his Royal Highness. That is certainly true, because it is specified that no debt can be legal after that arrangement. All since that time must be debts of honour, of which it must be for his Royal Highness to judge how far they are binding. And I think that when 10 per cent is generally struck off, when his Royal Highness is prevented from incurring legal debts, he must have such debts as he will feel himself bound in honour to discharge. The House may say, "We give you a great income, and leave you to determine the use you shall make of it; what claims you shall think legal, and what binding in honour." I certainly think, that if 73,000*l.* a year were given, and his Royal Highness were desired to have lords of the bed-chamber, and every thing else of that kind, the consequence would be, that, by creating a great establishment before the proper time, new incumbrances would accumulate, and a necessity would arise for coming again to parliament. I think the best advice we can give is, to say to his Royal Highness, "Consider your income, and determine what degree of state you will assume, and when you will assume it." But if it is determined that he shall assume this state immediately, let an application be made to parliament for further aid. To this last proceeding I could have no objection, particularly when his Royal Highness abandons the claims arising out of the duchy of Cornwall. But I deprecate all idea of an application, as in 1787. If it is determined that his Royal Highness shall resume his state immediately, I would say to parliament, "Extinguish not only the debts, but the embarrassments, and place his Royal Highness at once in that state in which he has never been, I had almost said, since his birth, but certainly never since his coming to man's estate; in which he may say, here is an income on which I may live in a manner becoming my rank and dignity."

Mr. Bankes strongly objected to the resolution, because it went to debar the prince from pursuing his claim on the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall. It was not fair to make such a compromise with his Royal Highness; nor was the House dealing fairly with itself. Was it not fit that the situation of princes of Wales hereafter should be known and ascertained? What was in future to become of the money during the minority of a prince? Was he to understand that it was not to be applicable to his use? He saw no inconvenience that could arise from a petition of right.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Feb. 25. His Majesty's Message on the subject was taken into consideration in the House of Lords. Lord Pelham, after a few preliminary observations, moved an address to his majesty. Lord Carlisle seconded the motion, but wished the question had been decided on the petition of right. After a few words from lord Moira, in praise of the conduct of his Royal Highness upon this occasion, the address was agreed to nem. diss.

Communication from the Prince of Wales to the Commons.] Feb. 28. Mr. Tyrwhitt, keeper of the privy seal, and private secretary to the Prince of Wales, acquainted the House,

“That the Prince has felt with the most sincere and affectionate gratitude, the gracious purpose of his majesty in recommending his present situation to the consideration of parliament:—That, having seen, by the votes of the House of Commons, the manner in which they have received his majesty’s recommendation, the Prince deems it incumbent on him to express his warmest acknowledgment of their liberality. At the same time, the Prince, though fully convinced of the propriety of resuming his state, and greatly regretting any circumstance which tends to disappoint the wishes of his majesty, or of the House, upon that subject, yet feels himself bound explicitly to declare, that there are still claims remaining upon his honour and his justice, for the discharge of which he must continue to set apart, in trust, a large sinking fund, and consequently postpone, until the period of their liquidation, the resumption of that state and dignity, which, however essential to his rank and station, he knows, from dear bought experience, could not, under his present circumstances, be resumed, without the risk of incurring new difficulties. The Prince thinks that he owes it to himself and to parliament, to make this declaration to them with the same distinctness as he stated it to his majesty’s government upon the first communication made to him of his majesty’s benign intentions. With respect to the Prince’s claim to an account of the revenues which accrued from the duchy of Cornwall, from the year 1762 to 1783, however strong his confidence in the validity of his claim, a confidence fortified by the greatest legal authorities, yet, as he trusts that, through the gracious interposition of his majesty, and the liberality of parliament, he shall be enabled otherwise to provide for those demands on his justice which alone induced him to assert his right, he now cheerfully relinquishes his suit, and has directed his law officers to forego all further proceedings.”

Debate on Mr. Calcraft’s Motion respecting certain Claims on the Prince of Wales.]

March 4. Mr. Calcraft, before he entered upon the main subject of his motion, wished to renew a declaration which he made on a former evening, in consequence of a suggestion from a learned gentleman (Mr. Erskine). He was desirous that the House should be fully apprised, that the present proceeding originated entirely from himself. The subject was evidently of a delicate nature; but he trusted that the manner he meant to adopt would be such as could not prove offensive to any party. In the bill still before them, the House had gone the full length of what ministers proposed; but it was not so certain that their late grant went to the extent of his majesty’s message; and, in his mind, something remained still to be accomplished. He meant to submit to them a motion for a committee to inquire into the extent of the claims on the honour and justice of the Prince of Wales, which must still, notwithstanding the liberality of parliament, retard the resumption of that state and dignity befitting the heir apparent of these realms. To any inquiries made by a committee in parliament, those objections could not apply, which might be urged against any other mode of investigation. On referring to the message, gentlemen would see that it expressed his majesty’s reliance on their zeal and attachment, for what may be necessary for the purpose of restoring the state and dignity of the Prince of Wales. From the general terms, it appeared to him, that more was included than had yet been done. The House had made a very considerable grant; but the public did not find themselves one jot nearer the accomplishment of their expectations. The chancellor of the exchequer had, on a former day, declared, that were the motives of his Royal Highness’s forbearance in this respect made public, they would be such as to reflect the highest honour on him. But he, as a member of parliament, anxious to maintain the dignity of the nation, was bound to institute an inquiry, and not accept the declaration of the minister, nor even that of the royal personage himself. It was impossible for the Prince to be restored to the state suited to him, and at the same time make an appropriation for the discharge of his existing debts; and therefore it was advisable to remove, at once, every load and clog. If there was any obstacle to be found in the financial state of the country, that would be a fit subject for the consideration of the committee. If the country was in other respects able to support the national splendor and dignity, he could not account for parsimony being confined solely to the circumstances of the heir apparent; nor why he should be compelled to reside in a corner of his palace, surrounded by difficulties and embarrassments. He had now discharged his duty, and should conclude by moving, "That this House, anxiously desirous to give full effect to the important objects recommended to their consideration in his majesty's most gracious message of the 16th of February, do appoint a select committee to request and receive information respecting the extent of those claims upon the justice and honour of the Prince of Wales, which, according to the official communications made to this House, impede his Royal Highness's anxious desire to fulfil his Majesty's benign intention, and accord to the wishes of this House, by resuming that state and dignity which belong to the heir apparent of the British Empire."

Mr. Erskine said, that the hon. gentleman having adverted to what had been said by him on a former night, he thought it right to trouble them with a very few words. When he came that night into the House without any knowledge of the business it was engaged in, an hon. gentleman, who held an official situation, was reading in his place a communication from his Royal Highness, and he (Mr. E.) then assured the House, that the prince had repeatedly expressed to him his perfect contentment with the gracious intention of the king, and the liberal grant of parliament, though he thought it a duty incumbent upon him, at the same time, to declare, that he could not for the present resume his state and dignity which the House seemed desirous should be re-established. He thought it now therefore necessary to add, that the motion before them of which the hon. gentleman at the same moment had given notice, was wholly unknown to the illustrious person to whom it related, as it might otherwise be conceived that it had been made with the Prince's privity, which would be at variance with the satisfaction he had expressed. Mr. E. said, that proud as he was of possessing the confidence of acting as the servant of the Prince, he had a still higher character to maintain as an independent member of parliament.—The present motion was no censure upon the proper reserve of his majesty's ministers in avoiding every unnecessary pressure upon the people, and if it were, he would certainly vote against it. The king had only asked the House to enable him to restore the state and dignity of the Prince of Wales, which we had assured his majesty of our readiness to do.—The sum voted however having turned out to be insufficient for that desirable object, the hon. gentleman seeks only by his motion to remedy that defect.—It was not therefore a renewed proposition on the part of the crown, but an original one by an independent member of parliament, for the necessary support of the state and dignity of our monarchical government.—He had risen thus early to make it clear that the present motion was not in opposition to the message nor to the address of the House in answer to it.—He was, sure on the contrary that the right hon. gentleman's disposition towards the Prince was not limited to the specific sum which had been granted, and that he would willingly accede to any addition which circumstances then unknown might render necessary.—At all events, he anxiously hoped that the business would be settled without any reference to the legal claim of the Prince.—He (Mr. E.) had never stated that claim to amount to any specific sum, but only that the Prince was entitled to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall from his birth,—a doctrine which received the tacit assent of lord Ellenborough when attorney-general, and which had never been controverted by any lawyer in the House, the reason of the grant being for the sustentation of the Prince independent of the king, yet the whole of those revenues had nevertheless been received by the crown. It was not the matter in question what they amounted to, so as it was clear that the crown, or, in other words, the public, was debtor; that we had now a Prince of Wales of the age of forty who had been no burthen to the country whatever. The sum granted in consequence of the message was such as the House would have voted to any Prince of Wales though not so circumstanced, since the chancellor of the exchequer had formerly expressly stated that it had no connexion with the claim in question. This, however, he wished to put altogether aside, his only object in troubling the House being to remove all idea that the Prince had any concern in the motion however fit to be made.—He was anxious alone that the public should not suppose that the Prince had received our bounty, but had not acted up to the motive and intention of the House, which no difficulties could have compelled him to do.

Mr. Fuller said, he had no doubt but that our ancestors meant to make the Prince of Wales independent of his father. What did the motion ask? Only that the embarrassments of the Prince should be inquired into by a committee of the House. The deductions made by the commissioners had tended to accumulate the debts, which the Prince thought himself bound in honour to pay.

Mr. Cartwright did not think the House could consistently go farther than it had done. With respect to his Royal Highness, he could not believe that the public reverence towards him would be in the least diminished by his remaining some time longer, if necessary, in his present situation.

Sir R. Buxton said, that he should be extremely happy to see the Prince resume the splendor and dignity to which his rank in the state so fully entitled him; but he then spoke as a representative of the people, and it behoved him as such to be very cautious how he imposed any additional burthens on them. He desired the House to look at France, and the gigantic exertions she was making to render herself the arbitress of Europe. He thought the Prince would do himself more honour by giving up the trappings of royalty at this moment, than by resuming them. For these reasons, he would move the previous question.

Mr. Curwen said, if there were debts due from the Prince, which would prevent him from immediately resuming the splendor attached to his exalted station, let the amount be stated to the House, and then they would be able to judge whether they would discharge them or not. If they agreed to a committee, and that committee, on investigation, found, that the amount was too great to be discharged, it would be holding out hopes to the illustrious personage alluded to, which might be disappointed. For these reasons he should vote for the previous question.

Mr. Hylliard thought the splendor and dignity of the heir apparent essential to the support of our excellent constitution. The House had determined to comply with his majesty's wishes, and that could not be done but by agreeing to the present motion; for the Prince had candidly shown the House, that the sum granted, though entirely satisfactory to him, would not enable him to resume immediately that state of splendor and dignity which was the object of it.

Mr. Johnstone felt himself bound to object to the motion. Though he felt that, to maintain in due splendor all the branches of the royal family was essential to the true interests of the country, he must contend that no arguments were stated to prove the necessity of revoking those arrangements which parliament had adopted in 1795. But gentlemen talked of the rights of the Prince, resulting from the duchy of Cornwall. This question was discussed in 1795, and it then was the duty of the Prince to urge his right, or rely on the generosity of the public. He had chosen the latter; and it was not fair, after experiencing the liberality of the country, to renew the claim of right. Why was not that discussion brought to an issue? No difference could arise between the King and the Prince, as was stated; for the revenues having been applied to the public service, the public was answerable. But there existed another good reason why the suit should not be prosecuted: that it could produce nothing; for, admitting the Prince entitled to the revenues of the duchy from the hour of his birth, the amount was 234,000*l.* Now during the last twelve years of his minority, the whole expenditure was 239,000*l.* to be set against a receipt of 234,000*l.* during the Prince's minority. But was this all? There had been paid 60,000*l.* on his coming of age, 219,000*l.* in 1787, and 52,000*l.* in 1795, beyond the fixed and regular allowances. So that on the whole there were payments to the amount of 570,000*l.* to be opposed to a claim of 234,000*l.* He stated these facts because he considered the people of England insulted when they were told that his Highness had made a sacrifice by condescending to accept between 2 and 300,000*l.*

Mr. H. Lascelles said, he could not approve the mode of investigating the subject by appointing a committee. If the Prince had openly stated the full amount of his debts, the House would then have been able to form an exact judgment on the case, and might have come to an immediate decision on it. The claims of the duchy of Cornwall seemed to be held over the House in terrorem. It had been held out that the public was favoured by those claims being dropped. He was of a contrary opinion.

Sir W. Geary should give every support in his power to the immediate resumption of that state of splendor and dignity which should belong to the heir apparent to the crown. He had been told that the Prince could not immediately resume his becoming splendor; but in his opinion, the House should enable him immediately to do so, whatever it might cost.

Mr. Burdon thought, that to inquire any further into the circumstances of the case than his Royal Highness had thought proper to make known, would be extremely indelicate. That his Royal Highness should remain longer in a state of obscurity, was a subject of regret; but such a state of obscurity would not reflect the least dishonour on his Royal Highness; particularly when the motives for it were considered. We were told that debts of honour, &c. were to be discharged; but these debts might be of a very different description from what the spirit of an act of parliament could embrace.

Mr. Tierney said, that in voting for the committee, he did not at all pledge himself to vote for whatever sums might be found still undischarged. Possessing, as he did, the strongest attachment to the Prince, he should not support the motion, if he did not think that the result would be highly honourable to his conduct. Some gentlemen seemed extremely desirous of arguing, that any addition to the income of the Prince of Wales, was an addition to the burthens of the people. What the state of the account was between his Royal Highness and the public, he professed not to know. This, however, he did know, that during the last session, his Royal Highness laid before the House a proposition for considering the amount of his claims. It was not then denied that an account ought to be taken; all that was contended for was, that the matter was one for the decision, not of the legislature, but of a court of law. In deference to this decision, his Royal Highness prepared a petition, which was laid before the lord chancellor, and the matter was put into a train of adjudication. It did not appear that his Royal Highness had discovered any unwillingness to proceed with the suit, or that he had submitted any overture for receiving 60,000*l.* as a condition of relinquishing all further proceedings. But when his Royal Highness had proceeded so far with his suit, ministers had stepped in with this proposition, as if they thought that his Royal Highness had sufficiently atoned for his offences. Twelve years were fixed on as the period of his probation; but exactly at the end of seven years and a half, when the amount of his claims on the public were about to be ascertained, when it was about to be determined whether such a sum was due to him as would enable him to resume his former dignity, a period was put to his state of humiliation, and a provision assigned him without the smallest explanation of so extraordinary a change. Of the causes of this change he knew nothing; but he now appeared, as a representative of the people, desirous of some explanation. But how was this explanation to be obtained, unless through the appointment of a committee of inquiry? This was the object of the motion. Did gentlemen who wished well to the monarchical part of the constitution think that no occasional burthens were to be submitted to, with the view of increasing its dignity, and supporting its splendor? Was not the splendor and the dignity which the heir apparent was enabled to keep up, essentially connected with the honour and the dignity of the monarchy? One hon. member had contended, that the prince of Wales had obtained from the public, at different times, upwards of 500,000*l.*, and that therefore, to talk of the sacrifices which had been made by his Royal Highness, was to offer an insult to the country. This, however, was an insult which might be very easily resented; and that was, by showing how the account actually stood. When the whole account came to be fully examined, he believed that scarcely one of these statements would be found to be correct. Among the articles charged on the Prince to the public were the expenses of his education. This, however, was totally incorrect; as the expenses of his education were defrayed, not out of the consolidated fund, but from the civil list. The receipts from the duchy of Cornwall were stated at 234,000*l.*; and to be deducted from this sum he allowed the 125,000*l.* which had been given for the payments of his Royal Highness's debts. The sums expended in Carlton-house he could not allow to be fairly placed to his Royal Highness's account. If a prince of Wales was to be maintained at all, it was proper that he should be maintained in a style suited to his rank and prospects. He was not to be turned out into the world without some adequate provision. The whole amount of the sums which had been advanced for his Royal Highness being fairly considered, it would be found, that he was the least expensive Prince of Wales that ever existed. If the accounts were fairly balanced, it would, he was persuaded, be found, that 30,000*l.* was the amount of the whole of what had been advanced by the public by extraordinary grants. True it was, that his Royal Highness had an annual revenue of 125,000*l.* assigned to him in 1795. But this was what, from his rank and situation, he had an indisputable right to possess. If, in 1738, the grandfather of his Royal Highness enjoyed a clear income of 100,000*l.*, 125,000*l.* would not be reckoned too large in 1803. Economy was the cry perpetually from some members; but the manner in which this economy operated was rather singular. These economical gentlemen had, without the least evidence, granted 60,000*l.* to his Royal Highness, on the mere credit which they attached to the assertions of ministers. They granted the money, but they would hear nothing of a motion for inquiry. But had these scrupulous and economical gentlemen never heard any thing of the increase of the salaries of persons in public offices during the few last years? He did not mention this with any view of objecting to the increase; for, whatever were the views of economy which he encouraged, he had, on all occasions, been an advocate for a liberal provision to those employed in the public service. A long series of acts of kindness, on the part of his Royal Highness, had impressed his mind with the warmest gratitude; but at present he appeared merely in the performance of his public duty. He stood up for the support of the dignity and splendor of his Royal Highness; but he would be the advocate of this dignity and splendor only so far as they were consistent with the duty which he owed to his constituents.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that the present motion was to him a matter of extreme regret. It could not be necessary to declare, that it was made without the countenance of his Royal Highness. With regard to the message, with the proceeding upon it, and the share which his majesty's servants had in that proceeding, it was proper he should relate how the matter stood. Before that message was presented to the House, he thought it his duty to make his Royal Highness acquainted with it; and he had the satisfaction to say, that his Royal Highness entirely approved of it. With respect to the accounts which were stated to the House relative to his Royal Highness's incumbrances, he caused that statement to be submitted to his Royal Highness, together with the motion intended to be made. His Royal Highness was pleased to adopt the motion; and he conformed himself (as far as was consistent with his duty) to the wishes of his Royal Highness in every particular. He would not contend that the House was not at liberty to assent to the motion; but he would say, that it could not regularly be followed up by any efficient vote, without a recommendation from the crown. Now he had not received the authority of his majesty to recommend such a measure, and if a motion were made for the appointment of a committee, he should consider it to be his duty to withhold that recommendation. It was impossible for the House to suppose that his majesty, in the message of the 16th February, had it in contemplation to refer to any debts contracted by the Prince since 1795. These debts, if there were any, might be such as it would be highly honourable to his Royal Highness to wish to discharge, but they were debts which it was impossible for that House to examine. It would be disgraceful to have entered on the Journals a third proceeding for the payment of debts.—There was another point adverted to this night, and to which he referred with extreme pain; he meant the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall. One hon. gentleman had said, that the Prince had not been any burthen to the public. He knew that this question never could be put in that House in the invidious shape of which it was capable; gentlemen said, that this was an application, not to the liberality, but the justice of the House, and that his Royal Highness had made a great sacrifice in this case; for that if he had proceeded in his claim, the result would have enabled him to pay all his debts, and that he ought to be in a better situation than he will be placed by the bill before parliament. Now, with respect to the right, it was a point on which he did not think himself capable of forming a perfect opinion. The solicitor-general had spoken upon the question as a point in which there would be no difference of opinion after full consideration. Now, his learned friend was not right if he imagined there was no difference of opinion; for the learned lord, at the head of the law in England had expressed an opinion unfavourable to the claim of right. He might entertain some doubts upon the question; but certain it was, he had never expressed any opinion in favour of the claim of right. With regard to the learned lord at the head of the law in Ireland, he had never expressed any opinion in favour of this petition of right. It was therefore a little too much to say there was an unanimity of opinion among the most learned men upon this very intricate question. He could only say for himself, that had there been no proceeding whatever on the subject matter of the petition of right, if he had never heard of it, he should have been of opinion, that the Prince, under all the circumstances, ought to have had that which had been lately voted him.—The whole of the money expended by his majesty, and advanced out of the civil list, during the minority of the prince of Wales, was 195,000*l.* The sum of 5,000*l.* being allowed for the first nine years, the whole charge became 250,000*l.*; exceeding the receipts of the duchy during that period, by 17,000*l.* This being the state of the account, was it probable that those who opposed this motion, did so, from any apprehension of the result? For if his Royal Highness was entitled to the proceeds of the duchy of Cornwall, and that had been sufficient, there would not have been any provision for him out of the civil list, which was made to him from 1773 to 1783. From 1783 down to 1787, his majesty advanced on account of the Prince, out of the civil list, at the rate of 50,000*l.* a year, and from that period down to the present, his majesty advanced out of the civil list 60,000*l.* amounting in all to 1,600,000*l.* He was compelled also to state, that the money that had been deducted from that sum which had been once voted to the Prince of Wales to support his rank, and applied to the payment of his debts, amounted to 800,000*l.* principal and interest. Under these circumstances, it was too much to have it charged on ministers, or parliament, that there had been withheld from his Royal Highness that which he clearly ought to have, and that he had made sacrifices to the public. That the public interest was recognized in the public dignity of the Prince of Wales, he admitted; yet it was of less importance to the honour of the Prince himself, as well as to all other interests, that there should be a delay in his resuming his external dignity, than that the parliament should forfeit its consistency in recognizing debts of which they had no knowledge, and which they were bound to presume had no actual, since they could not have any legal existence; for, if the account given in the year 1795 was accurate, his Royal Highness could have no debts. He was, therefore, supporting the consistency of parliament, in resisting a proceeding by which parliament would recognise debts that, by its own previous proceedings, it could not suppose to exist. But he was perfectly convinced, after what was past, that, on the part of his Royal Highness, there would be no encouragement held out to this motion, by those who were in his confidence.

Mr. Fox said, that of all the objections against this motion, the one which appeared to him the most extraordinary was, that it was an indirect motion. It appeared to him one of the most direct and plain that ever was made, and one that resulted naturally and necessarily from the documents before the House. He was also not a little surprised at some of the doubts which had been thrown out, particularly with respect to that great and fundamental principle, that no money could be granted without a recommendation from the throne. In the first place, this was not an application for money; but surely the House must be aware that this principle, like many others, was liable to exceptions, because the House did frequently, by means of address, and in other ways, make grants of money without recommendations from the crown. But, without having recourse to that argument, it seemed to him that the message completely warranted the mode of proceeding now proposed. The purport of the message was, that the House should adopt such measures as appeared to them proper to promote the comfort and support the dignity of the Prince of Wales. The tendency of this motion, then, was evidently to follow the directions, and comply with the spirit of that message. If, after an inquiry, it should appear that the obstacles to the Prince resuming his splendor were of a nature such as the foreign debt alluded to, he should concur in any proposition for removing it. With regard to the deduction of 10 per cent, he thought also, that if that was one of the obstacles, it ought to be removed; but if they consisted of debts contracted since 1795, he was of opinion that the House was not bound to remove them. The right hon. gentleman had said, that considerable doubts existed among great law authorities with regard to the Prince's claims. That upon such a subject there should be doubts was not astonishing; but it appeared, even from the right hon. gentleman's statement, that the preponderance of legal opinion was in favour of the Prince's claim. Speaking, however, as a common man, and not as a lawyer, he would say, that his majesty could not be advised to come into a court of justice, and say in answer to the Prince's claim, "It is true that I received the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall; but then I educated the Prince of Wales handsomely, and gave him the same masters that I gave my other sons; and therefore I must be paid for it." Such a plea could never be made. It was too much to say that the Prince's claim had been abandoned, because he could make nothing of it. He wished to ask, whether the suit had not made some progress, and whether a wish had not been expressed to his Royal Highness, that the proceedings should be delayed? So far from considering that there was any thing improper in the legal investigation of that question, he should, if he had been an adviser of the Prince, say, that it would be better that the question should be amicably discussed in a legal way.—He now came to what had been said about the necessity of the Prince living in the splendor due to his rank: he was one of those who did not think that the dignity of a Prince or monarch depended altogether upon the number of lords that he had in attendance; but still that kind of state was not to be considered as nothing; for though the succession was hereditary, yet virtues were not! and, however convinced the House might be of the virtues of the present sovereign and the heir apparent, yet they could not be sure that in future times princes might possess the same virtues; and, therefore, a proper provision ought to be made to support the dignity of persons in such exalted situations. In every point of view, however, in which he could consider this question, he could see no possible reason why an inquiry should not take place. If upon investigation it should appear, that a large sum was necessary to remove the incumbrances upon the Prince, perhaps he should not agree to it; if a small sum would be sufficient, he thought the House ought to grant it. Among the Prince's debts there was one that deserved consideration, and that was, the sums which had been laid out upon Carleton-house. His majesty had lent the Prince that House for a residence; but it was in such a state that it was absolutely necessary to expend a large sum upon it, and it should also be recollected, that the Prince had only 20,000*l.* given to him as a kind of outfit in life, so that it was obvious that he must get considerably in debt. With regard to the debts of the civil list, they had been frequently paid; and upon no other ground than the great increase in all the articles of life. This he thought was a bad mode of proceeding; because if you increased the incomes of princes when the price of the articles of life were dear, they would find it very difficult to lower them when the prices fell. It had always been considered as bad policy (he meant nothing disrespectful in the observation) to raise the wages of servants when provisions were dear, because it was hardly ever possible to reduce them when provisions were cheap. The whole effect of this motion was, to go into an inquiry; the House, by assenting to it, would not pledge itself to any payment.

Colonel Grosvenor hoped that something would immediately be done to enable his Royal Highness to resume that kind of establishment in which his birth, and the nature of the constitution required him to be placed.

Sir W. W. Wynn was of opinion that throughout the whole of the transaction his Royal Highness had been extremely ill used. He hoped the hon. mover would exert his best endeavours to accomplish the object he had in view.

Mr. Erskine observed, in explanation, that he was wholly ignorant of the object of the present motion, until it was stated to the House, for which he should certainly, as an independent member of parliament, give his vote, and not at all under any influence derived from his situation under the Prince. Much had been said concerning the different opinions respecting his Royal Highness's claims to the revenue of the duchy during his minority; all he could say was, that he had never been absent but once when they were under consideration, and that whilst he was present no one professional gentleman had given a decided opinion against them—not even a learned lord, then attorney general, and who now so ably presided in the highest court of law; but those opinions, to whatever side they might incline, were wholly foreign to the present question, it being fit, independently of all legal controversy, that parliament should enable the king to fulfil his parental intention respecting his son's situation; and if the sum already granted was not sufficient to enable his Royal Highness to support the dignity of his station, the House should offer to his majesty the further means of accomplishing an object which the House and the nation seemed equally to desire and to expect.

Mr. Canning said, that, in voting for it, he did not intend to pledge himself to concur in the recommendation of the committee. When he was informed of the sum to be proposed, and of the object to which it was to be applied, then he might be able to say whether the object was worth that sum or not. All he now knew was, that the sum proposed was inadequate to the attainment of the object, the accomplishment of which the House had in view.

Mr. Sheridan hoped the previous question would be withdrawn, that the House might come to a candid declaration on a subject upon which there seemed to be so little difference of opinion. What, he would ask, was the original ground upon which the House was induced, a few days since, to adopt any proceeding on this business? A message from his majesty, graciously recommending to the consideration of parliament the affairs of his Royal Highness, with a view to the improvement of his comforts, and the resumption of his dignity. Without inquiry, 60,000*l.* per annum was voted, in conformity to the tenor and spirit of the royal message. The House, however, was since in possession of a communication from his Royal Highness, declaring that, notwithstanding the wishes of his majesty and parliament that he should resume the dignity appropriate to his rank, and notwithstanding the liberality of parliament, he must defer the resumption of that dignity, on account of debts, to the discharge of which he considered himself bound in honour. Here, then, were documents sufficient for the House to proceed upon. What, then, was the motive proposed by the original motion this night? merely to inquire what was the nature of the impediment which prevented his Royal Highness, with such aid, from the immediate resumption of his dignity; or how far short the sum already voted, actually fell of the means for completely disembarassing his Royal Highness. In point of consistency, it was impossible to refuse the inquiry. An hon. member (Mr. Johnstone) had opposed all inquiry or further extension of national generosity on this head; and had gone into an arithmetical calculation to prove, that his Royal Highness had no claims upon the country, and that, upon a fair balance of accounts, there was a charge against him on the ground of the Cornish revenues. But though the hon. member piqued himself upon his flippancy in figures, his argument was a little of the latest. On the night when he could have offered it in time, the hon. member held his tongue. The hon. member, too, with great sagacity, had found out, that in 1795, when a former arrangement had been made by the House, a spirit of Jacobinism prevailed, and therefore it became necessary to support the dignity of the crown, without regard to expense. It was, however, an argument rather strange, that it was only during the reign of Jacobinism that monarchy was supported in its fullest splendor; but that now, when Jacobinism was exploded, the necessity for supporting the dignity of the royal family should completely cease, and that cold calculation and rigid economy were to resume their domination. He had somewhere read a story of a grave conversation between two venerable owls, in a ruined temple, situated in the dominions of an ancient tyrant, in which one bird said to the other, "Long live the good king Ambrose! so long as he lives to carry on his devastations, we owls shall never want ruins to build our nests in." So might the royal family say, "Long live the Jacobins! for so long as their influence obtains, we shall enjoy all the dignity and splendor appropriate to our rank; but the moment the love of monarchy resumes its place in the hearts of the people, we shall be thrown on the shelf, and all farther necessity for maintaining our respect and dignity be utterly exploded." The hon. member had said, that the items for the Prince's education ought to be charged against him. The fact was, the Prince was no more chargeable on this ground than the duke of York, or any other of the royal branches with whom he participated in the same nursery, and the same preceptors; and what could be more ungracious than to charge his Royal Highness's infancy with so much for cradle, so much for pap, so much for coral, and so much for school-books? But the fact was, that this account had nothing to do with the business; as the whole of these charges were defrayed out of her majesty's privy purse, with that maternal tenderness that ever distinguished her royal character. The hon. baronet, who moved the previous question had very sagaciously discovered, that to support the dignity of the heir apparent, nothing more was necessary than the inherent virtues of his Royal Highness, and that the pomp and trappings of state were all nonsense and useless expense. Be it so. He had no objection to admit the principle of the hon. baronet, provided the principle was applied generally to all the branches of the royal family, and to all the great officers of state, instead of being confined merely to the heir apparent. The saving to the nation would, no doubt, be considerable, by the substitution of personal virtue for official grandeur. "For instance, Sir," (said Mr. Sheridan), "you whom I have the honour to address, might dispense with the expensive splendor of that elegant house which is now building for you, and all the state attached to your official suite whenever you are to obey the orders of this House: in going up to present an address to his majesty, you will have no occasion to take with you that shining bauble which is here the symbol of your power, nor to travel in that splendid gewgaw the gilded coach, at present an appendage of your office. You have only to walk to St. James's, wrapt up in your virtues and a warm sur-tout; and if it should rain, you will have the privilege of carrying an umbrella. There will be no occasion for all the state attached to the movements of our judges on circuit; they can travel in the mail-coaches, and the bar can move as outside passengers, if they should not prefer the salutary exercise of walking. The chief magistrate of our metropolis will have no farther occasion to display all the splendor, finery, and raree-show attached to his office, which has been hitherto the wonder of foreigners, as the symbols of your national wealth and civic dignity. You will then hear no more of Mansion-house banquets, of turtle and venison feasts, of gorgeous processions on lord mayor's days, of aquatic trips from Blackfriars to Westminster, in gilded barges, with bands of music, and civic regalia. No; the lord mayor and sheriffs may proceed to St. James's in hackney coaches, and dine on their return at Dolly's chop-house, instead of banquetting at Guildhall [loud laughter]. In short, Sir, by extending this saving system to secretaries, and under-secretaries of state, and various other officers, you may save money; but I question much if you will thereby improve the popular respect for the state, or any thing which belongs to it."—Was it, he would ask, a wise economy, while income was increased not only to every other branch of the royal family, and every office and department of the state, to hold restriction only on that illustrious personage, in whom we contemplated a successor to the crown, and who was not only debarred thus from resuming his rank, but from the means of returning the common hospitalities of the nobility of the land, in a manner befitting his station? Mr. S. concluded by expressing his high approbation of the dignified manner in which his Royal Highness relinquished all further claims to the arrears on the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, in consequence of the arrangement made by the House of Commons; and which arrangement was publicly avowed as by no means a compromise, with a view to stop the proceedings in the suit commenced by his Royal Highness on the advice of that House. Never was prince better advised on any occasion by his law officers.

Lord Hawkesbury contended, that if ministers did not concur in the present motion, it was because they did not imagine it calculated to accomplish the object which the House had in view. His object in rising was, to observe on the manner in which some gentlemen seemed to understand his majesty's message. There was nothing in that message that went to show that upon the sum of 60,000*l.* being granted to the Prince, his Royal Highness would be obliged immediately to resume his household, and the state and splendor that should accompany it. The words of the message warranted no such meaning. In conformity to the royal recommendation, parliament had agreed to grant his Royal Highness the sum of about 70,000*l.* to relieve him from his difficulties, and to promote his comfort; but nothing appeared, either in the message or the proceedings of parliament upon it, which made it a necessary consequence that the Prince should immediately resume his household. It was true, indeed, that his right hon. friend was desirous that his Royal Highness should be restored to the situation in which he stood previous to the arrangement in 1795; but with all the respect which was due to the feelings of his Royal Highness, was the House prepared to take cognizance of debts, with the nature of which it could not be supposed to be acquainted; or rather, would not their wisdom dictate to them that they should not open any new account of debts whatever? And, in that opinion, they surely would not press upon his Royal Highness the necessity of resuming his household, until the debts which he felt to weigh upon his honour were fully discharged.

Lord Castlereagh should beg leave to call the attention of the House to the two objections which more immediately pressed upon his mind. The first was, the want of the distinct authority of his Royal Highness. The messages which had been communicated to the House, the proceedings instituted in consequence of them, were fresh in the recollection of gentlemen; and he would ask those who opposed the previous question, whether they could, after the sentiments expressed on the part of the Prince, establish the proposed committee of inquiry? It had also been stated, that the original motion was not sanctioned by his Royal Highness's authority. Since, therefore, the Prince was not a party in the question which was so earnestly pressed, would it be delicate to agree to an inquiry? The investigation might lead to facts which it might not be proper to disclose. There were, he was convinced, many circumstances of a nature which ought not to become the subject of inquiry. The grounds upon which the House had hitherto acted with respect to the provision made, both for his Royal Highness's dignity and comforts, and for the payment of his debts, were public grounds; and he trusted they would not be easily relinquished.

The previous question being put, That that question be now put, the House divided:

The Prince of Wales's Annuity bill passed the Commons on the 7th. On the 14th it was read a second time in the House of Lords; previously to which lord Pelham made some observations on the length of time, the prince had lived in a state of comparative obscurity; and the universal wish that seemed now to pervade the House, and the public, that he should be relieved from his difficulties. Lord Moira stated, that on account of debts, which the Prince found binding upon him, both in honour and in justice, he was prevented even now from resuming his state and dignity; but felt grateful to parliament, and content with the allowance they had made him; and had instructed his counsel to drop the proceedings respecting the duchy of Cornwall. The Earl of Carlisle felt, that this provision was not sufficient to enable his Royal Highness to resume his state; but in the present circumstances of the country, he thought no more could be done. The Earl of Darnley was of the same opinion, but did not consider the situation of the country so perilous as to justify despondency. The Duke of Norfolk thought the allowance for the Prince insufficient; and that a person of his elevated rank in the state, ought not to be left in a situation, where he was eclipsed by many lords and commoners. Lord Caernarvon disapproved of the bill, as inadequate to its object, and as unconstitutional, in getting rid of the Cornwall claims, which was a civil list debt, without any inquiry. The Earl of Moira denied that the abandonment of the Cornwall claims was at all the effect of a compromise: his Royal Highness had made that claim for the benefit of his creditors, but when he found that the allowance now proposed would enable him to satisfy his debts, without recurring to it, he abandoned it with pleasure.—The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—The original proposition which had been made by ministers, for giving the prince of Wales an annuity of 60,000*l.* per annum for three years was the final settlement of this important business: for in a few days after, an event took place, which caused the Prince to signify to the House by Mr. Erskine, his chancellor, that he could not think at such a time, of increasing the burthens of the country; and that he was perfectly satisfied with what parliament had done.

Debate in the Commons on the Nottingham Election Bill.] March 16. Mr. Hawkins Browne, from the select committee who were appointed to try and determine the merits of the petition of Daniel Parker Coke, esq., and also of the petitions of the several other persons, complaining of an undue election and return for the town and county of the town of Nottingham, informed the House, that the said select committee have determined that Joseph Birch, esq. and Daniel Parker Coke, esq., are not duly elected; and that the last election for Nottingham is void, with respect to one of the burgesses to serve in parliament for the same.—And also, that the said petitions, and the opposition of Joseph Birch, esq. thereto, did not appear to the said committee to be frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. Hawkins Browne also acquainted the House, that the said select committee had come to the following Resolutions:

1. That it appears to this committee, that John Allen, being the returning officer at the last election for Nottingham, acted contrary to his duty in opening a poll, and proceeding to take the votes of electors for the period of about an hour, and until forty-four electors had polled, there being, during the whole of that time, no third candidate.
2. That after the first day of the said election, the freedom of the election was grossly violated, by disturbances and riots, accompanied with personal intimidation and violence, practised and continued during the six subsequent days of polling.
3. That the petitioner D. P. Coke, esq., after sustaining several insults, and suffering personal violence, was obliged, from the just apprehension of hazard to his life, to leave the place, and could not venture to return; and that a large number of electors in his interest were deterred from exercising their franchise of voting. 4. That John Davison, the mayor, and Joseph Oldknow, and Thos. Oldknow, two of the aldermen of Nottingham, took no effectual means to preserve the freedom of election, or restore it when so violated, or to punish the offenders. 5. That it appears to this committee, by an entry in the corporation book of Nottingham, that at a common hall, held on Thursday the 8th of January last past (after reciting the petitions referred to this committee), it was 'Resolved, that this corporation ' will defray all such legal expenses as ' have already been, or shall hereafter be ' incurred by them the said J. Davison,

' J. Oldknow, T. Oldknow, and J. Allen,
' or either of them, or George Coldham,
' under their direction, in preparing for,
' or making their defences; and that the ' chamberlains for the time being be ' hereby authorized and directed, from ' time to time, to advance Mr. Coldham
' all and every such sum and sums of ' money as may be necessary for this ' purpose.'

It appearing that the mayor and aldermen have, by charter, an exclusive jurisdiction within the town and county of the town of Nottingham, and the committee thinking it highly expedient to provide some better security than is likely to be provided by the corporation of Nottingham, to preserve the peace within the said town and county thereof, and to prevent the repetition of the same disgraceful scenes; Resolved, 1. "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the House be moved for leave to bring in a bill to give the magistrates of the county of Nottingham concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates of the town and county of the town of Nottingham. 2. That unless such or some other measure to the like effect be taken previously to the next election for Nottingham, there is no reasonable hope that a free election can be had. 3. That the evidence adduced before this committee be laid before the House for its consideration. 4. That it appears to this committee, that Alexander Foxcroft was employed to procure signatures to one of the petitions referred to this committee, namely, that signed by 537 petitioners, and containing the following allegations:—'That at the said ' election they had determined to poll for
' the said D. P. Coke, but that such was ' the violence of the mob, systematically ' regulated and conducted for the pur' pose, that they were completely intimidated, and thereby prevented from polling for the said D. P. Coke.—That the ' said John Davison, the mayor, John

' Allen, the sheriff, T. Oldknow and J.
' Oldknow, two of the aldermen of the ' said town, and who, by virtue of their ' offices, were magistrates, frequently attended on the hustings, and were repeatedly applied to, to preserve the ' peace of the place, and the freedom of ' election; but the said magistrates took ' no effectual steps to prevent any of the ' violent or illegal acts which took place
' at the said election.'—5. That the said A. Foxcroft stated to those who signed that petition, that it was a petition for those who would have voted for Mr. Coke, but he admitted that the major part of them were not acquainted with the allegations against the magistrates and sheriffs, and that about sixteen of those who signed the petition were, to his knowledge, not at Nottingham at the time of the election."

The said report was ordered to be taken into consideration on the 20th of April; and Mr. Speaker was directed not to issue his warrant for a new writ.

April 20. The House proceeded to take the said report into consideration. The first resolution was postponed; the second, third, and fourth were agreed to; and the subsequent ones were postponed. After which,

Mr. Hawkins Browne recapitulated the circumstances of the shameful riots which had been permitted to go on in Nottingham during the late election, not only to the alarm of the peaceable inhabitants and the personal injury of many individuals, but to the total violation of every thing like the freedom of election. Whether those riots proceeded from a neglect of duty on the part of the magistrates, or from the inadequacy of the powers vested in their hands, it would not now be relevant to inquire; it was obvious, however, that some step was necessary on the part of the House, in order to prevent the recurrence of such shameful disgraces. The purport of the bill, which he should move for leave to introduce, would be to appoint such officers to act in aid of the civil power during every future election, and to give such jurisdiction to the magistrates and the county at large, as should more effectually tend to preserve the peace of that town and its vicinage; and to preserve the freedom of election. He then moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for the more effectually preserving the peace, and securing the freedom of election in the town of Nottingham."

Mr. Pierrepoint bore his testimony to the shameful state of riot and outrage in which he himself found that town, on his visit there during the election; a state of riot and outrage so utterly uncontrollable by the civil power, as to render the interference of a military force absolutely indispensable. Such proceedings were not only violatory of the freedom of election, but dangerous to the lives of the peaceable inhabitants, and disgraceful to a civilized country. The magistrates he would not charge with actually encouraging the rioters, but he would state, that they stood by as idle and indifferent spectators, without making due exertions for the suppression of those riots. He, therefore, most cordially approved of the bill.

Mr. Fox said, that whatever measure the House should think fit to adopt on this occasion, he trusted they would not be satisfied to support it upon mere assertion, however respectable the quarter the information came from. If what was alleged by the hon. gentleman was founded, then were the committee most grossly defective in their duty. But if he was to form his opinion upon the evidence before that committee, he could find no such charge substantiated. On the contrary, those magistrates deserved thanks, for having done every thing in their power to preserve the peace, without having the desired effect. It appeared that they had given every aid which the civil power could possibly afford; and if that was unsuccessful, the fault was not theirs. The chief charge against the mayor was, that he was averse to seeing the election booth surrounded by a military force, and the electors constrained to give their votes under the intimidating influence of a body of armed soldiers; a thing which must be allowed directly to militate against the letter and spirit of every election act, and of the British constitution itself. It appeared also, on the minutes of the committee, that an uncontrollable spirit of riot had prevailed upon former elections in that town. Therefore, though he fully agreed that some bill was necessary, he could not see the justice of implicating the magistrates. But whatever measure was adopted, he trusted that no power of so obnoxious a nature would be given, as that of calling in a military force. He had heard an instance quoted by a very eloquent member of this House, of an election carried on at Brussels, within a hollow square of the French army; but he trusted never to hear of an election for a member of that House carried on upon such principles.

Mr. Bond coincided with those who had stated the shameful riots which existed at Nottingham during the election, to which he was himself a witness, and many atrocious instances of which he recapitulated; particularly, that a cant phrase was in common use, by which every person whose conduct or principles were held obnoxious to the opinions of a self-appointed tribunal of the Nottingham mob, was threatened with a complaint to "punch;" or that "punch," would visit them for it; the obvious meaning of which was, that the land, garden, orchard, cattle, or any out-door property of the party liable to depredation, was sure to be despoiled or plundered; and this passed without any material interference of the magistrates. He wished, therefore, to see the jurisdiction extended to the magistrates of the county at large, that the aid of the posse comitatus might be resorted to. He could not conceive upon what ground the hon. member who spoke last gave his opposition to a measure so necessary.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

April 25. Mr. Fox presented a petition against the bill, from the mayor and corporation of Nottingham, who stated, that it would be a virtual censure upon, and degradation of, the corporation, without any imputation of delinquency; and a violation, in the persons of the magistrates, of those rights and privileges, which Nottingham had enjoyed for nearly 400 years.

April 29. On the order of the day for the second reading, Mr. Serjeant Lens appeared at the bar, and was heard against the bill. After which, the bill was read a second time.

Mr. Hawkins Browne said, that the evidence not only proved that dreadful riots took place during the last election, but on all similar occasions in that town. The bill went to put an end to those scenes of disorder. He did not see a single evil that could arise from the bill, and should therefore move, that it be committed on Monday.

[4 K]

Mr. Henderson said, that the object of the bill seemed to be to increase the magistrates of Nottingham. It was, in effect, to annul its charter. Now, by the 27th Hen. 8th, c. 24, the crown had the sole right of appointing justices. Though Nottingham was locally situated in the county of Nottingham, it was, by its charter as distinct from it as the county of York. The proper mode of attaining the end of the bill appeared to him to be, to bring in a bill to enable his majesty to repeal so much of the charter of Nottingham as gives an exclusive jurisdiction to the corporate magistrates; and thence, by the common law, the county magistrates would have a right to exercise jurisdiction in the town.

Mr. Fox entered into a defence of the Nottingham magistracy, and protested against the use of the word 'lenity,' as applied to those gentlemen—it was insulting and unjust. They were ready to answer any charges that could be brought forward. They desired to know the nature of their guilt, if any could be alleged, and the degree to which they were guilty? But this was not done. They were not to be taken before any legal tribunal; but they were to suffer, from a kind of punishment which excluded trial and defence. Did they request not to be prosecuted? No. Did they try to elude legal punishment? No. Why, then, talk of lenity? Those respectable magistrates were thus slandered by implication, and without any specific evidence to justify it. He wished the investigation of their character should be left to the laws, that if they had neglected their duty, they should be brought to the bar of the court of King's-bench; but that they should not be attacked in the smooth and lenient style in which some gentlemen had dealt. It was the duty of the committee to have ascertained and stated the degree of guilt which attached to the magistracy; it should not have expressed any doubt on the subject. The justice and dignity of parliament should forbid it. He would only ask of gentlemen to take a candid review of the conduct of the magistrates of Nottingham for some years back. It was perfectly true, that they had in many instances, like prudent men, yielded to some inconveniencies, rather than by resistance expose themselves to still greater. There existed in that town, two parties exceedingly hostile to each other—the Old Whigs and the Tories. The latter party, favourable to the views of government, had been in the habit of calumniating all its opponents, and particularly the corporation of the town. The house and mills of Mr. Davison, a most respectable gentleman, were attacked—so were the house and person of Mr. Oldknow; and they were obliged to endure it. The power of government was not with them. Those riots, however, provoked no legislative interference. The impotent corporation was left to suffer. There was no party spirit to induce any bill for their protection; but, in 1802, a pressing necessity for this important innovation on an old charter, is found to exist, in order, as it is professed, to secure the freedom of election. The bill went to establish a precedent for the invasion of ancient charters—to take from the people the appointment of their magistrates. It was not a measure merely drawn to meet and repress riots; but to give to magistrates appointed by the crown a concurrent jurisdiction with that of the corporation; and for the purpose, too, of giving a triumph to that party in the town which had never been found backward in rioting. This was the first case in which a popular tumult in any corporation town was made a pretence for invading the privileges of that corporation. As a proof of the police of this town, he would ask any of the judges who had gone that circuit for the last ten years, whether they knew of any town where a smaller number of crimes had been committed? Though during that space of time this town was under the government of some of the most enlightened men in the country, they were condemned to suffer from popular fury more severely, perhaps, than the members of any other party; but yet things went on as smoothly as in other towns agitated by opposite political parties, until the late election, when two candidates appeared; and if the sheriff had immediately returned them, or rather if Mr. Coke had not delayed in order to register some free-men, the House would have heard nothing of this bill. It is said that the magistrates did not give a due opposition to the riots which took place during the election; but it did not appear, in the minutes of the committee, that they were in any instance culpable. Did they refuse to do any thing which the friends of Mr. Coke requested? No; except that of calling in the military to surround the booth, not to secure the freedom of election, but to dictate to the electors. Let them be charged with rejecting the application to make it a military election, and try the event; but don't let them be the victims of loose, indefinite accusations. What remedy could be derived from the interference of county magistrates in case of riots? What means could they employ different from, or better than, those in the power of the corporation? Was it supposed that the mere increase of the number of magistrates would answer; or was it proposed to call in the posse comitatus of the county to preserve the peace? Of this he could not approve; the bill, however, would be much less objectionable, if it authorised the interference of county magistrates only in case of riots. It did not follow, because on such occasions their assistance might be necessary, that therefore they were to participate in the whole municipal jurisdiction of the town. This would be a deviation from the old established policy of this country; for it would enable the magistrates of the king's appointment to rule over the magistrates of the people's election. It would be extending that dangerous power of the crown—dangerous he would call it, and the history of the nation had shown the danger of it, for the first attack of all those who meditated the subversion of British liberty was upon corporate towns, upon those charters which formed the best security of popular rights, and the most effectual control on ministerial power. Nottingham was about to lose its privileges for exercising its control. The independent spirit of its corporation was to be the cause of that privation. It was mockery to attribute it to riots; for riots had happened in almost every corporate town; and was that to be received as a reason for invading charters? Was it to be said, "because the peace of your town has been disturbed by an election riot; your corporate rights shall be done away, and we shall give the government of your town to the king's magistrates." Such was the language of the bill before the House. The provisions of this bill would not be quite so bad if they applied to riots only; if they were confined to that, yielding to bad times and to bad principles, he perhaps, though he would not like it, might not oppose it; but in its present shape it was utterly inconsistent with his ideas of justice or constitutional freedom.

Mr. Bond said, that the operation of the bill was not, to create any magistracy, but to extend the authority of a magistracy already created; and that an act of parliament may do this, without any invasion of the prerogative of the crown, he had many analogous cases to show. The preamble of the bill did not merely state the late riots at Nottingham, but took notice of many former riots; and the single question now propounded to the House, was, whether they should apply a remedy to that evil? If any member on reading the whole of the evidence, would say that the mayor of Nottingham deserved praise, he had a temper and a mode of thinking not to be envied. The magistrates of Nottingham were criminally responsible for their conduct at the late election; but there were many material circumstances of extenuation in their case; and therefore, it was his wish, that lenient measures should be adopted; but if he could have no remedy such as this bill proposed, he must pursue these magistrates as criminals. With regard to the justice of the case, he would inquire, whether this was an invasion of the rights of any parties? and if it was, whether it was strictly necessary? Confining the right of election to a few, might render that right valuable; but it was not for the value of it to a magistrate that the power was given to him; it was for the advantage of the place where he was to act; and if that advantage was not accomplished by the office being properly filled up, the interference of that House was necessary. This was particularly the case of corporations: from the nature of their constitutions, if their magistrates did not properly fill up their situations, they became a blot upon the character; for the inhabitants of a chartered corporation had none of the common privileges of another place. They were not like common subjects. To cure the evil of their magistrates' inefficiency, they had no advantages but their charter, which, if their magistrates did not do their duty, they could not enjoy; so that they might be said to be left out of the reach of the law. This was the case of the town of Nottingham. The truth was, that at Nottingham, they were used to riots. This was not only the case at an election for a member of parliament, but of every election whatever. It had been said, that the magistrates of Nottingham had received the thanks of the judges once; now, he had information that riots often happened at the time of the assizes at Nottingham. It was said there was nothing like this bill to be found any where; whereas there were many cases analogous to this. The power of magistrates under charter had been increased where their power had been found deficient. This was the case of the borough of Leicester; the magistrates there had a power of concurrent jurisdiction over parts of the country. The same case applied to Clitheroe, where the magistrates of the borough interfere with those of the county, and this principle was recognised in a statute of Henry 7th, which he cited. There was also an Irish act, 38 Geo. 3rd, c. 73, by which the magistrates of the counties can go to all the boroughs to convict those who are guilty of selling spirituous liquors contrary to law. The Coventry case was likewise analogous. All these showed that parliament had interfered in the conduct of magistrates in boroughs, as well as in places without charters, when the public welfare could not be supported by these chartered customs. He must express an anxious wish, that independent gentlemen should act for Nottingham; and if that was not to be the consequence of the bill, it would be useless. But how could it be required, that a person who was to act as a magistrate under the authority of this bill, should take out a dedimus potestatem, for the purpose of merely running his head into a riot, without having any means of preventing it? Magistrates had much to do in a quiet way, as well as acting on occasions of actual riot. He believed, that if the House adopted this bill, they would adopt the best means that had yet been offered to remedy a considerable evil, and that the magistrates would become, what they ought to be, a protection to the good, and a terror to the wicked.

Mr. Peter Moore, in a maiden speech, said, that he thought the magistrates had neglected their duty in this case. He had witnessed some riotous proceedings at Coventry. In the business of Nottingham there was much to lament, and much to correct; but he saw nothing in the report upon this subject which the magistrates of that town were not now competent to correct. He thought that every necessary provision should be made to prevent the recurrence of the evil without overturning the constitution of the borough. There was nothing wanting but to awaken the magistrates out of their dormancy, and that was to be effected by making them feel the severities of the law, for criminally neglecting their duty.

Mr. Grey complained that the resolutions of the committee were deficient in precision. They made heavy charges against the magistrates of Nottingham, without specifying those parts of the evidence on which the charges were supported. He could not but consider the bill as a bill of disfranchisement. He wished to know distinctly in what the fault of the magistrates of Nottingham consisted? Was it in their want of power, or their want of inclination, to preserve the peace of the town? It had not been proved that they were censurable in either of these respects. The learned gentleman had spoken of the lenity of the bill. Now what was the situation of the parties to whom this boasted lenity was applied? Are they not men anxious that every part of their conduct should be investigated. But, in the absence of all conclusive testimony against them, labouring under a charge of the most foul and atrocious kind, and denied all opportunity or means of repelling, they deprecated a measure which went to deprive them of a most important constitutional privilege. In whatever point of view the subject was considered, the remedy proposed was inadequate. Was it meant to be said that the magistrates fomented disturbances? In support of so serious a charge, there was not a tittle of evidence. He had to say then, that during the absence of riots, there was no evidence of the inadequacy of the magistrates to preserve the good order of the town. All that was therefore necessary was, that additional power should be given when the existence of riots rendered the ordinary police of the town inadequate to the maintenance of tranquillity. He was therefore in favour of a clause to this effect.

Mr. Rose said, the bill was rendered indispensably necessary, not merely by recent occurrences, but by the successive history of riots, which he could trace to almost every former election at Nottingham, so far as 120 years back. In none of these cases did it appear that the magistrates were competent to preserve peace; and whether this incompetence arose from imbecility, negligence, or want of sufficient powers, some measure appeared to be indispensable, which should secure the peace of the town.

The bill was ordered to be committed on Monday.

May 3. On the order of the day for the third reading of the bill,

Mr. Fox said, that he considered it calculated for the future undermining of the laws of this country, by throwing an additional power into the hands of the executive.—Was the bill formed under the supposition of guilt or innocence? If not guilty, there was no occasion for parliamentary interference; if guilty, the laws were sufficient for their punishment. If the magistrates in the execution of their duty could not suppress such riots, the proper remedy would be, to enlarge their powers, by adding to their numbers, according to the constitution of that body; but by no means by the addition of others, where an elective magistracy had alone existed. It was a strong feature of the constitution, that the magistracy of this country was divided between the appointment of the crown and the right of election. The county magistrates were appointed by the crown, and in towns the magistracy was generally elective. It was said, that the inhabitants of Nottingham were not interested in this subject. Had men no interest in electing their magistrates, by whom they were to be governed? But you say the elective magistrates have not been able to do their duty. If Nottingham is said to be riotous, other places were equally so. If the magistrates were guilty, let them be tried. But it was a new principle, that if elective magistrates were guilty, those who had the right of election should be injured. He strongly objected to the jesuitism of the proposition, not to impute guilt, and yet to punish by rendering men objects of contempt. He objected to the bill as a precedent, which, if followed up, would not leave a corporation existing in the country. Riots had prevailed in almost every part of the country; and if, which God forbid, the riots of 1780 should again happen, it would be a ground for disfranchising even London.

After a short debate, the question being put, That the bill be now read a third time, the House divided:

Proceedings against James Trotter for Contempt of the Orders of the House.

March 25. Lord Euston presented a petition from James Trotter, now a prisoner in the custody of the serjeant at arms, in consequence of not having obeyed the summons of the House to attend as a witness before the Dunfermline election committee. The petitioner acknowledged his fault; begged pardon of the House; declared he had erred from ignorance; that his absence from home was a great detriment to his private affairs; and prayed that he might be set at liberty. The noble lord then moved that he be brought up on Monday, in order to be discharged.—Mr. Tierney said, it was proper to consider how the rights of a petitioner might be affected, if a material witness refused to attend. The conduct of this man the House ought particularly to set its face against. It was more dangerous, as affecting the rights of election, than even perjury or prevarication. These could be detected, but nothing could compensate for a man's withholding his evidence altogether. If this man had been forthcoming, his evidence would have made a most material alteration in the decision of the committee. He should therefore move, that he be brought up, in order to be committed to Newgate for six months. A long conversation then took place, relative to the proceeding that ought to be adopted on this occasion. It was at last agreed, That J. Trotter should be brought to the bar of the House on Monday next.

March 28. James Trotter was heard in his defence. After he was taken from the bar, lord Euston moved, "That he be again brought to the bar, in order to his being discharged."

Mr. Tierney considered this punishment as altogether insufficient. He could by no means believe, that the prisoner could have remained so long ignorant of a summons, from such high authority, as the Speaker of the House of Commons, which was a thing that must have been spoken of, as a circumstance rather unusual in the neighbourhood. It was much more likely, that he was absent from his house to avoid being obliged to answer some questions he might be asked, about bribing a voter at Queen's Ferry. He thought, that he ought to be committed to Newgate; and should move a resolution, declaring the sense the House entertained of his conduct, and should follow that up, by a motion for committing him to Newgate.

Mr. Sheridan also thought an exemplary punishment should be inflicted upon him; he, himself, had confessed, that between the times of the service of the first and second warrants, he had returned to his family; and yet he had paid no attention to the warrant he had seen.

The Lord Advocate was against a severe punishment, on the ground, that there was no wilful contempt; but, that the prisoner might have really thought the first order needed not be obeyed, as he did not receive it till after the day on which it specified, that he ought to attend: he thought his confinement, his being brought up here, nearly 400 miles, and his expressions of sorrow, should weigh with the House, against inflicting a severe punishment.

Mr. W. Dundas and lord Dunlop thought, that under all the circumstances, of what he had already suffered, and his situation in life, he might now be reprimanded and discharged.

Mr. Fox said, that when he looked to all the circumstances of the case, he felt strongly the propriety of inflicting some very signal punishment on the prisoner for the crime of which he had been found guilty. He could not, indeed, conceive how any man who had the smallest respect for the privileges of the House, or the importance of a free and fair election, could possibly think of voting for the motion of the noble lord. He had no difficulty in saying that, in a moral point of view, prevarication and perjury were crimes of a more atrocious kind than that of which the prisoner stood convicted; but it was to be considered, that there were laws to which these crimes were amenable, and that the institutions of society had attached to them a punishment adequate to their enormity. Was it, however, so with the crime of which the prisoner had confessed his guilt. If it was not to be signally punished, where was the case to present itself when severity of punishment was to be employed? If the House were so far wanting to themselves as to suffer this crime to escape with impunity, there was no longer any protection for the rights of individuals in the exercise and enjoyment of the highest privilege of a free people. What was the case now before the House?

The prisoner says that he was duly served with the order for his attendance. Ignorance is not therefore the plea on which he rests his defence. He tells the House, however, very plainly, that, if he had known of the dangers of disobedience, he would, without hesitation, have complied with the order. The house were called on to consider well the nature of such a defence. If ignorance of the danger of disobedience was, in this instance, admitted, what could prevent the same plea from being set up in every other quarter? Bribery and corruption were to be severely punished. But would any man say that wilful absence was not equally criminal, when, in consequence of this absence, the existence of this bribery and corruption could not be established, and individuals were deprived of their just rights and privileges with regard to the national representation? If cases of this nature were once suffered to pass with impunity, witnesses, on points of the highest importance, might be kept back, and no redress for the injured party could be obtained. In certain circumstances, they might be kept back to prevent a most material subject from being brought to a full and fair investigation; and, in other instances, this absence might be useful to conceal the existence of practices which no principle of our constitution could sanction. Under such circumstances, it was only necessary for a candidate, however corrupt the manner in which his election was carried, to calculate the expense of keeping back material witnesses, and then the whole business of election would become a matter of mere calculation. On this plain ground, he was decidedly hostile to the original motion. It appeared to him that a case of manifest guilt had been made out against the prisoner, and therefore he should give his hearty concurrence to the amendment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer dwelt on the importance of preserving the privileges of the House, and said, he could not consent to allow the prisoner, under all the aggravating circumstances of the case, to be discharged without a more exemplary punishment. He confirmed and illustrated the arguments of all the former speakers on the same side, and in the course of his argument discovered the extent of his knowledge of parliamentary proceedings.

Mr. Rose contended for a punishment in the present instance, far more severe than a simple reprimand. The crime was one pregnant with evil, and no time ought to be lost in showing the public that it was one which the legislature were determined to punish with severity.

Mr. T. Grenville delivered a warm speech in support of an exemplary punishment. He supported, with filial enthusiasm, the spirit and tendency of that bill, from which the public has derived such important advantages. A motion such as that which had been originally brought forward was one which would disgrace the Journals of parliament, and he therefore earnestly conjured the noble lord to withdraw it.

Lord Euston's motion was negatived: after which, the chancellor of the exchequer moved, "That so much of the minutes of the evidence taken before the select committee, as relates to the said James Trotter, be laid before the House;" which motion was agreed to.

April 4. After a short debate, the House, on the motion of Mr. Tierney, came to the following resolutions: "That James Trotter, now in the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, having been duly summoned by the Speaker's warrant, and also by an order, signed by the chairman of the select committee on the Dunfermline, &c. election, to attend to give evidence before the said committee, and having disobeyed such warrant and order, by not appearing in pursuance thereof, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House." And it was ordered, nem. con. That the said James Trotter be, for his said offence, committed to Newgate.—Trotter continued in Newgate until the 6th of May, when he was reprimanded and discharged.

Lord Ellenborough's Maiming and Wounding Bill.] March 28. Lord Ellenborough reminded the House, that he had, on Friday last, moved to postpone the committal of the chalking bill for Ireland. He had done so, to introduce to their lordships a bill, for the purpose of explaining and amending the Coventry act, under which no man who wounded, maimed, or defaced another, could be convicted, unless the lying-in-wait, with a view to commit the offence was proved; and for want of that sort of proof, an atrocious offender had recently been acquitted at the Old Bailey. It had also for its object to generalize the law with regard to certain penal offences, and to adapt it equally to every part of the united kingdom. Among other provisions, he had introduced several to meet the defects and difficulties that now lay in the way of conviction for several offences of the most criminal nature. One went to constitute an assault with intent to commit murder, a capital felony, whereas at present it was only a misdemeanor. Another to make the attempting to fire a gun or pistol, with intent to kill, although the attempt failed by the weapon's missing fire, by flashing in the pan, or other accident, a capital felony. A third, to constitute the administering poison with intent to destroy, also a capital felony. Another to relieve the judges from the difficulties they labour under in respect to the trial of women indicted for child-murder, in the case of bastards. At present the judges were obliged to strain the law for the sake of lenity, and to admit the slightest suggestion that the child was still-born as evidence of the fact. Upon this point, the law, as it now stands, is so severe in a constructive view towards the mother of a bastard child, supposed to have been murdered after its birth, that in case of such child being found dead, or being made away with, the proof of the mother having previously concealed her pregnancy, is to be taken as sufficient to convict of the murder. A clause was therefore inserted in the present bill, repealing the law as it now stood, and re-enacting a proviso, requiring that evidence should first be duly admitted, that such bastard child was, or was not, born living, previous to the final decision upon any trial. Another provision went to the punishment of those guilty of administering drugs and potions to procure abortions. There was another crime highly atrocious, which was not capitally punishable by the laws of Ireland; namely, that of a man setting fire to, and burning his own house, with intent to defraud the insurers; for this species of arson, the capital punishment only attached where the fire extended to the house of his neighbour; but as it was a crime not only calculated to defraud one set of men as much as that of forgery, or of sinking a ship at sea, but with incalculable danger to the lives and properties of a whole neighbourhood, and consequently fraught, as much as any act could be, with the very essence of criminality, namely, deliberate intention and malice prepense, it was as deservedly to be ranked amongst capital crimes in Ireland, as in this country.

The bill was read a first time.

Debate in the Lords on the Irish Bank Restriction Bill.] May 3. On the order of the day for the second reading of the bill,

Lord King delivered his sentiments fully on the subject. He considered, that it was those restrictions, which, by encouraging an enormous issue of bank notes, had produced their depreciation, and finally the rate of exchange so unfavourable to Ireland. Country banks had not done so much mischief as was usually attributed to them; on the contrary, they had afforded great accommodations to the public, and he believed they were a salutary check upon the Bank of England, which was now much more careful and vigilant, as to its notes, than probably it otherwise would have been. The country banks were also an excellent check to forgery, which would seldom be detected, if there were no other notes circulating than those of the Bank of England. In Ireland, during the year 1797, the number of notes issued, amounted to only 600,000*l.*; and now there were no less than 2,600,000*l.* in circulation. This was a circumstance which sufficiently accounted for the balance of trade being so unfavourable. He thought the directors of the Bank of Ireland had grossly abused that discretionary power which had been vested in them; he should therefore move a clause in this bill, that the Bank of Ireland should be obliged to pay their own notes in those of the Bank of England, which would prove a check on the enormous issue they had lately made. He thought there ought not to be two standards of currency in the countries which were now united; he should not, however, propose that such a clause should operate sooner than six months from the present time.

The Earl of Limerick defended the conduct of the directors of the Bank of Ireland, who had been prudent, as well as vigilant in the discharge of their duty. The first great increase in the issues of the bank of Ireland, was in consequence of an effort of the conspiracy that was then forming, to distress the government by a run upon all the country banks, which must necessarily also produce a run on the bank of Ireland; it was to counteract this scheme, that they were first obliged to increase their issues. The bank of Ireland had, in spite of surrounding difficulties, of foreign invasion and rebellion, still kept up its credit, and given great accommodation to the public. He attributed the unfavourable state of exchange in a great measure, to the increase of the public debt, which was now 40 millions, although in 1797, it was but 7 millions.

Lord Auckland entirely coincided with what had fallen from the earl of Limerick; he therefore supported the bill, which was read a second time.

May 5. On the committal of the bill,

Lord King again adverted to the rate of exchange between the two countries, the unfavourable state of which to Ireland, he attributed to the depreciation of its currency naturally arising from the excessive issue of bank notes, which were the circulating medium. He concluded, by moving a clause, that the governor and company of the Bank of Ireland, should be obliged, upon demand, to pay their notes in English bank notes.

The Marquis of Sligo said, it was impossible to add such a clause as this, to a bill for restricting payments in specie; as the Bank of Ireland could not get those Bank of England notes, without paying guineas for them. Such a clause would militate against the whole principle of the bill. As to the rate of exchange, it perhaps carried with it its own remedy: the exchange operated as a tax upon imports, and a bounty upon exports. He admitted the very unfavourable circumstances in which Ireland now stood; but he hoped, that better prospects would soon appear.

The Earl of Limerick also disapproved of the clause, which was negatived.

Debate on Lord King's Motion respecting the Financial State of the Country.]

May 13. Lord King rose to call their attention to the papers which had for some time been in their lordships' hands. It was a subject of the last consequence, that the erroneous ideas which had been spread among the monied interest, and the public in general, in consequence of a noble lord's statements, should be corrected. With this view, he had for some time been anxious, that the situation of the country, with respect to its finances, might be clearly ascertained. The noble lord to whom he alluded (Auckland) had expressed himself in terms of exultation upon the astonishing increase of the revenue. That this exultation was well founded was not perhaps so evident as his lordship might imagine.—He then entered into a series of calculations, in order to prove the errors of lord Auckland's statements respecting the revenue and the charge upon it. The noble lord had stated the amount of the revenue to be upwards of 33 millions, with such a charge upon it as left a very considerable surplus in the hands of government to the public expenses of the year. It was evident, however, even from the papers upon their lordships' table, and from the speech of the chancellor of the exchequer lately published, that this statement was not correct. He then contended, that the amount of the revenue was little more than 31 millions. He then adverted to the erroneous statement made by the chancellor of the exchequer, and the fallacious views of the proportion between the revenue and the expenditure of the country, which he had held out. He next turned the attention of the House to the ruinous consequences that must result from the practice of peace loans, and asserted that the only remedy was, to equalize the revenue with the expenditure, however great. By a contrary conduct the danger must every day become more imminent. Nothing could be more pregnant with mischief than trifling with the finances of the country. What, then, were we to think of ministers who could be guilty of such gross mistakes, with regard to a point of such vast importance, or what confidence would the country repose in them? Persons who had so far misunderstood the finances of the country as to commit the gross and palpable mistakes which these papers and the statements of the ministry betrayed, were unfit to manage the concerns of the nation. He alluded to the weakness and instability of their conduct in every part of their administration, and concluded by moving that the financial papers on their lordships' table should be referred to a private committee, who should examine the same, and report their opinions thereon to the House.

Lord Auckland was thankful to the noble lord for bringing this important subject into discussion: he conceived, however, that their lordships had ample materials already on their table, and therefore would negative the appointment of a committee. It had been his object to give a true statement of the actual revenue and permanent charge, prepared, and verified, by officers of acknowledged accuracy and integrity. He would now briefly recapitulate the results, which were not matters of debate and dispute, as they rested on the evidence of facts. With these views he would confine himself to the abstract of the public income and permanent charge for the year ending the 5th April, 1803. The first article in that abstract shews, that the nett produce of the permanent taxes for the year had been 29,357,575*l.* The whole of that sum had been received in the exchequer, except about 470,000*l.* which had been paid in bounties on corn and rice, and which might clearly be considered as revenue. 2. The next sum, 165,763*l.* was an increase within the year, of balances in the hands of the receivers. 3. Beer duties postponed on the 5th April 1803, in consequence of the credit given by law to the brewers, 245,871*l.* 4. Land-tax unredeemed and annual malt, 2,000,000*l.* to which must be added 125,611*l.* paid in transitu by the county receivers, for the militia and other purposes, making together 2,125,611*l.* 5. Arrears outstanding on the beer and malt duties imposed in 1802, 557,493*l.* 6. The amount of the new additional assessed taxes, 835,646*l.* 7. The further produce of the new duties imposed in 1802, of which three quarters only are yet received. The accounts on the table state the fourth quarter at 1,052,116*l.* These several sums form a total of 34,340,069*l.* Add annual profit of the lottery, 370,000*l.* making altogether an income of 34,710,000*l.*

He would next proceed to state the permanent charge on the revenue. 1. Permanent charge on the unredeemed debt 17,674,794*l.* 2. Actual amount of the sinking fund 5,806,121*l.* 3. Civil list and parliamentary annuities 1,151,016*l.* making 24,631,931*l.* Deducting the permanent charge, 24,631,000*l.* from the total income 34,710,000*l.* the balance, being 10,069,000*l.* will be the sum applicable to the annual expense of the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous services. And we have this large sum exclusive of what is paid for the civil list, and of the 5,800,000*l.* applying itself to the daily reduction of the debt; by the excellent operation of which system the debt is gradually converting itself into revenue.

He had thought it of the highest importance to give to his countrymen, in the present crisis, a well-founded confidence in their own resources and powers. He would next show, that the great increase of our revenue had gone hand in hand with the augmented prosperity of our trade and manufactures; he might add with our agriculture and population, and with every circumstance that constitutes national strength. It would be found by the papers before the House, that in the 20 years from 1784 to 1803, the annual produce of the old permanent taxes has increased from eleven to sixteen millions. And with respect to the commerce, that the total annual value of British imports and exports, taken on the same scale of valuation, is nearly doubled since 1793, and trebled since 1783. The total real value of British produce and manufactures exported in 1802 had been 48,500,000*l*. The revenue applicable in 1792 to the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous services, was 4,700,000*l*. In the present year it is 10,069,000*l*. He was again aware that he should be told, that great as this revenue may be, it is three or four millions below the expenditure of the year. If it were meant by that insinuation, that the budget of the year ought to have brought forwards additional taxes to that amount, he could say, that such a proposition, if it had been made by the chancellor of the exchequer in November last, would have been treated with disregard and derision. He was as desirous as any man to avoid the creation of new debt, and to resist any system that may counteract the gradual discharge of the old. But surely we cannot be considered as having attained a peace establishment. From the treaty of Amiens to the present hour, the person who directs the counsels of France had done every thing to destroy the blessings of peace of which he talks so much. He had uniformly acted as if his government cannot subsist and be maintained, except in a state of agitation and convulsion. We have borne this treatment till the cup of provocation is filled to the very brim. Such a state of things must now resolve itself into settled peace or open war. Under this conviction, solicitous as he had been to show the greatness of our revenue, and the soundness of our resources, he was well aware that other essentials were wanted. If we should ever cease to be a powerful nation, we should soon find ourselves a subjugated people. With a disposition to preserve peace, as long as it can be preserved with honour, we must have the determination, to resist every attempt to violate our independence, or to injure our essential interests. He concluded by saying that he should negative the motion.

The Earl of Moir asserted, that even from the noble lord's statement, it appeared, that there was a considerable deficit; for it only allowed an excess of nine millions, to meet an expenditure of thirteen. He thought it was most preposterous, to enter into a comparison of the revenues of the country now, with what they were in 1784; every body knew they had much increased, but he, for one, did not consider that increase as a subject of much exultation. We knew the numerous additional taxes, which had been the fruitful sources of this increase; it was, indeed, consolatory to find, that the wonderful and unceasing skill and industry of the people of this great country pushes forward its commerce in spite of all its burthens. He never heard those very florid descriptions of our financial prosperity, without considering them as the forerunners of fresh expences and calamities. He did not wish false statements to be made, but he had a high opinion of the real strength and resources of this country, if it should become absolutely necessary to exert them to the utmost, against our ambitious and implacable enemy.

Lord Grenville said:—My lords; we are all much indebted to the noble lord who has so ably brought forward the present investigation. But had no member of this House challenged a discussion on the important subject, I should have thought it incumbent upon me to submit to your lordships a motion of a similar tendency. I cannot help recollecting the happy impression which the minister's speech made on the country at large, when he and his friends, previously to the Christmas recess, boasted so loudly of the great increase of the revenue, and of the wonderful surplus. Neither parliament nor the people, however, were aware, that, instead of a surplus, there was an alarming deficit; that ministers had not only forgotten to provide sufficiently for the expenditure, but that they appeared to have shut their eyes against the conviction of truth. In support of the observations which I am about to submit to your lordships, I shall have little more to do than to refer to the official papers of the chancellor of the exchequer, sanctioned by the noble lord (Auckland), and published to the world by their authority. Ministers have very unfortunately acted upon these fallacious data, and thence endangered the nation, and disgraced themselves. In the remarks which I am about to make, I wish by no means to damp the spirits, or cramp the energy of the country. Men may differ on matters of finance as well as on other topics of a public nature, without intending the smallest injury to their dearest rights and liberties. In calling the attention of the House to the detection of false statements, I wish to look our real situation fully in the face—I wish not to shrink from every mode of investigation which can lead us to truth. This country, thank God! has no cause for despondency. If, unfortunately, our ministers should involve us in the calamities of war, we have ample resources to enable us to protect our freedom and independence. We have a revenue fully adequate to any public emergency; but then it is requisite, that that revenue should be under the management of men capable of discharging their duty to the public—men worthy of the confidence reposed in them by a great, a powerful, and a liberal nation—not of men, who, by a defect in judgment, and by an absence of talents, have not only involved themselves, but the country, in alarming disasters and disgrace. Such might be said to be the true picture of their financial results. Every man of political skill and experience could not help expressing much surprise at the extraordinary mode adopted before the Christmas recess, to announce to the nation the flourishing state of the revenue. This mode may be commendable on some occasions. A case may arise, when a deviation from the common practice in parliament may perhaps be requisite; but I cannot conceive that such a case rendered such a deviation an indispensable act at the time alluded to. If, however, it was necessary to congratulate parliament and the country on such a joyful occasion, the statement on which ministers raised the superstructure of our happiness ought to have been supported by truth. The contrary, however, was unfortunately the real view of the subject. The financial statement on which ministers so much depended for a vindication of their conduct would not bear investigation. It was fallacious in the extreme. It certainly operated most powerfully and fatally on the monied men as well as on parliament. It has served to delude, and may serve to ruin many worthy but credulous members of society, unless speedily checked, by an exposure of its pernicious tendency. In the imaginary budget of the year, we heard of the supposed expedient of a loan. Is this the last loan that will be deemed expedient to answer the exigency of government? If the minister could, instead of a deficit of millions, produce the regular surplus of a million a year, there would, perhaps, be little or no occasion for a loan. It was certainly a very pleasing communication to hear of a million surplus, applicable to the services of the state; but the more pleasing the communication of such news, the more mortifying when it was proved a delusion. On the very first appearance of this official statement, its internal as well as external evidence proved that it was void of foundation; and, notwithstanding the adventurous spirit of the noble lord (Auckland), who had vindicated the remarkable document, seldom or never did any statement of so short an existence turn out to be so totally erroneous. This statement, instead of exhibiting a surplus of one million, exhibited a gross deficit of upward of three millions; and the total difference between the supposed and actual state of our finances, according to the official documents, amounted to no less than 5,313,000*l*. The only sure mode of avoiding the recurrence of peace loans is by equalizing our actual income with our actual expenditure, and reserving it to parliament to judge hereafter whether any increase in our comparative income shall be applied in diminution of taxes or in accelerated reduction of debt. As to the expected contribution from India, if it depended upon the noble marquis's exertion now at the head of our government in that quarter of the world, I should entertain no doubt of seeing it fully realized. There are, however, two facts on which this expected contribution very much depends: the maintenance of peace in India, and also in Europe. After the due consideration of the facts, with what justice could ministers hold out so fallacious a statement to the public? I ask, what monied man, what merchant, who relied on the statement made by the ministers before the Christmas recess, would extend his confidence to the authors of that statement? Where is the much boasted surplus? Where is the proof of the flourishing state of our revenue? If the surplus does not exist—and it is evident that it does not—it is the duty of ministers to adopt some measure to operate its production—it is their duty to render the income equal to the expenditure. If we are to enter into a new war, let our resources be under proper management—let us fight for our rights and liberties, if reduced to the lamentable necessity, with all our national spirit, and all our energy. A noble lord had treated with indifference the maxim, that our income and expenditure ought at least to be equalized. Good God! am I not speaking in a country which has felt the truth of this principle? In a country, whose commercial existence depends upon its probity and honour? Then why deny the validity of such a maxim? But it is of a piece with the conduct of the men who have acted such a variety of characters under the same mask—who have advanced and receded—who have turned and returned—who have avowed and disavowed in the very same breath. But, say they—“We calculated upon certain greater reductions in the army!” Reductions in the army! I know of no other mode of effecting a reduction of the army than that adopted by our ministers for the reduction of the navy. As they have ingeniously discovered, that ships of war may be put to sea against the enemy without men, so they may, perhaps, also discover, that generals may draw up an army in battle array without soldiers! Thus, to equalize their expenditure to their income, they may easily reduce both army and navy to the skeletons of what they hitherto have been! I am not actuated on this occasion by personal animosity. I speak of them as ministers. Were I called upon to declare what part of their public conduct was the most exceptionable, I would put my finger upon their gross mismanagement of the public revenue. I wish to call to the recollection of the House the following leading facts of the minister's finance administration:—first, his having given notice, within a very short time after his coming into office, of a repeal, or a very considerable modification of the salt duties, amounting to near a million annually, for which he proposed no tax in substitution. Thus taking a fallacious credit for the relief which such a measure, if it had been practicable, might have afforded to some parts of the country, without adverting to the additional burthens which must have been laid on some other article, in order to replace that revenue—a pledge which seems to have been held out at the time only to gain a little momentary popularity. 2ndly, That when he came into office, he found a system established of raising a part of the supplies within the year, and this in a time of a most burthensome war. That this system, which he ought to have continued, at least to the extent of discharging in that mode a considerable portion of the remaining war expenses, he has totally abandoned, and, for the discharge of those expenses, has had recourse wholly to peace loans; and that even in the present year the amount of the money to be thus borrowed in time of peace will entirely suspend the effect of the sinking fund, by increasing the public debt on one hand faster than it can be paid off on the other; whereas it would have been the obvious policy of any wise government to have adopted such a system in peace as should have accelerated instead of retarding the reduction of the public debt, the large amount of which will be the principal difficulty with which we shall have to contend in war. 3rdly, That having for these purposes persevered in the injurious practice of peace loans, to the full extent of the whole excess of our expenditure beyond our permanent income, he has not even fairly met the indispensable duty of providing duly for the interest and gradual redemption of these loans; he is, on the contrary, the first minister who has ever introduced into our finances the dangerous principle of anticipating future resources by raising loans on a deferred interest: That this has, indeed, in this first instance, been done to no very large extent; but that the introduction of the principle is not the less to be condemned. 4thly, That besides this, he has acted in open breach of the wise system established by parliament, by which every future loan was to be accompanied by a sinking fund, in the proportion of one per cent of the capital borrowed. That he has carried his violation of this fundamental rule to so great an extent, that he made his whole loan last year, to the amount of 30 millions, without any such provision. This was done under the pretence of a consolidation of the two existing sinking funds, by which it was said that the whole debt would ultimately be paid off in a shorter period than before. It was true, that such an arrangement might have been proper and profitable, if, in addition to the funds to provide for the interest of the loan, other taxes to the amount required by the act of 1792, had been last year imposed, and their amount duly carried to the diminution of debt, though not to the redemption of that particular loan; or if, in any other mode, provision had, at the same time, been made for paying off within the year, such a proportionable amount of debt, as would have been equal in its effect to the annual amount thus withheld from the present operation of the sinking fund. But that the measure, unaccompanied by any such provision, operated only to relieve the present finance minister at the expense of his successors, and was, so far as it went, a direct breach of faith with the public creditors of the present day; because, although it be ultimately true, that the whole debt may be sooner paid off, yet a smaller portion would have been paid off at the particular periods within the interval, and particularly within the next ten years, when it is reasonably to be supposed the pressure of the public debt, and its consequent depreciation, are likely to be at the highest. 5thly, That having thus departed from the system of raising a part of the extraordinary expenses within the year—having made peace loans for that purpose, to the total suspension of the sinking fund even in time of peace—and having omitted to make a due and full provision either for the interest, or for the redemption of those loans—the minister has now brought forward a statement calculated to persuade the country, that, without any additional sacrifices or burthens whatever, our permanent means may be expected to exceed our permanent expenditure; whereas the truth appears to be, that to meet even the reduced expenditure which he supposes, two millions in addition to the present revenue must be raised every year, either by peace loans, or by fresh taxes, unless that necessity should hereafter be superseded by any increase of the actual revenue—a supposition on which no government can safely rely for meeting actual deficiencies;—and that thus to meet an expenditure equal to that which he himself proposed to parliament last November, this sum of two millions must, in some of these modes, be increased to four millions. On these grounds, I shall give my support to the present motion.

The Earl of Westmoreland defended the statement of the minister, and thought it unfair to expect an exact balance of revenue and expenditure in the first year after a war. If peace should continue, he had no doubt, but that the estimates would be found correct.

Lord Pelham defended the ministerial statement of the finances, but considered this as a question which, according to established usage, ought rather to be discussed in the other House of legislature.

The Bishop of St. Asaph thought this was no time for invidious and warm discussion of such a nature. Parliament ought rather now to show itself perfectly united against the foreign foe.

The question was then put and negatived.

The King's Message relative to the Termination of the Discussions with France.]

May 16. The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented the following Message from his Majesty:

“G. R.

“His majesty thinks it proper to acquaint the House of Commons, that the discussions which he announced to them, in his Message of the 8th of March last, as then subsisting between his majesty and the French government, have been terminated; that the conduct of the French government has obliged his majesty to recall his ambassador from Paris, and that the ambassador from the French republic has left London.

“His majesty has given directions for laying before the House of Commons, with as little delay as possible, copies of such Papers as will afford the fullest information to his parliament at this important conjuncture.

“It is a consolation to his majesty to reflect, that no endeavours have been wanting on his part to preserve to his subjects the blessings of peace; but under the circumstances which have occurred to disappoint his just expectations, his majesty relies with confidence on the zeal and public spirit of his faithful Commons, and on the exertions of his brave and loyal subjects to support him in his determination to employ the power and resources of the nation, in opposing the spirit of ambition and encroachment which at present actuates the councils of France, in upholding the dignity of his crown, and in asserting and maintaining the rights and interests of his people. G. R."

On the motion of lord Hawkesbury, the Message was ordered to be taken into consideration on the 23rd. A similar Message was presented to the Lords, by lord Pelham.

PAPERS RELATIVE TO THE DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE.] May 18. The following Papers were laid before both Houses, by command of his Majesty:

PAPERS RESPECTING THE DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE.

No. 1.—Letter from M. Otto to lord Hawkesbury, dated London, May 23rd, 1802.

My Lord;—The 10th article of the treaty of Amiens, which fixes the new organization of the order of Malta, having prescribed various measures, to the execution of which it is necessary that the two principal contracting powers should concur, the First Consul has named general Vial as minister plenipotentiary to the order and Island of Malta, for the purpose of concerting with the person whom his Britannic majesty shall appoint for that purpose, respecting the execution of the arrangements agreed upon in the late treaty. General Vial will set out on his destination as soon as your excellency shall have informed me of his majesty's intentions, and of the choice he may make. I have, &c.

OTTO.

No. 2.—Letter from Lord Hawkesbury, to M. Otto, dated, Downing-street, May 24th, 1802.

Sir;—In answer to your letter of yesterday, in which you communicate to me the nomination, by the first consul, of general Vial to be minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, to the order of Saint John of Jerusalem; I have the honour to inform you, that the king has been pleased to appoint sir Alexander Ball to be his majesty's minister to the order. Sir A. Ball will shortly proceed to Malta, and will be instructed to concert with general Vial the necessary measures for carrying into effect the arrangements relative to that island, which are stipulated in the 10th article of the definitive treaty of peace. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 3.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord St. Helens to Lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, April 23rd, 1802.

I hope very soon to be enabled to re-dispatch your lordship's last messenger with the answer of this government to the communications which I have made to them, in obedience to his majesty's commands, respecting the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens. In the mean time I must not conceal from your lordship, that there is great reason to fear that his Imperial majesty will decline taking part in the proposed joint guaranty of the possessions and new constitution of the order of Malta.

No. 4.—Extract of a dispatch from Lord St. Helens to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Petersburg, May 7th, 1802.

I have reason to hope that the first impressions that had been produced here by certain parts of the arrangement relative to Malta, have been removed; and that his Imperial majesty may even be ultimately induced to guaranty the whole of that arrangement; provided that the steps which have been taken towards the election of a new grand master, according to the mode suggested by this court, be considered as fulfilling what is required on that head by the latter part of the paragraph of the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens; and consequently that no new election for that office is to take place in the manner pointed out by the former part of the same stipulation.

No. 5.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Merry, dated Downing-street, June 5th, 1802.

Sir;—I informed you in my dispatch No. 10, that M. Otto had made an official communication to me, that general Vial was appointed by the first consul minister plenipotentiary to the order of St. John of Jerusalem. Sir Alexander Ball has been in consequence invested with the same character by his majesty. He will proceed immediately to Malta, and he will receive instructions to concert with general Vial the best means of carrying into complete effect the stipulations contained in the 10th article of the definitive treaty. By the paragraph marked No. 1, in that article, it is stipulated:

"The knights of the order, whose langues shall continue to subsist after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, are invited to return to Malta as soon as that exchange shall have taken place: they shall there form a general chapter, and shall proceed to the election of a grand master, to be chosen from amongst the natives of those nations which preserve langues, if no such election shall have been already made since the exchange of the ratifications of the preliminary articles of peace."

The object of this paragraph was, that in the event of an election having taken place subsequent to the exchange of the ratifications of the preliminary articles of peace, and antecedent to the conclusion of the definitive treaty, that election should be considered as valid; and though no mention is made in the article of the proclamation of the emperor of Russia soon after his accession to the throne, by which the knights of the order were invited to assemble, and to proceed to the election of a grand master, the stipulation in question evidently referred to the contingency of an election taking place on the continent in consequence of that proclamation.

You will inform the French government, that his majesty is ready to consider the election which has lately taken place at St. Petersburg, under the auspices of the emperor of Russia, to be valid, according to the stipulation in the 10th article.

His majesty has no other object in the whole of this transaction, than that the 10th article of the treaty may be fairly executed; and that the arrangement may be carried into complete execution with as little difficulty as possible.

As the 13th paragraph in the 10th article stipulates that the governments of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, should be invited to accede to the arrangements respecting Malta, it is desirable that the French government should instruct, without delay, their ambassadors or ministers at Vienna, Petersburg, and Berlin, to make, conjointly with his majesty's ministers at those courts, an official communication, desiring the accession of those powers to the arrangements relative to Malta in the definitive treaty; by which it is provided, that the independence of the island and the other stipulations shall be under the guarantee of those powers, in conjunction with his majesty, the French government, and the king of Spain. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 6.—Extract of a dispatch from Anthony Merry, Esq. to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, June 17th, 1802.

I have now the honour to transmit to your lordship, inclosed, copy of an answer which reached me last night (though dated eight days back), from the French minister, to the note verbale which I delivered to him, containing his majesty's propositions respecting the execution of some points of the arrangements relative to Malta, contained in the 10th article of the definitive treaty of peace. You will find the entire acquiescence of this government to those propositions, expressed in a very satisfactory manner.

His Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary has the honour to transmit herewith to citizen Talleyrand, minister for the foreign affairs of the French republic, the "note verbale" of the communication he has been ordered to make to him by his government, who are desirous that the proposals it contains may be acceptable to the French government; and they may be assured the British government in making these proposals, have no other object in view than to facilitate, in the easiest manner, the execution of the treaty of Amiens, and to act in this respect in perfect harmony with the French government. Mr. Merry has the honour, &c.

(Signed)

ANT. MERRY.

Paris 8th June, 1802.

The citizen minister for foreign affairs will find inclosed a list of suffrages obtained from several priories of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, for the election of a grand master, which has been received from St. Petersburg by the British government, with the notice that these priories have agreed amongst themselves, that his holiness the pope shall select (pro hac vice), from amongst the candidates therein specified, the person who is to fill the post of grand master. His Britannic majesty on his part is willing to consider an election so made as valid, according to the stipulations of the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens. His majesty therefore is ready to acknowledge, in quality of grand master, the person whom the pope shall think proper to fix upon, from amongst the names contained in that list. His majesty has no other end in view in this, than to see the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens duly fulfilled, and the arrangement it contains executed with as little difficulty as possible. It is stipulated by the 13th paragraph of the same article, that the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian governments, shall be solicited to accede to the said arrangement. The British government is of opinion that it might be proper for that of France to send without delay instructions to their ministers at Vienna, Petersburg, and Berlin, to make conjointly with his Britannic majesty's ministers a communication to those powers in which they should be invited to accede to the arrangement respecting Malta, by which the independence of the island, and the other stipulations relative thereto, are placed under the protection and guarantee of those powers conjointly with their Britannic and Catholic majesties, and the French republic.

The undersigned, minister for foreign affairs, has the honour to transmit to M. Merry, his Britannic Majesty's minister plenipotentiary, his answer to the note verbale which he addressed to him on the eighth Prairial. He doubts not that his majesty's ministers will see in this answer a new proof of the constant dispositions of the first consul to come to an agreement with the English government, for the securing and facilitating the execution of the respective clauses of the treaty which has re-established peace between the two states. The undersigned has the honour, &c.

(Signed) CHA. MAU. TALLEYRAND.—Paris, 20th Prairial, year 10.

[The minister for foreign affairs of the French republic has received the communication which has been made to him by his Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary, of the list of the candidates nominated by the votes of the different priories to the grand mastership of the order of Malta; and he has submitted to the first consul the proposal concerted between the priories of the order, and approved by his Britannic majesty, of submitting (pro hac vice) to his holiness the choice among the proposed candidates.]

The first consul has no other object in what ever relates to the order of Malta, than to see the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens duly executed, and to remove all the obstacles which might render that execution tardy or difficult. He moreover desires equally with his Britannic majesty, that France and England should act in concert, in order the better to secure the independence and the organisation of the order of Malta. He therefore consents that the choice of its grand master, from the candidates proposed by the votes of the priories, should for this time be submitted to his holiness.

As to the 13th paragraph of the same article, respecting the accession of the powers, the first consul thinks with his Britannic majesty, that the powers should be invited to give their consent to the arrangements agreed upon; and the French ministers at the courts of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, shall consequently receive orders to take, conjointly with his Britannic majesty's ministers, the necessary steps for obtaining the accession provided by the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens.]—Paris, 10th Prairial, year 10.

No. 7.—Dispatch from Mr. Merry to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, June 4, 1802.

My Lord;—I had occasion to see Mr. Talleyrand yesterday afternoon, for the purpose of introducing to him, by appointment, some English gentlemen, previously to their presentation to-day to the first consul.

Having gone first alone into the minister's cabinet, he said, that he had been directed by general Buonaparté, to represent to me several circumstances which stood very much in the way of that perfect reconciliation and good understanding between the two countries and their governments, which it was the first consul's sincere wish to see re-established, in order that such obstacles might be removed before the arrival in London of the French ambassador, because, although the circumstances in question had already produced a very disagreeable effect, whilst only M. Otto, as minister, had to witness them, they would acquire a great addition of force if they should still exist when the ambassador should be present; and since the first consul had given orders for general Andreossy to proceed to his destination with as little delay as possible, he wished that I should take an early opportunity to give an account to your lordship of the observations which he was charged to make to me.

After a preface to this effect, M. Talleyrand proceeded to state to me, that the accounts which M. Otto had transmitted of the disgust and inconvenience which he could not but feel and experience at meeting, frequently, at his majesty's court, and at other places, the French princes, and some French persons still decorated with the insignia of French orders which no longer existed; and, at seeing the countenance and support which continued to be given, in England, to what, he termed, the ci-devant French bishops, as well as to other persons (he here mentioned Georges) inimical to the present government of France, had affected, so strongly, the first consul, and were, in fact, so calculated to prevent that system of cordiality, which he was anxious to see established, that it was incumbent upon him to express his wish, that his majesty's government might be disposed to remove out of the British dominions all the French princes and their adherents, together with the French bishops, and other French individuals, whose political principles and conduct must necessarily occasion great jealousy to the French government. He continued to observe, that the protection and favour which all the persons in question continued to meet with in a country so close a neighbour to France, must alone be always considered as an encouragement to the disaffected here, even without those persons themselves being guilty of any acts tending to foment fresh disturbances in his country; but that the government here possessed proofs of the abuse which they were now making of the protection which they enjoyed in England, and of the advantage they were taking of the vicinity of their situation to France, by being really guilty of such acts, since several printed papers had lately been intercepted, which it was known they had sent, and caused to be circulated in France, and which had for their object, to create an opposition to the government. I cannot, my lord, do better than refer you to what you will have read in the French official paper of the day before yesterday (under the article of Paris), for the exact text of M. Talleyrand's discourse upon this subject; which he concluded by saying, that he thought the residence of Louis 18th was now the proper place for that of the rest of the family, and that I might add this suggestion in my report to your lordship.

I answered the French minister, that, without any reference to you, I could assure him, that the practices of the French residing in England, of which he complained, had not been encouraged, nor would be countenanced by his majesty's government; which was as sincerely disposed to cultivate harmony and good understanding between the two countries, as he had represented the first consul to be; but that I could by no means say how far they would be disposed to adopt the measure which he had intimated it to be general Buonaparté's wish that they should pursue, in order to remove, so effectually, every thing which might not, perhaps, be considered equally by them as giving just cause of offence or jealousy to France.

M. Talleyrand did not rejoin upon the matter, but asked me when I proposed writing. Upon my replying I should lose no time, he said, that if I should write as to-day, he would avail himself of the opportunity to convey a letter to M. Otto. I have the honour to be, &c.

A MERRY.

No. 8.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Merry, dated June 10, 1802.

Sir ;—Your dispatches of the 4th instant were received on Monday night, and have been laid before the king. The account given in that dispatch of the conversation which passed on the 3rd instant, between you and M. Talleyrand, respecting the French princes and their adherents, would have afforded here considerable surprise, if his majesty's government had not in some degree been prepared for it by information which had been previously received ; from the manner, however, in which this subject has been mentioned to you, it is important that you should take a proper opportunity to explain, candidly and fairly, to the French government, the line of conduct which his majesty feels it to be his duty to pursue in this very delicate business. His majesty would certainly consider it inconsistent with both the letter and spirit of the treaty of peace, between him and the French republic, to encourage or countenance any projects that might be hostile to the present government of France. He is sincerely desirous, that the peace which has been concluded, may be permanent, and may lead to the establishment of a system of good understanding and harmony between the two countries. With these sentiments, he is disposed to employ all the means in his power to guard against any circumstance which can have the effect of disturbing the tranquillity that has been so happily restored ; and he certainly expects, that all foreigners who may reside within his dominions, should not only hold a conduct conformable to the laws of the country, but should abstain from all acts which may be hostile to the government of any country with which his majesty may be at peace. As long, however, as they conduct themselves according to these principles, his majesty would feel it inconsistent with his dignity, with his honour, and with the common laws of hospitality, to deprive them of that protection which individuals, resident in his dominions, can only forfeit by their own misconduct. The greater part of the persons to whom allusion has been made in M. Talleyrand's conversation with you, are living in retirement ; and his majesty has no reason whatever to suppose, that since the conclusion of peace, they have availed themselves of their residence in this country, to promote any designs injurious to the government of France. I have, &c.

(Signed) HAWKESBURY.

No. 9.—Dispatch from Mr. Merry to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, June 17, 1802.

My Lord ;—I have the honour to acquaint your lordship, that I have executed the instructions given me by your secret and confidential dispatch, (No. 14), in consequence of the communication from M. Talleyrand, which I transmitted in my number 23, respecting the residence of the French princes, and other French persons in his majesty's dominions.

In delivering my answer on this business to the French minister, I took care to express, in the strongest manner, the assurances which your lordship has authorised me to give of his majesty's sincere desire, that the peace which has happily been concluded should be permanent, and that it should lead to the establishment of a system of harmony and good understanding between the two countries ; and that, as his majesty's conduct would, in every respect, be guided by those sentiments, he, of course, would not tolerate, much less encourage, any proceedings on the part of persons within his dominions, which might be hostile to the present government of France ; which assurances might, I trusted, be sufficient to tranquillize and satisfy the first consul, without recurring to the measures which had been intimated to me, and which could not but be considered as inconsistent with his majesty's dignity and honour, as well as with the common laws of hospitality, which he could not but observe towards foreigners within his dominions, until they should have forfeited that protection by their misconduct.

M. Talleyrand expressed to me, in reply, that the first consul had solicited no more than the British government itself had, at the time, demanded of France, when the Pretender was in this country, and than had been practised between other governments, under similar circumstances ; that he could not see any humiliation in the measure which he had intimated to me ; that he could assure me it had not been suggested with any such idea ; and that he could only repeat, that the adoption of it would be, in the highest degree, agreeable and satisfactory to the first consul, and be considered by him as the most convincing proof of his majesty's disposition to see a cordial good understanding established between the two countries ; concluding his answer with a request that I would report it to your lordship.

I rejoined upon the subject, by observing to the French minister, that even without adverting to the serious consideration of the king's dignity and honour, the feelings of the people of England were to be taken into account on the occasion ; that he must be sensible the relative situation hitherto of the two countries, especially in regard to trade, afforded his majesty's subjects no room to reap those advantages which were common to, and which were always expected from a state of peace ; and that it therefore appeared to me that the first consul would equally give a proof of his disposition to see harmony, and a friendly intercourse, re-established between the two nations, by not repeating his wish upon a matter which would operate in the strongest manner against such an approximation and reconciliation of sentiments, were it even only to come to the knowledge of his majesty's subjects.

I am happy, my lord, to say, that M. Talleyrand showed no warmth, or any very marked eagerness, in his manner of replying to my communication; and that our conversation on this head terminated with the last remarks I made to him, when he changed it to another subject. I have, &c.

No. 10.—Letter from M. Otto to Lord Hawkesbury, dated July 25, 1802.

My Lord;—I transmitted some time ago, to Mr. Hammond, a number of Peltier, containing the most gross calumnies against the French government, and against the whole nation; and I observed that I should probably receive an order to demand the punishment of such an abuse of the press. That order is actually arrived, and I cannot conceal from you, my lord, that the reiterated insults of a small number of foreigners, assembled in London, to conspire against the French government, produce the most unfavourable effects on the good understanding between the two nations. Even though the first article of the treaty of Amiens had not provided for the maintenance of that respect which two independent nations owe to each other, the general maxims of the law of nations would formally condemn so revolting an abuse of the liberty of the press. It cannot be believed, that the law can give more latitude to a libellist than to any other individual, who, without declaration of war, should permit himself to violate the duties of good neighbourhood. The offence in question is so much the more serious, as its object is evidently to disturb the harmony which subsists between the two governments.

It is not to Peltier alone, but to the editor of the "Courier François de Londres," to Cobbett, and to other writers who resemble them, that I have to direct the attention of his majesty's government. The perfidious and malevolent publications of these men are in open contradiction to the principles of peace; and if it could ever enter into the mind of the French government to permit retaliation, writers would, doubtless, be found in France, willing to avenge their countrymen, by filling their pages with odious reflexions on the most respectable persons, and on the dearest institutions of Great Britain.

The want of positive laws against these sorts of offences cannot palliate the violation of the law of nations, according to which, peace should put a stop to all hostilities; and doubtless, those which wound the honour and the reputation of a government, and which tend to cause a revolt of the people, whose interests are confided to that government, are the most apt to lessen the advantages of peace, and to keep up national resentments. I have, &c.

No. 11.—Letter from Lord Hawkesbury to M. Otto, dated July 28, 1802.

Sir;—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter on the subject of the last number of Peltier. It is impossible that his majesty's government could peruse the article in question, without the greatest displeasure, and without an anxious desire that the person who published it should suffer the punishment he so justly deserves. The calumnies, however, to which his majesty's government, and many of the best subjects in this country are frequently exposed in the public prints, must necessarily convince all foreign governments of the difficulties which exist in a constitution like that of Great Britain, in preventing the abuse which is often unavoidably attendant on the greatest of all political benefits; and though publications of this nature are, as they certainly ought to be, by the law of England, subject to punishment, it is often difficult to prove the guilt of an individual so satisfactorily as to obtain the judgment of a court of justice; and the inconvenience which arises from prosecution, unless there is a reasonable prospect of success, is frequently sufficient to deter both the government and individuals from undertaking it. In the present case, I have thought it my duty to refer the article in question to his majesty's attorney-general, for his opinion whether it is or is not a libel, according to the construction of the law of England, and whether it is such a libel as he would, under all the circumstances, recommend for prosecution. As soon as I receive his report, I shall have the honour of communicating it to you. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 12.—Note from M. Otto to Lord Hawkesbury, dated August 17, 1802.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, having submitted to his government the letter which his excellency lord Hawkesbury, minister and principal secretary of state of his Britannic majesty, did him the honour of writing, under date of 27th July, is directed to offer the following observations:

If the British government tolerates censures upon the acts of its administration, and the personal abuse of the most respectable men, it does not suffer even the slightest attempt against the public tranquillity, the fundamental laws of the empire, and supreme authority which arises from them. Every nation is, moreover, at liberty to sacrifice any advantage whatever in its interior, in order to obtain another to which it attaches a higher value; but the government which does not repress the licentiousness of the press, when it may be injurious to the honour or the interests of foreign powers, would afford an opportunity to libellists to endanger the public tranquillity, or at least, the good understanding that forms the basis of it: and whenever such serious injuries are continued in a regular and systematic manner, doubts must arise as to its own dispositions.

The particular laws and constitution of Great Britain are subordinate to the general principles of the law of nations, which supersede the laws of each individual state. If it be a right in England to allow the most extensive liberty to the press, it is a public right of polished nations, and the bounden duty of governments, to prevent, repress, and punish, every attack which might, by those means, be made against the rights, the interests, and the honour of foreign powers.

This general maxim of the law of nations has never been mistaken without paving the way for the greatest divisions, and has even furnished in England, a plausible pretext to those who have written volumes to prove the necessity of the last war against France. Are these men now desirous of presenting to the consular government, a weapon which they have wielded with so much address? and can they flatter themselves that the authority which has signed the peace has not power to maintain it.

By the first article of the treaty of Amiens, the two powers agree to afford no protection, either directly or indirectly, to those who should cause prejudice to any of them.

But the greatest of all injuries, doubtless, is that which tends to debase a foreign government, or to excite, within its territory, civil and religious commotions: and the most decided of all protections, is that, which places under the safeguard of the laws, men who seek not only to disturb the political tranquillity of Europe, but even to dissolve the first bonds of society.

The undersigned minister must moreover observe, that this is not a question respecting some paragraphs, which, through the inadvertence of an editor, might have been accidentally inserted in a public print; but it is a question of a deep and continued system of defamation, directed not only against the chief of the French republic, but against all the constituted authorities of the republic; against the whole nation; represented by these libellers in the most odious and degrading terms. It has even been remarked, that many of these prints contain an appeal to the French people, against the government and fundamental laws of their country.

If these observations apply to the English writers, who, for these three months past, have deluged the public with the most perfidious and unbecoming publications, they are still more applicable to a class of foreign calumniators, who appear to avail themselves of the asylum offered them in England, only for the purpose of the better gratifying their hatred against France, and undermining the foundations of peace.

It is not merely by insulting and seditious writings, evidently published with a view to circulation in France, but by other incendiary papers distributed through the maritime departments, in order to excite the evil-disposed or weak inhabitants to resist the execution of the concordate, that these implacable enemies of France continue to exercise hostilities, and to provoke the just indignation of the French government and people. Not a doubt exists of these writings having been composed and circulated by Georges, and by the former bishops of France. These men can no longer be considered but as rebels against both political and religious authority; and after their reiterated attempts to disturb the good understanding between the two governments, their residence in England militates openly against the spirit and letter of the treaty of peace.

The meetings, likewise, which have taken place in the island of Jersey, and the odious plots which are there framed, in spite of the representations which the undersigned minister has already taken care to make on this subject, also demand immediate measures to be taken by a government, the neighbour and friend of France.

Other persons (attached, by recollections never to be effaced, and by regrets too long fostered, to an order of things which no longer exists in France) find themselves daily implicated by the plots of those who pretend to serve them. A sense of their own reputation will, without doubt, lead them to avoid a focus of intrigues, with which they ought not to have the least connexion.

Peace happily re-established, the mutual desire of the two countries to render it solid and lasting, and the general interests of humanity, require, that all these causes of dissatisfaction should be done away, and that his majesty's ministry should, by frank and energetic measures, manifest their disapprobation of all the attempts made to produce new divisions.

The undersigned has, in consequence, received especial order to solicit, 1st. That his majesty's government will adopt the most effectual measures to put a stop to the unbecoming and seditious publications with which the newspapers and writings printed in England are filled. 2nd. That the individuals mentioned in the undersigned minister's letter of the 23rd July last, shall be sent out of the island of Jersey. 3rd. That the former bishops of Arras and St. Pol de Leon, and all those who, like them, under the pretext of religion, seek to raise disturbances in the interior of France, shall likewise be sent away. 4th. That Georges and his adherents shall be transported to Canada, according to the intention which the undersigned has been directed to transmit to his government at the request of lord Hawkesbury. 5th. That, in order to deprive the evil-disposed of every pretext for disturbing the good understanding between the two governments, it shall be recommended to the princes of the house of Bourbon, at present in Great Britain, to repair to Warsaw, the residence of the head of their family. 6th. That such of the French emigrants as still think proper to wear the orders and decorations belonging to the ancient government of France, shall be required to quit the territory of the British empire.

These demands are founded upon the treaty of Amiens, and upon the verbal assurances that the undersigned minister has had the satisfaction to receive, in the course of the negotiations, with regard to a mutual agreement for maintaining tranquillity and good order in the two countries. If any one in particular of these demands does not proceed so immediately from the treaty concluded, it would be easy to justify it by striking examples, and to prove how very attentive the British government has been, in times of internal fermentation, to remove from the territory of a neighbouring power, those who might endanger the public tranquillity.

Whatever may be the protection which the English laws afford to native writers, and to other subjects of his majesty, the French government knows that foreigners do not here enjoy the same protection; and that the law, known by the title of the Alien act, gives the ministry of his Britannic majesty an authority which it has often exercised against foreigners, whose residence was prejudicial to the interests of Great Britain. The first clause of this act states, expressly, that any order in council which requires a foreigner to quit the kingdom shall be executed, under pain of imprisonment and transportation. There exists, therefore, in the ministry, a legal and sufficient power to restrain foreigners, without having recourse to courts of law; and the French government, which offers, on this point, a perfect reciprocity, thinks it gives a new proof of its pacific intentions, by demanding that those persons may be sent away, whose machinations uniformly tend to sow discord between the two people. It owes to itself, and to the nation at large (which has made it the depository of its power and of its honour), not to appear insensible to insults and to plots during profound peace, which the irritation of open war could not justify, and it is too well acquainted with the conciliatory dispositions of the British ministry, not to rely upon its efforts to disperse a faction, equally the enemy of France and England. The undersigned, &c.

OTTO.

No. 13.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Merry, dated August 28, 1802.

Sir;—I send you the copy of a letter which I received some days ago from M. Otto, together with a copy of an official note enclosed in it. I have informed M. Otto, that you would receive instructions to enter into explanations with the French government on the several points to which it refers. It is impossible not to feel considerable surprise at the circumstances under which it has been thought proper to present such a note; at the style in which it is drawn up; and at the complaints contained in it. Whatever may be the general dispositions of the French government towards this country, supposing them to be as hostile as they have been at any former period, or even more so, it would appear so contrary to their interest to provoke a war with us at the present moment, that I am inclined to ascribe their conduct, in the whole of this business, more to temper, than to any other motive; but whether their conduct is to be referred to temper or to policy, the effects of it may still be the same; it is therefore become of the utmost importance that a frank explanation should be made of the line of conduct which his majesty has determined to adopt on reasons of the nature of those to which this note refers, and of the motives on which it is founded; and it is to be hoped that such an explanation will have the effect of putting an end to a course of proceeding, which can lead only to perpetual irritation between the two governments, and which might ultimately tend to the most serious consequences.

The first consideration that naturally arises on this transaction, is that of the peculiar circumstances under which the note of M. Otto has been presented. It cannot be denied that some very improper paragraphs have lately appeared in some of the English newspapers against the government of France; it cannot be denied, likewise, that publications of a still more improper and indecent nature have made their appearance in this country, with the names of foreigners affixed to them. Under these circumstances, the French government would have been warranted in expecting every redress that the laws of this country could afford them; but as, instead of seeking it in the ordinary course, they have thought fit to resort to recrimination themselves, or, at least, to authorize it in others, they could have no right to complain, if their subsequent appeal to his majesty had failed to produce the effect that otherwise would have attended it.

Whatever may have been the nature of the prior injury, they have, in fact, taken the law into their own hands; and what is this recrimination and retort? The paragraphs in the English newspapers, the publications to which I have above referred, have not appeared under any authority of the British government, and are disavowed and disapproved of by them; but the paragraph in the Moniteur has appeared in a paper avowedly official, for which the government are, therefore, considered as responsible, as his majesty's government is responsible for the contents of the London Gazette. And this retort is not confined to the unauthorized English newspapers, or to the other publications of which complaint is now made, but is converted into, and made a pretence for a direct attack upon the government of his majesty. His majesty feels it beneath his dignity to make any formal complaint on this occasion; but it has been impossible for me to proceed to the other parts of the subject, without pointing your attention to the conduct of the French government in this respect, that you may observe upon it in the manner it deserves.

The propositions in M. Otto's official note, are six in number; but may, in fact, be divided under two heads: the first, that which relates to the libels of all descriptions, which are alleged to be published against the French government; the last, comprehending the five complaints which relate to the emigrants resident in this country. On the first, I am sure you must be aware that his majesty cannot, and never will, in consequence of any representation or any menace from a foreign power, make any concession, which can be in the smallest degree dangerous to the liberty of the press, as secured by the constitution of this country. This liberty is justly dear to every British subject. The constitution admits of no previous restraints upon publications of any description; but there exists judicatures, wholly independent of the executive government, capable of taking cognizance of such publications as the law deems to be criminal, and which are bound to inflict the punishment the delinquents may deserve; these judicatures may take cognizance, not only of libels against the government and the magistracy of this kingdom, but, as has been repeatedly experienced, of publications defamatory of those in whose hands the administration of foreign governments is placed. That our government neither has, nor wants any other protection than what the laws of the country afford; and though they are willing and ready to give to every foreign government all the protection against offences of this nature, which the principle of their laws and constitution will admit, they never can consent to new-model their laws, or to change their constitution, to gratify the wishes of any foreign power. If the present French government are dissatisfied with our laws on the subject of libels, or entertain the opinion that the administration of justice in our courts is too tardy and lenient, they have it in their power to redress themselves by punishing the venders and distributors of such publications within their own territories, in any manner that they may think proper, and thereby preventing the circulation of them. If they think their present laws are not sufficient for this purpose, they may enact new ones; or, if they think it expedient, they may exercise the right which they have of prohibiting the importation of any foreigner newspapers, or periodical publications, into the territories of the French republic. His majesty will not complain of such a measure, as it is not his intention to interfere in the manner in which the people or territories of France should be governed; but he expects, on the other hand, that the French government will not interfere in the manner in which the government of his dominions is conducted, or call for a change in those laws with which his people are perfectly satisfied. With respect to the distinction which appeared to be drawn in M. Otto's note, between the publications of British subjects and those of foreigners, and the power which his majesty is supposed to have in consequence of the Alien act, of sending foreigners out of his dominions, it is important to observe, that the provisions of that act were made for the purpose of preventing the residence of foreigners, whose numbers and principles had a tendency to disturb the internal peace of his own dominions, and whom the safety of those dominions might require in many instances to be removed, even if their actual conduct had not exposed them to punishment by law. It does not follow that it would be a warrantable application of such a law to exert its powers in the cases of individuals, such as those of whom complaint is now made, and particularly as they are liable to be prosecuted under the law of the land, in like manner as others have been in similar cases, at the instance and upon the complaint of foreign governments.

The second general head, which includes the five last complaints, relates to the removal of some of the French emigrants resident in this country. His majesty entertained hopes that the explanation furnished on this head, in my dispatch No. 14, would have proved satisfactory, and would have precluded the necessity of any farther discussion on this subject. The French government have, upon several occasions, resorted on this part of the subject to precedent, and have particularly rested on the demand formerly made by this country, that the person then called the Pretender should be sent from the French dominions.—It is important that the differences between these two cases should be stated. When James 2nd abdicated the throne, and left this country, he retired with his adherents to France; and though, in the war which immediately succeeded that event, the French government adopted his cause as their own, no stipulation was made at the treaty of Ryswick, that he should be sent from that country, nor was any subsequent demand ever made to the French government to this effect; but he was suffered to remain at St. Germain, in the neighbourhood of Paris, surrounded by his family and friends, till the time of his death.—It was not till after his demise, when Lewis 14th, in direct violation of the treaty of Ryswick, had acknowledged his son as king of Great Britain, that a different course of proceeding was adopted by the British government: and in the treaty of peace, signed at Utrecht, which put an end to the war which had been carried on, on account of the Spanish Succession, an article was inserted to prevent the Pretender from residing in any part of the French dominions. The demand which was subsequently made for the removal of the Pretender from a town which was situated in the centre of these dominions, was founded on this article of the treaty, which was, in fact, one of the conditions of the peace; but both the article in the treaty and the demand were confined to the Pretender personally, and were not extended to any of his family, or to any of his adherents. After his removal, many of his adherents continued to reside in France; many persons resident in this country, who were attached to the cause of the Pretender, and had promoted the rebellion in his favour, and who were consequently attainted for high treason, sought refuge in France, and were permitted to remain there till their death, without any application ever having been made by the British government for their removal. The duke of Berwick, the natural son of James 2nd, who, from his principles and talents, was the most dangerous man to the interests of this country and the protestant succession, continued to be a general in the French armies, and though descended from the king, an Englishman, and an emigrant, it was not required that he should be sent out of France. In the present case, there is no article in the treaty of peace, by which his majesty is bound to send from this country any Frenchman whatever, except on account of the crimes specified in the twentieth article of the definitive treaty, and in consequence of the proofs therein required having been adduced. In the present case, it cannot be pretended that his majesty has ever given the slightest countenance to the cause of the royalists in France against the present government, since the period when he acknowledged that government; and if there were not these important differences in the two cases, they would be totally dissimilar in the only remaining point; for in the case of the house of Stuart, as has been already stated, notwithstanding the violence of the times, and the danger to which the protestant succession was really exposed, this strong act of authority was confined to the person of the Pretender: and the individual who must be recognized in that character by the French government, and whose case can alone bear any similarity to the former, even in this respect, is not, and never has been, within his majesty's dominions: other precedents might be adduced on this subject; but it is not necessary to state them, as the foregoing are sufficient.

With respect to the complaints in detail, under the second head.—Upon the first, you may inform the French government, that the emigrants in Jersey, many of whom had remained there solely on account of the cheapness of subsistence, had actually removed, or were removing, previous to the representation concerning them, in M. Otto's note, and that, before your explanation with M. Talleyrand can take place, there will probably not be an emigrant in the island.

To the second complaint, which relates to the bishops of Arras and St. Pol de Leon, and others, his majesty can only reply, that if the fact alleged against them can be substantiated; if it can be proved that they have distributed papers on the coast of France, with a view of disturbing the government, and of inducing the people to resist the new church establishment, his majesty would think himself justified in taking all measures within his power for obliging them to leave the country; but some proof must be adduced of those facts; and such proof must not be that of their having, in a single instance, viz. in reply to the pope's mandate, published a vindication of their own conduct, in refusing to conform to the new establishment; a proceeding in which they would be justifiable on every principle of toleration and justice; but it should show that they have since availed themselves of their situation in this country, to excite the people of France against the authority of that government, whether civil or ecclesiastical.

On the third complaint, which respects the removal of Georges, and those persons supposed to be described as his adherents, M. Otto must have mistaken me, in what he supposes me to have said on that subject. His majesty is, however, very desirous to obviate any cause of complaint or uneasiness with respect to these persons; and measures are in contemplation, and will be taken, for the purpose of removing them out of his majesty's European dominions.

On the fourth complaint, respecting the princes of the house of Bourbon, I can only refer you to my former answer. His majesty has no desire that they should continue to reside in this country, if they are disposed, or can be induced, to quit it; but he feels it to be inconsistent with his honour, and his sense of justice, to withdraw from them the rights of hospitality, as long as they conduct themselves peaceably and quietly; and unless some charge can be substantiated of their attempting to disturb the peace which subsists between the two governments.

With respect to the fifth complaint, which relates to the French emigrants wearing, in this country, the orders of their ancient government; there are few, if any, persons of that description in this country who wear such orders. It might be more proper if they all abstained from it; but the French government could not persist in expecting, that, even if it were consistent with law, his majesty could be induced to commit so harsh an act of authority as to send them out of the country on such an account.

I have thus stated to you his majesty's sentiments on the several points contained in M. Otto's note. You will take an early opportunity of communicating these sentiments to the French government, and of accompanying them with the arguments and explanations above stated. And if it should be desired, and you should be of an opinion that it was likely to produce any good effect, there is no objection to your putting the substance of what you shall have stated in writing, and of delivering it to the minister for foreign affairs, as a memorandum of your conversation.

Upon the general tone and style of M. Otto's note, it is important to observe, that it is far from conciliating; and that the practice of presenting notes of this description, on any motive or suggestion of personal irritation, cannot fail to have the effect of indisposing the two governments towards each other, instead of consolidating and strengthening the peace which happily subsists between them. That after a war, in which the passions of men have been roused beyond all former examples, it is natural to suppose that the distrust, jealousy, and other hostile feelings of individuals should not immediately subside; and, under these circumstances, it appears to be both the interest and the duty of the two governments, by a mild and a temperate conduct, gradually to allay these feelings, and not, on the contrary, to provoke and augment them, by untimely irritation on their part, and by ascribing proceedings like those above noticed, to causes to which they have no reference.—His majesty has thus fully and frankly explained his sentiments, and the ground of his conduct. He is sincerely disposed to adopt every measure for the preservation of peace, which is consistent with the honour and independence of the country, and with the security of its laws and constitution. But the French government must have formed a most erroneous judgment of the disposition of the British nation, and of the character of its government, if they have been taught to expect that any representation of a foreign power will ever induce them to consent to a violation of those rights on which the liberties of the people of this country are founded. I have, &c.

No. 14.—Note from M. Otto to lord Hawkesbury, dated August 21, 1802.

General Vial, minister plenipotentiary of the republic at Malta, having set out for his destination, about the 20th of July, it is to be presumed, that he will soon be in a condition to enter into a concert with his Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary, on the evacuation of Malta, and of its dependencies.

The three months, in which this evacuation should have taken place, are expired; and it being the intention of the two governments, that the execution of the treaty of Amiens should experience the least possible delay, the first consul would have been desirous that the two thousand Neapolitans, who are ready to depart, could have been transported, at an early period, to the island of Malta, to be in readiness whenever the evacuation shall be on the point of being effected.

It appears, nevertheless, that Mr. Drummond, the English minister at Naples, has not been authorized by his government to facilitate this transport; and that the motive alleged by that minister was, that the stipulations, which ought to precede the evacuation, not being fulfilled, that evacuation could not yet take place.

In communicating the above details to his excellency lord Hawkesbury, his Britannic majesty's principal secretary of state for the foreign department, the undersigned is directed to observe, that the sending the two thousand Neapolitans to the island of Malta cannot but be considered as a preliminary step, in order to accelerate the evacuation, as soon as the necessary measures shall have been taken by the respective plenipotentiaries; and that it does not in any manner prevent the subsequent concert on the details of the evacuation, conformably to the clauses of the treaty of Amiens.

The undersigned is moreover directed to request the British ministry to give general instructions to his majesty's plenipotentiaries at Naples, and at Malta, that the evacuation, and the other conditions of the 10th article, may be executed without obstacle, and without these plenipotentiaries conceiving themselves obliged to refer to their government, on each of the successive operations which should take place. The undersigned, &c.

(Signed) OTTO.

No. 15.—Note from Lord Hawkesbury to M. Otto, dated August 23rd, 1802.

The undersigned has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of M. Otto's note of the 21st instant. When the Neapolitan government notified to Mr. Drummond, the king's minister at Naples, that the two thousand troops which his Sicilian majesty had selected to serve in Malta, were ready to proceed to their destination, that gentleman declined taking any step to facilitate their embarkation, till he should receive intelligence of the arrival of sir Alexander Ball in that island, and till he should be informed that the commander in chief of the British forces had made suitable preparations for their reception. By the last advices from Malta it appears, that sir Alexander Ball had arrived there on the tenth of last month, and that, after having conferred with general Fox upon the subject, he had written to Mr. Drummond, that there was no impediment whatever to the immediate reception of the Neapolitan troops, and that their quarters would be prepared accordingly; the undersigned has the honour to state this to M. Otto as the most satisfactory answer which he can give to his note. It is probable, therefore, that the troops of his Sicilian majesty are already embarked and on their passage; but to prevent the possibility of any unnecessary delay or misconception, the most explicit instructions will be immediately forwarded to Mr. Drummond on this subject.

With respect to the other points in M. Otto's note, the undersigned can only repeat what he has before stated to him, that his majesty is most sincerely desirous to see all the stipulations of the 10th article of the definitive treaty carried into effect with the utmost punctuality, and with the least possible delay. With this view he takes this opportunity of observing to M. Otto, that, by the very last dispatches from the English ambassador at St. Petersburg, the French minister at that court had not even then received any instructions from his government relative to the steps to be taken in concert with lord St. Helens, for inviting the emperor to become guarantee of the provisions and stipulations of the article in question. The French minister at Berlin was in the same predicament. The undersigned, therefore, requests that M. Otto would have the goodness to represent these circumstances to his government, and to urge them, if they have not already done it, to transmit, without delay, to their ministers at those courts, the necessary instructions for bringing this part of the business to a conclusion. The undersigned, &c.

(Signed) HAWKESBURY.

No. 16.—Extract of a dispatch from Mr. Merry to Lord Hawkesbury, dated October 3rd, 1802.

As soon as the Helvetic government had retired from Berne to Lausanne, the partizans of the ancient federative system of the Swiss cantons, who established immediately in the former city a provisional government, deputed a Confidential to Paris, for the purpose of counteracting the measures of M. Stapfer, and of engaging the first consul to suffer the inhabitants of Switzerland to settle their affairs amongst themselves. He was instructed in any emergency to address himself to the ministers here of the principal powers of Europe, and to solicit their interference and assistance in the objects of his mission. He reached Paris four days ago, and had reason to flatter himself, from the result of an interview which he had immediately with M. Talleyrand, that the first consul would put no obstacle in the way of any arrangement which the Swiss might agree upon among themselves for the final settlement of their government; he was therefore much surprised to learn, soon afterwards, that a change had taken place in the first consul's sentiments, and his astonishment was completed when he found that the latter had taken so decided and so unfavourable a part in the business as that which is announced by a resolution published in yesterday's Moniteur (which I have the honour to transmit enclosed), in the form of an address to the inhabitants of Switzerland. This person having, besides this public declaration, acquired some private information of its being the first consul's intention to give the most immediate and vigorous effect to it, lost no time in addressing a letter to the latter, in which he took the liberty of stating that he must have been deceived by false representations, that his interference in the affairs of Switzerland was, as he was authorized to say, entirely unsolicited by the majority and the best thinking part of the inhabitants, and that he had therefore to entreat of him, in the most earnest manner, to suspend the execution of his resolution until those explanations could take place, which he trusted might be the means of preventing the immense effusion of blood which would otherwise inevitably ensue. He at the same time addressed himself, in the course of yesterday, to me, as well as to the Austrian and Spanish ambassadors, and to the Russian and Prussian ministers (not having gained admittance to M. de Cobenzel, nor to M. de Markoff or Lucchesini, he afterwards wrote to them), soliciting, in the strongest terms, an interference (jointly, if possible) on their part, with the French government, to endeavour to avert the impending evil. I naturally observed to him, in answer, that the present state of political relations between the great powers of Europe afforded no prospect of his obtaining of their ministers at Paris to adopt a concerted measure in favour of the object which he had so much at heart, and that of course I could not take it individually upon myself, without any express instruction from my government. He returned to me to-day, to acquaint me that he was not only as yet without a reply from any quarter, but had reason to fear that his prayers would not be listened to by the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian ministers; he therefore conjured me to transmit them to his majesty's government, from whom only his countrymen could have a hope of deriving any assistance in the terrible conflict which he knew they were determined to stand, and which would only cease by the extermination of every virtuous and brave man in the country. He then put into my hand a note, which he had drawn up in a hurry, and of which I enclose a copy. Whilst, my lord, it was out of my power to give him any encouragement to expect from his majesty's government the assistance which his petition expresses, I have thought it my duty to lose no time in making you acquainted with a state of things which may shortly be attended with very important consequences.

So long as Switzerland was occupied by the French armies, the wishes of the people could never be freely manifested. The petty revolutions which took place in the government were the mere tricks of certain factions, in which the nation at large took but a very trifling interest. Scarcely did Switzerland think herself independent when she was desirous of returning to her ancient institutions, rendered still dearer to her by her late misfortunes, and the arbitrary acts of the government furnished her with the means of doing so. Almost the whole of Switzerland, with unexampled unanimity and moderation, shook off the yoke. The cantons formed themselves into constituent bodies, and twelve of the thirteen cantons of Switzerland sent their representatives to the diet of Schwitz, in order there to organize a central power which might be acceptable to the neighbouring powers.

The aristocratical cantons renounced their exclusive rights: the Pays de Vaud was left at liberty to form its own constitution, as well as Thurgovia and the other new cantons.

The government having taken refuge at Lausanne, was by no means secure there, notwithstanding its regular troops; perhaps even at the present moment it no longer exists.

Who would not have thought that, according to the stipulation of the treaty of Luneville, which grants independence to Switzerland and the right of choosing its own government, every thing was settled, and that this nation might see its former happiness and tranquillity revive?

Who could have thought that the first consul would have issued such a decree as that of the 8th Vendemiaire?

Is an independent nation to be thus treated? Should Buonaparté persist in his determination, and the other powers should not interpose in our favour, it only remains for us either to bury ourselves in the ruins of our houses, although without hope of resistance, exhausted as we are by the Colossus who is about to overwhelm us, or to debase ourselves in the eyes of the whole universe!

Will the government of this generous nation, which has at all times afforded so many proofs of the interest it takes in the welfare of the Swiss, do nothing for us under circumstances which are to decide whether we are still to be ranked amongst free people?

We have only men left us:—the revolution, and spoliations without end, have exhausted our means; we are without arms, without ammunition, without stores, and without money to purchase them.

No. 17.—Note from Lord Hawkesbury to M. Otto, dated October 10th, 1802.

Lord Hawkesbury has received his majesty's commands to communicate, through M. Otto, to the French government, the sentiments of deep regret which have been excited in his majesty's mind by the address of the first consul to the Helvetic people, which was published by authority in the Moniteur of the 1st instant, and by the representations which have been made to his majesty on this subject, on behalf of the nation whose interests are so immediately affected by it. His majesty most sincerely laments the convulsions to which the Swiss cantons have for some time past been exposed; but he can consider their late exertions in no other light than as the lawful efforts of a brave and generous people to recover their ancient laws and government, and to procure the re-establishment of a system which experience has demonstrated not only to be favourable to the maintenance of their domestic happiness, but to be perfectly consistent with the tranquillity and security of other powers.

The cantons of Switzerland unquestionably possess, in the same degree as every other independent state, the right of regulating their own internal concerns; and this right has moreover, in the present instance, been formally and explicitly guaranteed to the Swiss nation by the French government, in the treaty of Luneville, conjointly with the other powers who were parties to that engagement. His majesty has no other desire than that the people of Switzerland, who now appear to be so generally united, should be left at liberty to settle their own internal government without the interposition of any foreign powers; and with whatever regret his majesty may have perused the late proclamation of the French government, he is yet unwilling to believe that they will farther attempt to control that independent nation in the exercise of their undoubted rights. His majesty thinks himself called upon by his regard for the general interests of Europe, and by his peculiar solicitude for the happiness and welfare of the Swiss nation, to express these his sentiments with a frankness and sincerity which he feels to be due to his character, and to the good understanding which he is desirous of preserving with the government of France.

No. 18.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Moore, dated October 10th, 1802.

Sir;—His majesty having deemed it expedient, that a confidential person should be sent, at the present moment, to Switzerland, in consequence of the communication which he has received from the Swiss confederacy, through their representative at Paris, I am commanded to inform you that he has made choice of you for that purpose.

It is of the utmost consequence, considering the nature of the business with which you are entrusted, that you should lose no time in taking your departure from hence, and that you should make every practicable exertion to arrive on the frontiers of Switzerland with as little delay as possible. You will inform yourself there what is the actual residence of the government of the Swiss confederation, to which you will immediately repair. Having taken the proper means to obtain a confidential interview with the persons who may be entrusted with the principal direction of affairs, you will communicate to them a copy of the note verbale which I delivered to M. Otto, and which is herewith inclosed; and you will take every opportunity of impressing upon their minds the deep interest which his majesty takes in the success of their exertions. You will state to them, that his majesty entertains hopes that his representation to the French government may have the effect of inducing the first consul to abandon his intention of compelling the Swiss nation by force to renounce that system of government under which they had so long prospered, and to which they appear to be almost unanimously anxious to return. In this event his majesty will feel himself bound to abstain from all interference on his part; it being his earnest desire that the Swiss nation should be left at liberty to regulate their own internal concerns, without the interposition of any foreign power. If, however, contrary to his majesty's expectations, the French government should persist in the system of coercion announced in the proclamation of the first consul, inserted in the Moniteur of the 1st instant, you will, in that case, inform yourself, by every means in your power, of the disposition of the people at large of the Swiss confederacy, and particularly of those who have the direction of their affairs, and of those who possess the greatest share of influence amongst them, to persevere in the defence of their rights, and in the maintenance of the system they have adopted. You will likewise inquire into the means of defence of which they may be possessed, and of the probability of their being exerted with success. You will on no account encourage them to persevere in active measures of resistance which they are not themselves desirous to adopt, or which they may believe are unlikely to be ultimately effectual. If, however, you should find that the people of the Swiss confederacy are generally determined to persevere in the maintenance of their independence, and of their right to return to their ancient system of government: and if you should be of opinion that, from the union that subsists amongst the people, and from their zeal and enthusiasm in the cause in which they are engaged, they are finally resolved, at all hazards, to resist the threatened attempt of the French government to interpose, by force of arms, in the settlement of their internal concerns; you will then immediately communicate, in confidence, to the Swiss government, that, either in the event of a French army having entered the country, or in the event of your having reason to be convinced that a French army is actually advancing for that purpose, his majesty has authorized you to accede to their application for pecuniary succours.

I have furnished you with a cypher and decypher, that you may have it in your power to correspond with his majesty's ministers at Vienna and Munich, if you should think it advisable; and as it is highly probable that the armies of the Swiss confederacy may be inadequately supplied with arms, ammunition, or provisions, and may be desirous of procuring supplies thereof from the neighbouring countries, you will use your utmost endeavours to give them every facility for this purpose. You will be very particular in informing me of the numbers and situation of any Austrian corps in the neighbourhood of Switzerland, and of the probability of their advancing in any event into the Swiss territory.

As it is of great importance that his majesty's government should be regularly informed of the events which may be passing in Switzerland, and of the dispositions that may prevail there, you will endeavour to ascertain the most safe and expeditious mode of conveying your letters which will avoid their passing through any part of the French republic.

As it is possible that, previous to your arrival in Switzerland, the present state of affairs may have undergone a decided alteration, either in consequence of the submission of the Swiss cantons, or of any compromise having taken place as to their internal concerns it will be proper that, in that case, you should take up your residence in such a situation as you may think most convenient in the neighbourhood of Switzerland, of which you will give me the earliest intelligence, and there wait for his majesty's further orders. I am, sir, &c.

No. 19.—Dispatch from Mr. Moore to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Constance, October 31st, 1802.

My Lord;—I have the honour to inform your lordship that I arrived here on the 27th instant, and that, having received this evening authentic information of the submission of the diet of Switzerland, assembled at Schwitz, to the French arms, I lose no time in dispatching the messenger Shaw with this intelligence; from which your lordship will perceive that it only remains for me to obey that part of my instructions by which I am directed, under such circumstances, to take up my residence in the neighbourhood of Switzerland, and there to await his majesty's further orders. I have, &c.

No. 20.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Moore, dated November 25th, 1802.

Sir;—I have duly received your several letters by the messenger Shaw. As from the present state of Switzerland, your continuance in the vicinity of that country appears to be no longer necessary, you are at liberty to return to England as soon as it may suit your convenience. I am, &c.

No. 21.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Liston to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Hague, October 13th, 1802.

A few hours after I had sent off my last dispatch to your lordship (on Saturday the 9th of this month), the French ambassador, M. de Semonville, waited upon the president of the government of state, and informed him that he had just received, by a courier from Paris, orders to inform the government of this country,

“Que le premier consul avoit appris, avec autant de surprise que d'indignation, que des personnes avides de révolutions vouloient de nouveau troubler le repos dans la Batavie, en abusant même pour cet effet de noms respectables: et que le premier consul, comme allié de la republique, invitoit le gouvernement à prendre toutes les mesures nécessaires pour maintenir l'ordre des choses établi par la constitution.”

These were nearly the words read to me by the secretary of state, from a note in his own hand-writing, dictated to him by M. de Semonville, with a view to its publication (and a translation was accordingly inserted in the Dutch official paper of the Hague on the 11th); but they fall very far short of the language employed by the French minister for foreign affairs in his dispatches to the ambassador, and in the communication made by him to the Dutch charge d'affaires at Paris (who also sent a messenger to the Hague upon this occasion). In these M. de Talleyrand entered into considerable detail on the subject of the plots supposed to be formed in this country against the administration, mentioned the names of the chiefs, and ended by making an offer, on the part of the first consul, to come to the assistance of the government (should circumstances render it necessary) with all his forces.

No. 22.—Dispatch from Mr. Liston to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Hague, October 29th, 1802.

My Lord;—The recent attack made by Buonaparté upon the liberties and independence of the Swiss cantons, has naturally made a strong impression on the inhabitants of this country; and the public anxiety has been much augmented by certain symptoms in the conduct of the consular government, which seem to indicate an intention not to withdraw the French troops, which have been kept in the Batavian republic for some time past, under the title of auxiliaries, and paid and maintained at the expence of the Dutch nation.

These troops (amounting to between ten and eleven thousand men) were to remain here till the conclusion of the definitive treaty with Great Britain. It was afterwards formally promised on the part of France, that they should evacuate the territories of the republic, at the latest, on the expiration of the last French year (the 23rd of September).—They accordingly began their march to the southward a few days before that period; and the government and the people rejoiced at the prospect of being finally relieved from a load which has become extremely irksome to them. But, on pretence that a great portion of the corps were to be embarked at Flushing for Louisiana, and that there was a want of shipping for their accommodation, they took up their quarters at the frontiers of the country (at Bois-le-Duc, Breda, and Bergen-op-Zoom), where they still remain; and demands have continued to be made for their pay and maintenance.

Hopes were, however, entertained, from day to day, that their departure would take place; when, to the astonishment of the Batavian government, official notice was (last week) transmitted from France to the department of war at the Hague (which has been charged with the support of these corps), that the first consul has been pleased to appoint a new commander in chief (general Montrichard), and a new staff, for the auxiliary troops in this country; and the notice was given that government might provide for the pay of the officers in question.

The administration appear resolved to oppose all the resistance in their power to this unexpected and oppressive extortion. An express has been sent off to the Dutch ambassador at Paris, charging him to claim, in the most urgent terms, the accomplishment of the treaties subsisting between the two republics, and the fulfilment of the repeated and recent promises made by the French government upon this subject. And in case of the failure of this application, they talk of addressing themselves to the principal powers of Europe, who had any share or influence in the conclusion of the peace, to entreat their intervention and good offices, with a view to the maintenance of the independence of the republic. I have, &c.

ROBERT LISTON.

No. 23.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated November 30th, 1802.

His majesty's government have learnt with some surprise, from the communications from general Stuart, that that officer had signified to colonel Sebastiani his inability to evacuate Egypt, until he should receive specific orders for that purpose. It is certainly true that no warrant has been transmitted to general Stuart, or to his predecessor the earl of Cavan, for the evacuation of Egypt: neither was it considered to be necessary, inasmuch as his majesty's government had already expressed their intention to general Stuart, in his instructions, that, except in a case of absolute necessity, the king's troops should remain in Egypt no longer than the month of July last. In all the instances of places which had been conquered by the king's forces, and of which possession had been taken in his majesty's name, it has been usual, when they have been restored to the French republic, or its allies, that the commanding officer should be furnished with a regular warrant under the king's sign manual, authorizing him to make such restoration. But the case of Egypt is different, as that country had never been taken possession of in his majesty's name, as it had actually been restored to the Ottoman Porte, and as certain stations in it were continued to be occupied merely as military posts, until the means of removing the troops should be provided.

It is probable that, in the present instance, general Stuart may have been misled by a doubt as to the extent of his own power, and by the opinion that he required a warrant to evacuate Egypt, similar to that which had been granted to officers who superintended the restitution of conquests of which possession had been taken in his majesty's name. In order, however, to obviate any farther difficulties, instructions have now been sent to general Stuart, directing him to remove the king's troops from Egypt with as little delay as possible, and information has been given to this effect to general Andreossy.

No. 24.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord St. Helens to Lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, July 20th, 1802.

I have since renewed my applications to this government on the business of Malta, and have some reason to hope, that some impression has been made on the mind of his imperial majesty. The French minister, however, has not yet received his instructions; and, till they arrive, it will, of course, be impossible for me to take the requisite steps for bringing this affair to any satisfactory, or even positive issue.

No. 25.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord St. Helens, to Lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, August 3rd, 1802.

I must not omit to acquaint your lordship, that, although, in order to prevent any further waste of time, I have thought it right to endeavour to obtain a definitive explanation of the intentions of this court, with relation to the proposed guarantee, I have not yet been enabled to demand it officially, according to the terms of the treaty of Amiens, as the French minister here is still without instructions authorizing him to join with me in that instance.

No. 26.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Paget to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Vienna, July 18th, 1802.

On the 15th instant, M. de Champagny and I met at a conference at the vice-chancellor's, to whom we presented our respective notes, copies of which I have the honour to enclose, marked A. and B.

[Inclosure marked A. in No. 26.]

The undersigned, his Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, has the honour to transmit herewith to the vice-chancellor of court and state, a copy of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens. He has, at the same time, the honour to acquaint his excellency that he has received orders from his court to invite his majesty the emperor and king, conformable to the 13th paragraph of that article, to give his guarantee to the arrangements stipulated therein. He therefore requests the vice-chancellor of court and state to lay this communication before his Imperial majesty.

ARTHUR PAGET.

Vienna, 15th July, 1802.

[Inclosure marked B. in No. 26.]

The ambassador of the French republic, on the invitation which has been given him by Mr. Paget, his Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, hastens, in conjunction with that minister, to communicate to the vice-chancellor of court and state, the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens, concerning the order and island of Malta, the sixth paragraph of which article places the independency of the island of Malta under the guarantee of his Imperial majesty, and several other powers of Europe. In taking this step, the ambassador, who has not received any orders respecting it, acts from the knowledge he has of the intention of his government to execute all the stipulations of the treaties it has concluded. The ambassador seizes, with eagerness, this opportunity to offer to his excellency the assurances of his high consideration.—Vienna, 26th Messidor, year 10.

COUNT COBENZEL.

No. 27.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Paget to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Vienna, August 22nd, 1802.

I have the honour herewith to transmit to your lordship the emperor's act of guarantee and accession to the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens.

The emperor and king having been invited by his Britannic majesty and the first consul of the French republic to accede to the stipulations contained in the 10th article of the treaty concluded and signed at Amiens on the 29th of March, 1802 (4th Germinal, year 10), respecting the order of St. John of Jerusalem; and also to take under his protection and guarantee, conjointly with the other powers cited in the sixth paragraph of the said article, whatever was therein especially stipulated on the subject of the island of Malta: and his Imperial and Royal Apostolic majesty having been, at the same time, informed that the two above-mentioned powers adopted on their part the concert which had been entered into by the two imperial courts, previous to the exchange of the ratifications of the above-mentioned treaty of Amiens, to leave to the pope the selection of a grand master from amongst the candidates nominated for that purpose by the priories of the order: his majesty, the emperor and king, desirous, on the present occasion, of exhibiting a fresh proof of his sincere friendship for his majesty, the king of Great Britain, and for the first consul of the French republic, has empowered and instructed his grand chamberlain and cabinet minister, count Francis of Colloredo, and his vice-chancellor of court and state, count Lewis of Cobenzel, to proceed in his name to the accession and guarantee of the stipulations of the tenth article of the aforementioned treaty; who, in virtue thereof, declare that his majesty accedes, by the present act, to the stipulations contained in this article, with the clause herein-before referred to, respecting the mode of the next election of the grand master of the order; and his majesty specifically guarantees whatsoever is therein regulated, with regard to the independence of the islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino.

In witness whereof we, the plenipotentiaries of his Imperial Royal and Apostolic majesty, have signed the present act of accession and of guarantee; have thereunto affixed the seal of our arms, and have exchanged it against the acts of acceptance, delivered in the name of his majesty the king of Great Britain, and of the first consul of the French republic. Which acts of accession, of guarantee, and of acceptance, shall be ratified in the space of four weeks, or sooner, if it can be done.—Done at Vienna, the 20th of August, 1802.

No. 28.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Casamajor to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Berlin, August 21st, 1802.

Having opened the subject of your lordship's last dispatch, relative to the accession of this court to the arrangement stipulated in the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens, to Mr. Bignon, this gentleman undertook, very willingly, to mention the same to his government, and has, in fact, already performed his promise. In several conversations with Mr. Bignon, in which I have occasionally remarked, that nothing had hitherto been said to me here upon the subject of Malta, he has constantly affected the greatest indifference, and treated it as a business of too little importance to occupy the attention of the French government.

No. 29.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Casamajor to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Berlin, August 31st, 1802.

Mr. Bignon received, last night, instructions from the French government, to invite the king of Prussia, conjointly with me, to accede to the guarantee of the independence of the island of Malta, and of the other stipulations relating to that island, which are contained in the tenth article of the definitive treaty of Amiens. Mr. Bignon sent to me immediately, and we propose to meet to-morrow, for the purpose of preparing a note upon this subject, of which we shall each present a copy to count Haugwitz.

No. 30.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Casamajor to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Berlin, October 2nd, 1802.

My note upon the subject of the guarantee of Malta remains unanswered.

No. 31.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Jackson to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Berlin, November 25th, 1802.

At my first interview with count Haugwitz, I told him, that the only subject in suspense between our two courts, to which I need call his immediate attention, was that of the guarantee of Malta, on which an answer is still due from him. He adverted to what he had told Mr. Casamajor, of the king his master having ordered a report to be made to him on the state of the commanders in Silesia, hinting, that this country took a very slight interest in the fate of the island; and that he was countenanced in withholding its guarantee by the example of Spain. He, however, added, that the report in question had been made to the king, and that he only waited his majesty's commands to confer with me further upon the subject.

No. 32.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Garlike to Lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, September 17th, 1802.

The French minister has, at length, been directed by his government to make, conjointly with his majesty's minister here, a formal invitation to the emperor of Russia for his Imperial majesty's guarantee of the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens, which provide for the independence of the islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino, and of the other arrangements of that article.

No. 33.—Extract of a Dispatch from sir John Borlase Warren to lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, Nov. 18, 1802.

On the 3rd instant, I waited upon the chancellor with general Hedouville, when the note of invitation for his imperial majesty's guarantee of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens was presented by each of us. General de Hedouville entered into various reasons to induce the Russian government to grant the guarantee; the principal of which was to prove, that, without the guarantee of Russia either of the two powers, upon the first difference between them, would look upon themselves at liberty to seize upon the island, which was only important in a military point of view; and the only alteration he should make in his invitation was, that the island might be delivered up to the Neapolitan troops. He added that the act of guarantee would not be considered as affecting the arrangement of any particular power with the order, or of any alteration that power might wish to make in the baillages, or that part belonging to itself, as Spain had already done.

No. 34.—Extract of a Dispatch from sir John Borlase Warren to lord Hawkesbury, dated St. Petersburg, Nov. 25, 1802.

The chancellor appointed yesterday evening for delivering to me, and to the French minister the answer of the Russian government to his majesty's invitation for his imperial majesty's accession to the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens.

Conditions upon which his Imperial Majesty of all the Russias is willing to accede to the stipulations of the 10th article of the Treaty of Amiens.

1. The acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the order of St. John of Jerusalem over the island of Malta and its dependencies; the acknowledgment of the grand master, and of the civil government of the order, according to its ancient institutions, with the admission into it of native Maltese. Upon this point, as well as upon every other that may relate to its interior organization, the legal government of the order shall have the power to enact and prescribe such regulations as it may judge best calculated to promote the future welfare and prosperity of the order.

2. The rights of the king of the Two Sicilies as suzerain of the island shall remain upon the same footing as they were previous to the war which is now terminated by the treaty of Amiens.

3. The independence and neutrality of the island of Malta, its ports and dependencies, shall be secured and guaranteed by the respective contracting powers, who shall mutually engage to acknowledge and maintain that neutrality in all cases of war; whether between each other, or between any of them, and any other power, not excepting his Sicilian majesty, whose right of suzerainty shall not extend so as to enable him to cause a departure from the neutrality of the island, as guaranteed by the present act.

4th. Until the order shall be in a situation to provide, by its own resources, for the maintenance of its independence and neutrality, as secured by the preceding article, as well as for the defence of their principal residence, the different forts shall be occupied by his Sicilian majesty's troops, who shall send a sufficient force for the defence of the island and its dependencies, the number of which shall be agreed upon by his said majesty and the two contracting powers, who shall take upon themselves, conjointly, the expense of maintaining the whole of the said troops, so long as the defence of the island shall continue to be entrusted to them, during which period, the said troops shall be under the authority of the grand master of his government.

5. The present additional act shall be considered as forming an integral part of the treaty of Amiens, the same as if it had been inserted therein, word for word, and shall be executed in like manner.

6. Their majesties the emperor of all the Russias, the emperor of the Romans, the king of Spain, the king of the Two Sicilies, and the king of Prussia, shall be invited to accede to this act as guarantees.

COMTE ALEXANDRE
DE WORONZOW.

No. 35.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, Jan. 27, 1803.

My Lord;—I have to report to your lordship the purport of a conversation I had on Tuesday last, by appointment, with M. Talleyrand. He had invited me, some days ago, for this purpose. The communication he had to make to me related to two points, both equally important, as he said, to the maintenance of good harmony between the two countries; with this difference, however, that the one originated with himself, and was dictated by his anxiety to do away every thing which might feed the mutual irritation of the two countries; and the other, by the express order of the first consul. That which came from himself related to the English newspapers, against which he pronounced a most bitter philippic, assuring me, that the first consul was extremely hurt to find that his endeavours to conciliate, had hitherto produced no other effect, than to increase the abuse with which the papers in England continually loaded him. He expatiated much upon this topic, and endeavoured to establish a fact, which I assured him a reference to any one newspaper in Paris would instantly refute, that, during four months not a word of provocation had appeared in any French journal, which could justify a retort from those published in England. For the rest he advanced nothing but what has been said on more than one occasion to Mr. Merry, and reported by him to your lordship. I was, however, given to understand, that the first consul was, in fact, highly incensed, and the more so, he was pleased to say, as it came from a country of whose good opinion he was so very ambitious.

In my reply, I could but go over the old ground, and endeavour to make M. Talleyrand understand—first, that whatever was said in English papers, might be considered but as a national retaliation for what was published in the French papers—secondly, that what was officially published here, was by no means so in England—and, thirdly, that although the government possessed a control over the press in France, the English government neither had, nor could have, unless they purchased it at the same price, any whatever in England. Upon this, he endeavoured to prove to me, that there were papers in England attached to different parties, and went over their names and supposed connexion with great precision; and that, consequently, his majesty's ministers might so far control those, at least, which depended upon them, as to prevent their inserting that abuse which must be considered not been attracted by the very extraordinary publication of the report of colonel Sebastiani to the first consul. It is impossible for his majesty to view this report in any other light than as an official publication; for without referring particularly to explanations, which have been repeatedly given upon the subject of publications in the Moniteur, the article in question, as it purports to be the report to the first consul of an accredited agent, as it appears to have been signed by colonel Sebastiani himself, and as it is published in the official paper, with an official title affixed to it, must be considered as authorized by the French government. This report contains the most unjustifiable insinuations, and charges against the officer who commanded his forces in Egypt and against the British army in that quarter; insinuations and charges wholly destitute of foundation, and such as would warrant his majesty in demanding that satisfaction, which, on occasions of this nature, independent powers, in a state of amity, have a right to expect from each other. It discloses, moreover, views in the highest degree injurious to the interests of his majesty's dominions, and directly repugnant to, and utterly inconsistent with, the spirit and letter of the treaty of peace, concluded between his majesty and the French government and his majesty would feel that he was wanting in a proper regard to the honour of his crown, and to the interests of his dominions, if he could see with indifference, such a system developed and avowed. His majesty cannot, therefore, regard the conduct of the French government, on various occasions, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, the insinuations and charges contained in the report of colonel Sebastiani, and the views which that report discloses, without feeling it necessary for him, distinctly, to declare, that it will be impossible for him to enter into any further discussion relative to Malta, unless he receives satisfactory explanation on the subject of this communication.

Your excellency is desired to take an early opportunity of fully explaining his majesty's sentiments, as above stated, to the French government. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 37.—Extract of a Dispatch from lord Whitworth to lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, February 17th, 1803.

I have the honour to acquaint your lordship that I saw M. de Talleyrand on Tuesday last, for the purpose of carrying into effect your lordship's instructions of the 9th instant. I began by telling him that I had nothing new to communicate to him: but merely to confirm officially that which I had already from myself premised. I did not, however, pass over, with the same indifference, the arguments with which your lordship has furnished me. I recapitulated them all; the principle on which the treaty of Amiens was founded; and the right which naturally arose from that principle, of interference on our part for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction or compensation, for any essential differences which may have arisen in the relative situation of the two countries. I instanced the cases, beginning with Italy, and concluding with Switzerland, in which the territory or influence of France had been extended subsequent to the treaty of Amiens.

I represented to him, that this principle of compensation had been fully and formally admitted by the French government, in the course of the negotiation at Amiens. I then told him, that notwithstanding the indisputable right which his majesty might have derived of claiming some counterpoise for such acquisitions, instructions would have been given me, by which I should have been empowered to declare his majesty's readiness to carry into effect the full intent of the 10th article of the treaty, if the attention of his majesty's government had not been roused by the official publication of colonel Sebastiani's report to the first consul. It was useless to recapitulate the particulars of this very extraordinary report; but I appealed to him whether it was not of a nature, exclusive of the personal allusions it contained, to excite the utmost jealousy in the minds of his majesty's ministers, and to demand on their part every measure of precaution. I concluded with the distinct declaration, that it was impossible for his majesty to enter into any further discussion relative to Malta, unless he receives satisfactory explanations on the subject of the first consul's views.

M. de Talleyrand, in his reply, did not attempt to dispute the drift of my argument. He admitted with an affected tone of candour, that the jealousy we felt on the score of Egypt, with a view to our possessions in India, was natural. But he could not admit that any thing had appeared, in the conduct of the French government, in justification of the alarm we expressed. After repeating what he had said to me in a former conversation, on the subject of Sebastiani's mission, which he asserted to be strictly commercial, he expatiated, at great length, on the sincere desire of the first consul to maintain inviolable the peace which had been so lately concluded; adding, that the situation of the French finances was such, that were not this desire of peace in the first consul an effect of system, it would be most imperiously dictated to him by the total impossibility in which this country found itself of carrying on that extensive state of warfare, which even a partial rupture would naturally lead to. He expressed great surprise, therefore, that any suspicion should attach when the means of disturbing the public tranquillity were, as must be well known in England, so completely wanting; and desired to know what was the nature and degree of satisfaction which his majesty would require. On this I told him, that I could not pretend to say by what means those apprehensions which the conduct of this government had raised in England, were to be allayed; but I could assure him, that, in the discussion of them, we should be animated solely by a sincere desire to be convinced of the truth of his assertions, since on that depended the peace and happiness of Europe. I took this opportunity of assuring him, that although, according to his statement of the situation of France, we might possess, in a greater degree, the means of supporting the expense of a war, since those means arose from sources which even a state of warfare did not dry up, yet such was his majesty's sincere desire of maintaining peace, that nothing but absolute and unavoidable necessity would ever induce him to deprive his subjects of the blessings which they begin to enjoy.

No. 38.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, Feb. 21, 1803.

My Lord;—My last dispatch, in which I gave your lordship an account of my conference with M. de Talleyrand, was scarcely gone, when I received a note from him, informing me that the first consul wished to converse with me, and desired I would come to him at the Thuilleries at 9 o'clock. He received me in his cabinet with tolerable cordiality, and, after talking on different subjects for a few minutes, he desired me to sit down, as he himself did on the other side of the table, and began. He told me that he felt it necessary, after what had passed between me and M. de Talleyrand, that he should, in the most clear and authentic manner, make known his sentiments to me, in order to their being communicated to his majesty; and he conceived this would be more effectually done by himself than through any medium whatever. He said that it was a matter of infinite disappointment to him, that the treaty of Amiens, instead of being followed by conciliation and friendship, the natural effects of peace, had been productive only of continual and increasing jealousy and mistrust, and that this mistrust was now avowed in such a manner as must bring the point to an issue.

He now enumerated the several provocations which he pretended to have received from England. He placed in the first line our not evacuating Malta and Alexandria, as we were bound to do by the treaty. In this, he said, that no consideration on earth should make him acquiesce; and, of the two, he had rather see us in possession of the Fauxbourg St. Antoine than Malta. He then adverted to the abuse thrown out against him in the English public prints; but this, he said, he did not so much regard as that which appeared in the French papers published in London. This he considered as much more mischievous, since it was meant to excite this country against him and his government.

[VOL. XXXVI.]

He complained of the protection given to Georges and others of his description, who, instead of being sent to Canada, as had been repeatedly promised, were permitted to remain in England, handsomely pensioned, and constantly committing all sorts of crimes on the coasts of France, as well as in the interior. In confirmation of this, he told me that two men had, within these few days, been apprehended in Normandy, and were now on their way to Paris, who were hired assassins, and employed by the bishop of Arras, by the baron de Rolle, by Georges, and by Dutheil, as would be fully proved in a court of justice, and made known to the world.

He acknowledged that the irritation he felt against England increased daily, because every wind (I make use as much as I can of his own ideas and expressions) which blew from England, brought nothing but enmity and hatred against him.

He now went back to Egypt, and told me that if he had felt the smallest inclination to take possession of it by force, he might have done it a month ago, by sending twenty-five thousand men to Aboukir, who would have possessed themselves of the whole country in defiance of the four thousand British in Alexandria. That instead of that garrison being a means of protecting Egypt, it was only furnishing him with a pretence for invading it. This he should not do, whatever might be his desire to have it a colony, because he did not think it worth the risk of a war, in which he might, perhaps, be considered as the aggressor, and by which he should lose more than he could gain, since, sooner or later, Egypt would belong France, either by the falling to pieces of the Turkish empire, or by some arrangement with the Porte.

As a proof of his desire to maintain peace, he wished to know what he had to gain by going to war with England. A descent was the only means of offence he had, and that he was determined to attempt, by putting himself at the head of the expedition. But how could it be supposed, that, after having gained the height on which he stood, he would risk his life and reputation in such a hazardous attempt, unless forced to it by necessity, when the chances were that he and the greatest part of the expedition would go to the bottom of the sea. He talked much on this subject, but never affected to diminish the danger. He acknowledged that there were one hundred chances to one against him, but still he was determined to attempt it, if war should be the consequence of the present discussion; and that such was the disposition of the troops, that army after army would be found for the enterprise.

He then expatiated much on the natural force of the two countries. France, with an army of four hundred and eighty thousand men; for to this amount it is, he said, to be immediately completed, all ready for the most desperate enterprises; and England with a fleet that made her mistress of the seas, and which he did not think he should be able to equal in less than ten years. Two such countries, by a proper understanding, might govern the world, but by their strifes might overturn it. He said, that, if he had not felt the enmity of the British government, on every occasion, since the treaty of Amiens, there would have been nothing that he would not have done to prove his desire to conciliate; participation in indemnities, as well as in influence, on the continent; treaties of commerce; in short, any thing that could have given satisfaction, and have testified his friendship. Nothing, however, had been able to conquer the hatred of the British government, and, therefore, it was now come to the point whether we should have peace or war. To preserve peace, the treaty of Amiens must be fulfilled; the abuse in the public prints, if not totally suppressed, at least kept within bounds, and confined to the English papers; and the protection so openly given to his bitterest enemies (alluding to Georges, and persons of that description), must be withdrawn. If war, it was necessary only to say so, and to refuse to fulfil the treaty. He now made the tour of Europe, to prove to me that, in its present state, there was no power with which we could coalesce, for the purpose of making war against France; consequently it was our interest to gain time, and if we had any point to gain, renew the war when circumstances were more favourable. He said it was not doing him justice, to suppose that he conceived himself above the opinion of his country or of Europe. He would not risk uniting Europe against him, by any violent act of aggression, neither was he so powerful in France, as to persuade the nation to go to war, unless on good grounds. He said that he had not chastised the Algerines, from his unwillingness to excite the jealousy of other powers, but he hoped that England, Russia, and France would one day feel that it was their interest to destroy such a nest of thieves, and force them to live rather by cultivating their land, than by plunder.

In the little I said to him (for he gave me, in the course of two hours, but very few opportunities of saying a word), I confined myself strictly to the tenor of your lordship's instructions. I urged them in the same manner as I had done to M. de Talleyrand and dwelt as strongly as I could on the sensation which the publication of Sebastiani's report had created in England, where the views of France towards Egypt must always command the utmost vigilance and jealousy. He maintained that what ought to convince us of his desire of peace was, on the one hand, the little he had to gain by renewing the war, and, on the other, the facility with which he might have taken possession of Egypt, with the very ships and troops which were now going from the Mediterranean to St. Domingo, and that with the approbation of all Europe, and more particularly of the Turks, who had repeatedly invited him to join with them, for the purpose of forcing us to evacuate their territory.

I do not pretend to follow the arguments of the first consul in detail: this would be impossible, from the vast variety of matter which he took occasion to introduce. His purpose was evidently to convince me, that on Malta must depend peace or war, and, at the same time to impress upon my mind a strong idea of the means he possessed of annoying us at home and abroad,

With regard to the mistrust and jealousy which, he said constantly prevailed since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, I observed, that, after a war of such long duration, so full of rancour, and carried on in a manner of which history has no example, it was but natural that a considerable degree of agitation should prevail: but this, like the swell after a storm, would gradually subside, if not kept up by the policy of either party; that I would not pretend to pronounce which had been the aggressor in the paper war of which he complained, and which was still kept up, though with this difference, that in England it was independent of government, and in France its very act and deed. To this I added, that it must be admitted that we had such motives of mistrust against France, as could not be alleged against us; and I was going to instance the accession of territory and influence gained by France since the treaty, when he interrupted me, by saying, I suppose you mean Piedmont and Switzerland; "ce sont des bagatelles:" and it must have been foreseen, whilst the negotiation was pending; "Vous n'avez pas le droit d'en parler à cette heure." I then alleged, as a cause of mistrust and of jealousy, the impossibility of obtaining justice or any kind of redress, for any of his majesty's subjects.—He asked me in what respect; and I told him, that, since the signing of the treaty, not one British claimant had been satisfied, although every Frenchman of that description had been so within one month after that period; and that since I had been here, and I could say as much of my predecessors, not one satisfactory answer had been obtained, to the innumerable representations which we had been under the necessity of making in favour of British subjects and property detained in the several ports of France, and elsewhere, without even a shadow of justice: such an order of things, I said, was not made to inspire confidence, but, on the contrary, must create mistrust. This, he said, must be attributed to the natural difficulties attending such suits, when both parties thought themselves right; but he denied that such delays could proceed from any disinclination to do what was just and right. With regard to the pensions which were granted to French or Swiss individuals, I observed that they were given as a reward for past services during the war, and most certainly not for present ones, and still less for such as had been insinuated of a nature repugnant to the feelings of every individual in England, and to the universally acknowledged loyalty and honour of the British government. That as for any participation of indemnities, or other accessions which his majesty might have obtained, I could take upon myself to assure him, that his majesty's ambitions led him rather to preserve than to acquire. And that, with regard to the most propitious moment for renewing hostilities, his majesty, whose sincere desire it was, to continue the blessings of peace to his subjects, would always consider such a measure as the greatest calamity; but that, if his majesty was so desirous of peace, it must not be imputed to the difficulty of obtaining allies; and the less so, as those means which it might be necessary to afford such allies for, perhaps, inadequate services, would all be concentrated in England, and give a proportionate increase of energy to our own exertions.

At this part of the conversation, he rose from his chair, and told me that he should give orders to general Andreossy to enter on the discussion of this business with your lordship; but he wished that I should, at the same time, be made acquainted with his motives, and convinced of his sincerity, rather from himself than from his ministers. He then, after a conversation of two hours, during the greatest part of which he talked incessantly, conversed for a few moments on indifferent subjects, in apparent good humour, and retired.

Such was, nearly as I can recollect, the purport of this conference.

It must, however, be observed, that he did not, as M. Talleyrand had done, affect to attribute colonel Sebastiani's mission to commercial motives only, but as one rendered necessary, in a military point of view, by the infraction by us of the treaty of Amiens.

I have the honour to be, &c.

WHITWORTH.

P. S. This conversation took place on Friday last, and this morning I saw M. de Talleyrand. He had been with the first consul, after I left him, and he assured me that he had been very well satisfied with the frankness with which I had made my observations on what fell from him. I told him, that, without entering into any farther detail, what I had said to the first consul amounted to an assurance of what I trusted there could be no doubt, of the readiness of his majesty's ministers to remove all subjects of discussion, where that could be done without violating the laws of the country, and to fulfil strictly the engagements which they had contracted, inasmuch as that could be reconciled with the safety of the state.—As this applied to Malta and Egypt, he gave me to understand that a project was in contemplation, by which the integrity of the Turkish empire would be so effectually secured, as to do away every cause of doubt or uneasiness, either with regard to Egypt, or any part of the Turkish dominions. He could not then, he said, explain himself farther. Under these circumstances, no one can expect that we should relinquish that assurance which we have, in hand, till something equally satisfactory is proposed and adopted.

WHITWORTH.

No. 39.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated Feb. 18th, 1803.

My Lord;—Your excellency's dispatch of February 21st, has been received, and laid before the king.

I have great satisfaction in communicating to you his majesty's entire approbation of the able and judicious manner in which you appear to have executed the instructions which I gave to you in my dispatch of the 9th instant.

The account you have given of your interview with the first consul, is, in every respect, important. It is unnecessary for me to remark on the tone and temper in which the sentiments of the first consul appear to have been expressed, or to offer any observations in addition to those so properly made by your excellency, at the time, upon several of the topics which were brought forward by the first consul, in the course of your conversation; I shall therefore, content myself with referring your excellency to my dispatch to Mr. Merry, of August 28th, 1802, in which the subject of the complaints of the French government, respecting the freedom of the press, the emigrants, &c. are particularly discussed. I cannot, however, avoid noticing, that nothing approaching to explanation or satisfaction is stated to have been thrown out by the first consul, in answer to the just representations and complaints of his majesty, in consequence of the unwarrantable insinuations and charges contained in colonel Sebastiani's report against his majesty's government,—the officer commanding his forces in Egypt, and his army in that quarter; but that, on the other hand, the language of the first consul has tended to strengthen and confirm the suspicions which that publication was peculiarly calculated to excite.

I shall now proceed to give you some farther instructions on the language which it may be proper for you to hold respecting the charge which has been advanced against his majesty's government, of their unwillingness to fulfil the treaty of Amiens. The treaty of Amiens has been in a course of execution, on the part of his majesty, in every article in which, according to the spirit of that treaty, it has been found capable of execution. There cannot be the least doubt that Egypt is at this time completely evacuated. The delay which had arisen in the evacuation of Alexandria, was owing to accidental circumstances, the particulars of which were explained to you in my dispatch of the 30th November last: and I had every reason to believe, from the communication I had with general Andreossi on the subject, that the French government were perfectly satisfied with the explanation which he was authorized, at the time, to give them respecting it.

With regard to that article of the treaty which relates to Malta, the stipulations contained in it (owing to circumstances which it was not in the power of his majesty to control) have not been found capable of execution. The refusal of Russia to accede to the arrangement, except on condition that the Maltese language should be abolished;—the silence of the court of Berlin, with respect to the invitation that has been made to it, in consequence of the treaty, to become a guaranteeing power;—the abolition of the Spanish priories, in defiance of the treaty to which the king of Spain was a party;—the declaration of the Portuguese government, of their intention to sequester the property of the Portuguese priory, as forming a part of the Spanish language, unless the property of the Spanish priories is restored to them;—the non-election of a grand master:—These circumstances would have been sufficient, without any other special grounds, to have warranted his majesty in suspending the evacuation of the island, until some new arrangement could be adjusted for its security and independence. But when it is considered how greatly the dominion, power, and influence of France have of late been extended, his majesty must feel that he has an incontestible right, conformably to the principles on which the treaty of peace was negotiated and concluded, to demand additional securities in any new arrangement which it might be necessary to make, with a view of effecting the real objects of that treaty. And these considerations, sufficient as they might be in themselves, to justify the line of conduct which his majesty had determined to adopt, have received additional force from the views which have been recently and unreservedly manifested by the French government, respecting the Turkish dominions, and the islands in the Adriatic (and which have been in a great degree admitted by the first consul, in his interview with your excellency)—views which are directly repugnant, not only to the spirit, but to the letter of the treaty of Amiens.

From the postscript in your excellency's letter, it appears, that a project was in contemplation, by which, according to the declaration of M. Talleyrand, the integrity of the Turkish territory would be secured so as to do away every cause of doubt or uneasiness, either with regard to Egypt, or to any other part of the Turkish dominions.—His majesty will consider the communication of such a project as indicating a disposition, on the part of the French government, to afford him explanation and satisfaction respecting some of the points which have been the subject of his representations. But, after all that has passed, his majesty cannot consent that his troops should evacuate the island of Malta, until substantial security has been provided for those objects which, under the present circumstances, might be materially endangered by their removal. I am, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 40.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, March 5th, 1803.

My Lord;—I saw M. de Talleyrand yesterday, and acquitted myself of your lordship's instructions. I recapitulated the several arguments therein contained, dwelling particularly on the open avowal of the first consul's views in Egypt; and concluding with the resolution of his majesty not to withdraw his troops from Malta, until some security should be given, that, by so doing, his majesty should not expose the safety of his own dominions.

He heard me with great patience, and, in answer, endeavoured, as before, to convince me that there was no reason whatever for the apprehensions which we entertained.—That it was true, the acquisition of Egypt had been, and, perhaps, still was, a favourite object of the first consul; but that it was not so much so, as to allow him to go to war for its attainment.

I then told him, that what had in a particular manner excited the attention of your lordship, in my last report, was the assurance he had given me of some project being in contemplation, whereby the integrity of the Turkish empire would be so insured, in all its parts, as to remove every doubt or apprehension. I begged him, therefore, to explain himself on this subject, which I conceived to be of the utmost importance, since it was only by such means that both parties could be satisfied. He then gave me to understand, that what he had termed a project was nothing more than what had been expressed in the first consul's message to the legislative body, when he says, that there is a French ambassador at Constantinople, who is charged to give every assurance of the disposition of France to strengthen, instead of to weaken, that government. I expressed a doubt whether this, or any other parole security, would be considered as sufficient in such a transaction. Hereupon he repeated the question—What, then, is the security which you require, and which the first consul can give?—This, I told him, must be the subject of the negotiation on which we were willing to enter; and I trusted that the French government would bring into it the same temper, and the same real desire to conciliate, which was manifested by his majesty's ministers.

M. de Talleyrand now informed me, that the first consul had, five or six days ago, ordered instructions to be sent to general Andreossi, by which he was to require an immediate and categorical answer to the plain question—Whether his majesty would, or would not, cause Malta to be evacuated by the British troops? That he concluded this communication was already made, and that he expected to learn the result of it in a very few days; adding, that all the first consul wanted was, to know precisely on what he had to depend.

I could not help lamenting this precipitate measure, since it could answer no good purpose, and would only tend to introduce into the discussion ill-humour and offended dignity, in the place of dispassionate reasoning. I begged him, however, to be prepared, and to prepare the first consul, to meet with more opposition to his will than he had been accustomed to on similar occasions.

I told him, that his majesty was willing to discuss the point in dispute with fairness and candour, but certainly never would be intimidated into acquiescence; and I repeatedly urged, that, if he wished well to the peace of the two countries, he should prepare the first consul for the consequences which might naturally be expected from this step, and thus prevent the effect of any sudden gust of ill-humour. He was unwilling to admit that there could be any chance of satisfying the first consul short of a compliance with his wishes, founded, as he pretended, on good faith. Our conversation ended here, and I wait the result of general Andreossy's communication with the utmost impatience. I have, &c.

WHITWORTH.

P. S. In the interval between the writing and the transcribing the above dispatch, I have taken another opportunity of seeing M. de Talleyrand, and I am glad to find, that (for what purpose I know not) he had represented the instructions to general Andreossy as much more absolute and offensive than they really are. I found him to-day entirely disposed to give me another opinion, and to convince me, that the first consul, far from wishing to carry matters to extremity, was desirous to discuss, fairly, and without passion, a point which, he admitted, was of importance to both countries. He repeatedly assured me, that much as the first consul might have the acquisition of Egypt at heart, he would sacrifice his own feelings to the preservation of peace, and henceforth seek to augment his glory, by improving and consolidating the internal situation of the country, rather than by adding to its possessions.

No. 41.—Note from General Andreossy to Lord Hawkesbury, dated March 10th, 1803.

The undersigned ambassador and minister plenipotentiary of the French republic to his Britannic majesty, had received from the first consul express orders to require from the British government some explanations respecting the protracted occupation of the island of Malta, by the English troops. He had hoped that verbal communications would have been sufficient to have produced satisfactory expositions, by preparing the way for the mutual conciliation of minds and interests, a conduct which has been prescribed to him by his ardent zeal for the maintenance of harmony between the two countries, and of the peace of Europe, objects of the solicitude of the French government: but the undersigned thinks he can no longer delay complying with the instructions he had received; and he has, therefore, the honour of addressing the following observations to his excellency lord Hawkesbury, which recall to recollection the spirit and the leading features of the verbal communications which he has previously made to him.

By the conditions of the fourth paragraph of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens, the English troops were to evacuate the island of Malta and its dependencies, three months after the exchange of the ratifications. Ten months have elapsed since the ratifications have been exchanged, and the English troops are still at Malta. The French troops, on the contrary, who were to evacuate the Neapolitan and Papal states, have not waited the expiration of the three months which were granted to them to withdraw, and have quitted Tarentum, the fortifications of which they had re-established, and where they had collected 100 pieces of cannon.

What can be alleged in justification of the delay in evacuating Malta? Has not the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens provided for every thing? and the Neapolitan troops being arrived, under what pretext do those of England still remain there?

It is because all the powers enumerated in the 6th paragraph, have not yet accepted the guarantee which is devolved upon them? But this is not a condition that relates to the evacuation of the island; and besides, Austria has already sent its act of guarantee: Russia, itself, has made only a single difficulty, which is done away by the accession of the first consul to the modifications proposed, unless, indeed, England itself throws obstacles in the way, by refusing to accede to the proposals of Russia, which, after all, could not affect the engagements of his Britannic majesty, who, according to the express conditions of the treaty, is to evacuate the island of Malta within three months, placing it under the guard of the Neapolitans, who are to garrison it until the definitive arrangements of the order are settled.

It should, therefore, seem impossible, and it would be without example in the history of nations, were his Britannic majesty to refuse to execute a fundamental article of the pacification, of the very one, which, in the drawing up of the preliminaries, was considered as the first, and as requiring to be settled previously to every other point.

Indeed, the first consul, who cordially relies on the intentions of his Britannic majesty, and cannot suppose them to be less open and generous than those with which he is animated, has hitherto been unwilling to attribute the delay of the evacuation of the island of Malta to any other than to maritime circumstances.

The undersigned is, therefore, charged to require explanations on this point, and he is persuaded that the British ministry will be the more anxious to furnish such as will be satisfactory, as they must be sensible how necessary they are for the maintenance of harmony, and how important they are for the honour of the two nations.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to lord Hawkesbury the assurances of his high consideration.

No. 42.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated March 12th, 1803.

My Lord;—The messenger Mason, arrived yesterday morning early, with your lordship's letter of the 7th, informing me, that, in consequence of the preparations in the ports of France and Holland, which, though avowedly intended for colonial service, might, in the event of a rupture, be turned against some part of the British dominions, his majesty had judged it expedient to send a message to both houses of parliament, recommending, in terms void of offence, the adoption of such measures, as may be consistent with the honour of his crown, and the security of his dominions, and, at the same time, such as will manifest his majesty's disposition for the preservation of peace.

I beg leave to return your lordship my thanks for having apprized me of this circumstance by a special messenger; I found, however, on going to M. de Talleyrand, at two o'clock, that he was already informed of it. He was just setting out to communicate it to the first consul, and appeared under considerable agitation. He returned with me to his cabinet, and though he told me he was pressed for time, he suffered me to relate the circumstance without interruption. I endeavoured to make him sensible that this measure was merely precautionary, and not, in the least degree, intended as a menace. I concluded my observations by repeating that it was merely a measure of self-security, founded on the armaments which were carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, remarking, at the same time, that had not even these armaments been as notorious as they were, the very circumstance of the first consul's determination to augment so considerably his army, in time of peace, would have been a full and sufficient motive for such a measure of precaution.

M. de Talleyrand now informed me that he was already acquainted with the business; that a messenger had that morning arrived, who had brought him a copy of the message, which he communicated to me. I could draw from him no reply whatever to my observations. He confined himself strictly to the assurance which he has so repeatedly made, that there was no foundation whatever for the alarm which was felt by his majesty's ministers; that the first consul was pacific; that he had no thoughts whatever of attacking his majesty's dominions, unless forced to do so by a commencement of hostilities on our part; that he should always consider the refusal to evacuate Malta as such a commencement of hostilities; and that, as we had hitherto hesitated to do so, he was justified in adopting the measures which might eventually be necessary. He disclaimed every idea of the armaments fitting out in the Dutch ports having any other destination than to the colonies; and concluded, that, for his part, he could not comprehend the motives which had necessitated a resort to such a measure on the part of his majesty's government.

He then desired leave to go to the first consul, promising that he would let me know the result when we met at dinner at the Prussian minister's. He did not come there till near seven o'clock, and when we rose from dinner, he took me aside, and informed me, that although the first consul had been highly irritated at the unjust suspicion which his majesty's government entertained, yet, he would not allow himself to be so far mastered by his feelings, as to lose sight of the calamities which the present discussion might entail upon humanity. He dwelt much on this topic, and explained the measures to which he should be obliged to resort: he said, that if England wished to discuss fairly, he wished the same; that if England prepared for war, he would do the same; and that if England should finally determine on hostilities, he trusted to the support of the French nation in the cause of honour and of justice. It was in vain that I repeated that England did not wish for war; that peace was as necessary to us as it could be to France; that all we desired, and all that we were contending for, was security; that every thing proved to us that that security was threatened by the first consul's views on Egypt; and that, consequently, our refusal to evacuate Malta was become as much a necessary measure of precaution, as the defence of any part of his majesty's dominions. To this kind of reasoning M. de Talleyrand opposed the moderation of the first consul, his great self-denial, and his determination to sacrifice even the most favourite points to his sincere desire to avoid a rupture.

M. de Talleyrand now told me, that, in order to facilitate my communication of the first consul's sentiments, he would communicate to me a paper which he had that morning drawn up with him; that it was not to be considered as any thing absolutely official;

that it was a memorandum to assist me, but such as I might, if I chose, transmit to your lordship. I now enclose it. I have, &c.

[Note Verbale referred to in No. 42.]

1. If his Britannic majesty, in his message, means to speak of the expedition of Helvoetsluys, all the world knows that it was destined for America, and that it was on the point of sailing for its destination, but in consequence of his majesty's message, the embarkation and putting to sea are about to be counter-manded.

2. If we do not receive satisfactory explanation respecting these armaments in England, and if they actually take place, it is natural that the first consul should march 20,000 men into Holland, since Holland is mentioned in the message.

3. These troops being once in the country, it is natural that an encampment should be formed on the frontiers of Hanover; and, moreover, that additional bodies should join those troops which were already embarked for America, in order to form new embarkations, and to maintain an offensive and defensive position.

4. It is natural that the first consul should order several camps to be formed at Calais, and on different points of the coasts.

5. It is likewise in the nature of things that the first consul, who was on the point of evacuating Switzerland, should be under the necessity of continuing a French army in that country.

6. It is also the natural consequence of all this, that the first consul should send a fresh force into Italy, in order to occupy, in case of necessity, the position of Tarentum.

7. England, arming, and arming with so much publicity, will compel France to put her armies on the war establishment, a step so important, as cannot fail to agitate all Europe.

The result of all these movements will be to irritate the two countries still more. France will have been compelled to take all these precautions in consequence of the English armaments, and nevertheless, every means will be taken to excite the English nation, by the assertion that France meditates an invasion. The whole British population will be obliged to put themselves under arms for their defence, and their export trade will, even before the war, be in a state of stagnation throughout the whole extent of the countries occupied by the French arms. The experience of nations, and the course of events, prove, that the distance between such a state of things and actual hostility, is unfortunately not remote. As to the differences, of which mention is made in his Britannic majesty's message, we know not of any that we have with England; for it cannot be imagined, that a serious intention can have existed in England, of evading the execution of the treaty of Amiens, under the protection of a military armament. Europe well knows that it is possible to attempt the dismemberment of France, but not to intimidate her.

No. 43.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, March 14th, 1803.

My Lord;—The messenger, Mason, went on Saturday with my dispatches of that date, and, until yesterday, Sunday, I saw no one, likely to give me any farther information, such as I could depend upon, as to the effect which his majesty's message had produced on the first consul. At the court which was held at the Thuilleries upon that day, he accosted me, evidently under very considerable agitation. He began by asking me if I had any news from England. I told him that I had received letters from your lordship two days ago. He immediately said, and so you are determined to go to war. No! I replied, we are too sensible of the advantages of peace—Nous avons, said he, déjà fait la guerre pendant quinze ans.—As he seemed to wait for an answer, I observed only, c'en est déjà trop.—Mais, said he, vous voulez la faire encore quinze annés, et vous m'y forcez.—I told him, that was very far from his majesty's intentions.—He then proceeded to count Marcow and the chevalier Azara, who were standing together, at a little distance from me, and said to them, les Anglois veulent la guerre, mais s'ils sont les premiers à tirer l'épée, je serai le dernier à la remettre. Ils ne respectant pas les traités, il faut dorénavant les couvrir de crepe noir.—He then went his round. In a few minutes he came back to me, and resumed the conversation, if such it can be called, by something personally civil to me. He began again—Porquoi des armémens? Contre qui des mesures de précaution? Je n'ai pas un seul vaisseau de ligne dans les ports de France; mais si vous voulez armer, j'armerai aussi; si vous voulez vous battre, je me battraï aussi. Vous pourrez peut-être tuer la France, mais jamais l'intimider.—On voudroit, said I, ni l'un ni l'autre. On voudroit vivre en bonne intelligence avec elle.—Il faut donc respecter les traités, replied he; malheur à ceux qui ne respectent pas les traités; ils en seront responsable à toute l'Europe.—He was too much agitated to make it advisable for me to prolong the conversation; I therefore made no answer, and he retired to his apartment, repeating the last phrase.

It is to be remarked, that all this passed loud enough to be overheard by two hundred people who were present, and I am persuaded that there was not a single person, who did not feel the extreme impropriety of his conduct, and the total want of dignity as well as of decency on the occasion. I propose taking the first opportunity of speaking to M. Talleyrand on this subject. I have, &c.

No. 44.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated March 15th, 1803.

I send your excellency a copy of the note presented to me by general Andreossi on the 10th instant, and a copy of the answer which I have, this day, by his majesty's commands, returned to it.

No. 45.—Note from Lord Hawkesbury to General Andreossi, dated March 15th, 1803.

The undersigned, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has laid before the king the note of his excellency the French ambassador of the 10th instant.

In obeying the commands of his majesty, by returning an official answer to this note, the undersigned feels it necessary for him to do little more than repeat the explanations which have been already given, on more than one occasion, by himself verbally to general Andreossi, and by lord Whitworth to M. Talleyrand, on the subject of the note, and of the points which appear to be connected with it. He can have no difficulty in assuring the French ambassador, that his majesty has entertained a most sincere desire that the treaty of Amiens might be executed in a full and complete manner; but it has not been possible for him to consider this treaty as having been founded on principles different from those which have been invariably applied to every other antecedent treaty or convention, namely, that they were negotiated with reference to the actual state of possession of the different parties, and to the treaties or public engagements by which they were bound at the time of its conclusion; and that if that state of possession and of engagements was so materially altered by the act of either of the parties as to affect the nature of the compact itself, the other party has a right, according to the law of nations, to interfere for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction or compensation for any essential difference which such acts may have subsequently made in their relative situation; that if there ever was a case to which this principle might be applied with peculiar propriety, it was that of the late treaty of peace: for the negotiation was conducted on a basis not merely proposed by his majesty, but specially agreed to, in an official note, by the French government, namely, That his majesty should keep a compensation out of his conquests for the important acquisition of territory made by France upon the continent. That is a sufficient proof that the compact was understood to have been concluded in relation to the then existing state of things; for the measure of his majesty's compensation was to be calculated with reference to the acquisitions of France at that time; and if the interference of the French government in the general affairs of Europe since that period; if their interposition with respect to Switzerland and Holland, whose independence was guaranteed by them at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of peace; if the acquisitions which have been made by France in various quarters, but particularly those in Italy, have extended the territory and increased the power of France, his majesty would be warranted, consistently with the spirit of the treaty of peace, in claiming equivalents for these acquisitions, as a counterpoise to the augmentation of the power of France. His majesty, however, anxious to prevent all ground of misunderstanding, and desirous of consolidating the general peace of Europe, as far as might be in his power, was willing to have waved the pretensions he might have a right to advance of this nature; and as the other articles of the definitive treaty have been in a course of execution on his part, so he would have been ready to have carried into effect an arrangement conformable to the true intent and spirit of the tenth article; the execution of that arrangement, according to its terms, having been rendered impracticable by circumstances which it was not in his majesty's power to control. Whilst his majesty was actuated by these sentiments of moderation and forbearance, and prepared to regulate his conduct in conformity to them, his attention was particularly attracted by the very extraordinary publication of the report of colonel Sebastiani to the first consul. This report contains the most unjustifiable insinuations and charges against his majesty's government; against the officer commanding his forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter: insinuations and charges wholly destitute of foundation, and such as would have warranted his majesty in demanding that satisfaction which, on occasions of this nature, independent powers, in a state of amity, have a right to expect from each other. It discloses, moreover, views in the highest degree injurious to the interests of his majesty's dominions, and directly repugnant to, and utterly inconsistent with, the spirit and letter of the treaty of peace concluded between his majesty and the French government. His majesty's ambassador at Paris was accordingly directed to make such a representation to the French government as his majesty felt to be called for by imputations of the nature above described, by the disclosure of purposes inconsistent with good faith, and highly injurious to the interests of his people; and as a claim had recently been made by the French government on the subject of the evacuation of Malta, lord Whitworth was instructed to accompany this representation by a declaration on the part of his majesty, that before he could enter into any farther discussions relative to that island, it was expected that satisfactory explanations should be given upon the various points respecting which his majesty had complained. This representation and this claim, founded on principles incontestibly just, and couched in terms the most temperate, appear to have been wholly disregarded by the French government; no satisfaction has been afforded, no explanation whatever has been given; but, on the contrary, his majesty's suspicions of the views of the French government with respect to the Turkish empire have been confirmed and strengthened by subsequent events. Under these circumstances his majesty feels that he has no alternative, and that a just regard to his own honour, and to the interests of his people, makes it necessary for him to declare, that he cannot consent that his troops should evacuate the island of Malta, until substantial security has been provided for those objects which, under the present circumstances, might be materially endangered by their removal.

With respect to several of the positions stated in the note, and grounded on the idea of the tenth article being executed in its literal sense, they call for some observations. By the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens, the island of Malta was to be restored, by his majesty, to the order of St. John, upon certain conditions. The evacuation of the island, at a specified period, formed a part of these conditions; and if the other stipulations had been in a due course of execution, his majesty would have been bound, by the terms of the treaty, to have ordered his forces to evacuate the island; but these conditions must be considered as being all of equal effect; and if any material parts of them should have been found incapable of execution, or if the execution of them should, from any circumstances, have been retarded, his majesty would be warranted in deferring the evacuation of the island until such time as the other conditions of the article could be effected; or until some new arrangement could be concluded, which should be judged satisfactory by the contracting parties. The refusal of Russia to accede to the arrangement, except on condition that the Maltese langue should be abolished; the silence of the court of Berlin, with respect to the invitation that has been made to it, in consequence of the treaty, to become a guaranteeing power; the abolition of the Spanish priories, in defiance of the treaty to which the king of Spain was a party; the declaration of the Portuguese government, of their intention to sequester the property of the Portuguese priory, as forming a part of the Spanish langue, unless the property of the Spanish priories was restored to them:—these circumstances would have been sufficient, without any other special grounds, to have warranted his majesty in suspending the evacuation of the island. The evacuation of Tarentum and Brundisium is, in no respect, connected with that of Malta. The French government were bound to evacuate the kingdom of Naples by their treaty of peace with the king of Naples, at a period antecedent to that at which this stipulation was carried into effect.

[VOL. XXVI.]

The French government were bound, likewise, by engagements with the emperor of Russia, to respect the independence of the kingdom of Naples; but even admitting that the departure of the French troops from Tarentum depended solely on the article of the treaty of Amiens, their departure is, by the terms of the treaty, to take place at the same period as the other evacuations in Europe, namely, one month after the ratification of the definitive treaty; at which period both Porto Ferrajo and Minorca were evacuated by his majesty's forces; whereas the troops of his majesty were, in no case, bound to evacuate the island of Malta, antecedent to the period of three months after the ratification of the definitive treaty; and, even in that event, it must be considered as depending upon the other parts of the arrangement being in a course of execution. With respect to the assertion in the note, that the Neapolitan troops were to form the garrison of Malta, until the period when the arrangements relative to the order could be carried into effect, it will appear, by a reference to the article, that, by the preliminary paragraph, the island was to be restored to the order upon the condition of the succeeding stipulations, and that it was only from the period when the restitution to the order had actually taken place, that, by the 12th paragraph, the Neapolitan troops were to form a part of the garrison.

The undersigned has thus stated, with all the frankness which the importance of the subject appears to require, the sentiments of his majesty on the note delivered to him by general Andreossi, and on the points in discussion between the two countries.

His majesty is willing to indulge the hope, that the conduct of the French government on this occasion may be influenced by principles similar to those which have invariably influenced his own. That, as far as possible, all causes of distrust, and every impediment to a good understanding between the two countries, may be completely and effectually removed, and that the peace may be consolidated on a secure and lasting foundation.

No. 46.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, March 17th, 1803.

My Lord;—I called yesterday on M. de Talleyrand, to converse with him on the subject of what had passed on Sunday last at the Thuilleries. He had been, since that day, so fully occupied with his expeditions to different foreign courts, that I had no opportunity of seeing him sooner. I told him, that I had been placed by the first consul in a situation which could neither suit my public nor my private feelings. That I went to the Thuilleries to pay my respects to the first consul, and to present my countrymen, but not to treat of political subjects; and that unless I had the assurance from him that I should not be exposed to a repetition of the same disagreeable circumstances, I should be under the necessity of discontinuing my visits to the Thuilleries. M. de Talleyrand assured me, that it was very far from the first consul's intention to distress me; but he had felt himself personally insulted by the charges which were brought against him by the English government; and that it was incumbent upon him to take the first opportunity of exculpating himself in the presence of the ministers of the different powers of Europe. He assured me that nothing similar would occur.

No. 47.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, March 18th, 1803.

My Lord;—I received your lordship's dispatch, with its inclosure, this morning early; and I learnt at the same time that a messenger had arrived from general Andreossy to M. de Talleyrand; shortly after, M. de Talleyrand sent to desire I would call upon him, which I accordingly did. He told me that he had not only received your lordship's note to the French ambassador, but also the sentiments of the first consul upon it, which he was desirous to communicate to me, before he re-dispatched the messenger. This he did, and I refer your lordship to the communication which general Andreossy will make, according to his instructions, without loss of time.

From the tenor of this note, it appears, that this government is not desirous to proceed to extremities; that is to say, it is not prepared so to do; and therefore, it expresses a willingness to enter on the discussion of the point, which appears, according to their conception, or rather to the interpretation they choose to give to it, the most material. This, of course, is the safety of Egypt. On this the first consul declares in the note, as M. Talleyrand did repeatedly to me, that he would be willing to enter into any engagement, by which such a security as would fully quiet our apprehensions, might be given on the part of the French government. On the subject of Malta, the first consul maintains that he cannot listen to any compromise; with regard to Egypt, he is willing to enter into any engagement which may be thought sufficient.

I told him that he had departed from the letter and the sense of your lordship's note, by confining the question to Malta alone. That note had comprehended other most important considerations. That the best method of bringing the discussion to a speedy conclusion, such as his majesty's government appeared to wish, was, to take it up on a broader scale. But that, at the same time, his majesty's government would not refuse to lend itself to any thing reasonable which might be suggested. There was, however, I told him, one distinction to be made in the situation of the two governments, in the discussion of this question. By our possession of Malta, France was not threatened; but the reverse was the case, should the access to Egypt be opened by its evacuation. I have, &c.

No. 48.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated March 27th, 1803.

My Lord;—Your excellency's several dispatches, to No. 26 inclusive, have been received and laid before the king. With respect to the subject of your excellency's dispatch of March 14th, I have it in command to signify to you his majesty's pleasure, that you take the earliest opportunity to represent to Monsieur de Talleyrand, the surprise with which his majesty has learnt the conduct which the first consul had observed towards your excellency in the instance to which that dispatch refers; and you will add, that as his majesty has a right to expect that his ambassador should be treated with the respect and attention due to the dignity of the sovereign whom he represents, it will be impossible for you to present yourself, on any days of ceremony, to the first consul, unless you receive an assurance that you will never be exposed to a repetition of the treatment which you experienced on the occasion. Although your excellency appears to have anticipated this instruction in one of your most recent conversations with Monsieur de Talleyrand, I, nevertheless, think it right to enable your excellency to state to that minister, the sense which the king entertains of this transaction. I am, &c.

No. 49.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated April 3rd, 1803.

My Lord;—I enclose to your excellency, for your information, copies of the official note delivered to me on the 29th ultimo, by general Andreossy, and of the answer which, by his majesty's command, I this day returned to that communication. I have, &c.

(Signed) HAWKESBURY.

The undersigned general of division, ambassador and minister plenipotentiary from the French republic, has laid before his government the note addressed to him by his excellency lord Hawkesbury. He has received orders to make the following answer to the observations therein contained.

The object of this note appears to be to explain his Britannic majesty's message; and to give some elucidations which had been demanded respecting the execution of the treaty of Amiens.

The first consul will not make any complaint relative to the extraordinary and unexpected assertions of this act, issued by his Britannic majesty. Not one of them is founded.

His Britannic majesty believes that his kingdom is menaced by preparations made in the ports of Holland and France. He has been deceived; the first consul has made no preparation.

There were, at the time of the message, but two frigates in the roads of Holland, and but three corvettes in the roads of Dunkirk.

How can his Britannic majesty's ministers have been deceived on facts so evident? His Britannic majesty's ambassadors at Paris, and at the Hague, have seriously to reproach themselves, if they have credited information so evidently false, and if they did not foresee that they thereby exposed their government to err in the most important deliberations.

Was it not conformable to the usage practised among nations, first to demand explanations, and thus to take means for being convinced of the falsehood of the intelligence which the ministers might have received? Must not the least effects of the omission of this practice be, to bring on the ruin of families, and carry confusion, uncertainty, and disorder, into all the commercial affairs of both nations? The first consul knows, both from his own sentiments, and judging of other people by the French, that a great nation can never be terrified. He believes that good policy and the feelings of true dignity, ever inspire the sentiment of esteem for a rival nation, and never the design of menacing her. A great nation may be destroyed, but not intimidated.

The second part of his majesty's message consists of another assertion, no better founded. His Britannic majesty makes mention of discussions, the success of which is doubtful. What are these discussions? What official notes, what protocol prove the opening, the progress, the vicissitudes of a debate? Can a state of difficulties, which leads to an alternative of peace or war, spring up unawares, without commencement, without progression, and lead without distinction to an appeal to arms, before all the means of conciliation have been exhausted.

In this case, the appeal has been publicly made before it could be known that there was room for misunderstanding. The termination of the discussions were announced before they had begun. The issue of a difficult discussion has been declared before it arose. What would Europe, what would both nations think, if they knew that these discussions, announced by his Britannic majesty as so difficult to terminate, were unknown to the French government; and that the first consul, on reading the message, could not comprehend the meaning of either of the declarations therein contained.

He has also abstained from any ostensible step; and whatever may have been the clamour, the activity, the provocations of war, which have taken place in England since that message, he has given no orders, he has made no dispositions, no preparations. He places his glory, in an affair of this nature, wholly in being taken in an unprovided state. He will continue in this system of honest frankness, until his Britannic majesty has reflected fully on the part he proposes to take.

In lord Hawkesbury's note, an opinion is expressed, that the French republic has increased in power since the peace of Amiens. This is a decided error. Since that epoch, France has evacuated a considerable territory. The French power has received no degree of augmentation. If his Britannic majesty is determined to make war, he may allege all the pretexts he pleases. He will find few less founded.

As to the complaints made respecting the publications which may have appeared in France, they are of an order too secondary to be capable of influencing such a decision. Are we then returned to the age of tournaments? Motives of this nature might have authorized, four centuries ago, the combat of thirties; but they cannot, in this age, be a reason for war between the two countries.

It might suffice in this respect to reply to his excellency, that no representation has been made by him on the subject to the government of the republic; and that, if it was but justice to grant satisfaction, the first consul had a right to expect that which was required by M. Otto, in his note of the 22nd Thermidor last, upon grounds more serious and more just.

Is it possible that the English ministry can have been ignorant, that, ever since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, the English press has not ceased to spread through Europe the rage of war, the discredit of peace, and shameless and boundless outrages against every thing which is the object of the love and veneration of the French people?

A few days after the ratification of peace, one of his Britannic majesty's ministers declared, that the peace establishment must be considerable; and the distrust excited by this declaration, made in parliament with as much bitterness as impropriety, furnished a commentary for the exaggeration and alarms which were circulated in despicable pamphlets, and in newspapers, as contemptible as those libels. Since that time, these writers have found themselves invariably supported in their insolent observations by particular phrases taken from the speeches of some leading members of parliament. These speeches, scarcely to be exceeded by the newswriters themselves, have, for these eighteen months, tended to encourage insult against other governments to that degree, that every European must be offended, every reasonable Englishman must be humiliated, by such unheard-of licentiousness.

What, if we connect with these sallies, proceedings more offensive and serious; the indulgence granted to French criminals, publishing daily outrages in the French language; the still more inexcusable toleration extended to villains covered with crimes, and plotting assassinations incessantly, such as Georges, who still continues to reside at London, protected, and having a considerable establishment; in a word, the little justice which has been shown to all our representations—how are we to account for the publicity of the complaint which his Britannic majesty has thought proper to make respecting some indefinite wrongs which he has hitherto thought unnecessary to bring before the first consul?

The first consul has had cause to be convinced that all his representations on all these points were useless, and that his Britannic majesty, regardless of the neighbouring powers, was resolved to authorize every thing within his dominions; but he did not, on that account, entertain a doubt of the continuance of peace, nor alarm Europe with the notification of war. He confined himself to this principle of conduct, to permit or to prevent in France, with respect to England, whatever should be permitted or prevented in England with regard to France.

He has, however, expressed, and he again expresses his wish, that means should be adopted to prevent, in future, any mention being made of what is passing in England, either in the official discussions, or in the polemical writings in France, as in like manner in the French official discussions and polemical writings, no mention whatever should be made of what is passing in England.

Lord Hawkesbury mentions an article in a newspaper, containing the report of a French colonel. In serious discussions, an answer on this point might be dispensed with; but it is neither a long nor difficult matter.

A colonel in the English army has published a work, in England, filled with the most atrocious and disgusting calumnies against the French army and its general. The lies it contains have been contradicted by the reception which colonel Sebastiani experienced. The publicity of his report was at once a refutation and a reparation which the French army had a right to expect. On his arrival in Egypt, this officer, to his great astonishment, found the English army there, although they should have evacuated it, and the Turks prodigiously alarmed at the continuance of the English army, and at its relations with the natives, in rebellion and open revolt against the Sublime Porte.

He must have conceived that the treaties which connect us with the Porte, and by which we have guaranteed to it the integrity of its possessions, compelled us to unite ourselves with that power. It was natural to think that England meant to declare war from the instant she refused to execute the articles of the treaty. For, after all, France is not reduced to such a state of debasement, as to suffer treaties made with her to be executed or not at pleasure.

Hence the researches made by this officer, as to the forces which were in Egypt, and as to the position occupied by the English army.

But Egypt has since been restored to the dominion of its lawful sovereign, and the idea of a rupture between the two nations, on account of the engagement contracted with the Porte, no longer exists.

There remains, therefore, but one object worthy of fixing the attention of the two nations. The execution of the treaty of Amiens, as far as concerns Malta. His majesty has engaged to restore it to the order, and to entrust it to the Neapolitan army till the order should be in a condition to guard it. His majesty will reject all sophistry, every distinction, every mental reservation which might be offered to him, to put in doubt the force and the validity of his engagement. His Britannic majesty's equity, his conscience in this respect, are guarantees for the French republic. Were it otherwise, what means in future would the two nations have for coming to an understanding? Would not all be chaos? This would, indeed, be adding another calamity to those which have menaced social order.

The undersigned is directed to declare, in short, that the first consul will not take up the defiance of war given by England to France; that as to Malta, he sees no subject for discussion, the treaty having provided for every thing, and settled every thing. The undersigned, &c.

(Signed)

The undersigned, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, has laid before the king the note of his excellency general Andreossy, of the 29th of last month.

His majesty has been induced, by that spirit of moderation and forbearance which have invariably governed his conduct in every part of his communications with the French government, to abstain from making many observations which the perusal of this note may naturally have suggested to his mind.

His majesty has perceived, with great regret, that the French government continue to withhold all satisfaction and explanation on the points on which he has complained; and that, at the time when they evade all discussion on the subject of his representations, they persist in their requisition that the island of Malta should be forthwith evacuated by his forces.

His majesty can never so far forget what is due to himself and to his people, as to acquiesce in such a course of proceeding; he has, therefore, judged it expedient to give instructions to his ambassador, at Paris, to ascertain, distinctly, from the French government, whether they are determined to persevere in withholding all satisfaction and explanation on the points on which his majesty has complained; or whether they are disposed, without delay, to give such satisfaction and explanations upon the present state of affairs, as may lead to an arrangement which may be calculated to adjust the differences at present subsisting between the two governments. It is his majesty's anxious desire that, by this mode of proceeding, an end may be put to that state of suspense and irritation which must be so injurious to the interests of both countries; and that the two governments, actuated by the same principles of justice and moderation, may be led to concur in such measures as are most likely to conduce to their permanent tranquillity. The undersigned, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 50.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated April 4th, 1803.

My Lord;—It is become essential, that the discussions which have been for some time subsisting between his majesty and the French government, should be brought to an issue within as short a time as is consistent with the deliberation which must be given to objects of so much importance.

The last note presented by general Androssy, in the name of his government, in answer to my note of the 15th of last month, evades all explanation, and even all discussion, of the points on which complaint has been made by his majesty.

If the French government should seriously intend to persist in this course of proceeding there can be no hopes of a successful termination to the present negotiation. It is important, therefore, that you should ascertain distinctly, in the first instance, whether they are disposed to enter into explanation on the points on which his majesty has complained, and to come to such an arrangement as may be calculated to adjust the differences at present subsisting between the two countries; and for this purpose you will present a note to the effect of that which is herewith inclosed. It is possible that the French government may continue to evade all discussion on the points in question, and confine themselves to a categorical demand, that Malta should be immediately evacuated. In that case, it is his majesty's pleasure, that you should declare the impossibility of the relations of amity continuing to subsist between the two countries, and the necessity you will be under of leaving Paris within a certain time. But if, on the other hand, they should show a readiness to enter into discussion, and to give reasonable satisfaction and explanation, it is important that you should be informed, without loss of time, of the sentiments of his majesty's government, as to what might be considered an equitable adjustment of the differences between the two governments at this moment.

I have, therefore, by his majesty's command, inclosed the project of an arrangement, which, under the present circumstances, would meet the ideas of his majesty's government; which would afford security for those objects which are considered as endangered by the unequivocal disclosure of the views of the first consul, and which, at the same time, might entirely save the honour of the French government. I am, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

[First Inclosure referred to in No. 50.]

The undersigned, his Britannic majesty's ambassador extraordinary, has received the orders of his court to make the following communication to the French government.

His majesty has perceived, with great regret, that the French government continue to withhold all satisfaction and explanation on the points on which he has complained, and that at the time when they evade all discussion on the subject of his representations, they persist in their requisition that the island of Malta should be forthwith evacuated by his forces. His majesty can never so far forget what is due to himself, and to his people, as to acquiesce in such a course of proceeding. He has, therefore, commanded the undersigned to ascertain, distinctly, from the French government, whether they are determined to persevere in withholding all satisfaction and explanation upon the points on which his majesty has complained, or whether they are disposed, without delay, to give such satisfaction and explanation upon the present state of affairs, as may lead to an arrangement which may be calculated to adjust the differences at present subsisting between the two governments.

It is his majesty's anxious desire, that, by adopting this mode of proceeding, an end may be put to that state of suspense and uncertainty which must be so injurious to the interests of both countries; and that the two governments, actuated by the same principles of justice and moderation, may be led to concur in such measures as are most likely to conduce to their permanent tranquillity.

Heads of an arrangement to be concluded by treaty or convention between his Majesty and the French government.

Malta to remain in perpetuity in the possession of his majesty. The knights of the order of St. John to be indemnified by his majesty for any losses of property which they may sustain in consequence of such an arrangement.—Holland and Switzerland to be evacuated by the French troops.—The island of Elba to be confirmed by his majesty to France, and the king of Etruria to be acknowledged.—The Italian and Ligurian republics to be acknowledged by his majesty, provided an arrangement is made in Italy for the king of Sardinia, which shall be satisfactory to him.

No. 51.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, April 7th, 1803.

I received your lordship's dispatches of the 4th instant, by the messenger Wagstaff, with their inclosures, yesterday evening; and shall, probably, in the course of the day, have an opportunity of communicating to M. de Talleyrand the note, which I shall translate for that purpose.

No. 52.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated April 7th, 1803.

My Lord;—Since writing the preceding dispatch, I have seen M. de Talleyrand, and communicated to him the inclosed note, which I trust your lordship will find as close a translation as possible, of that which I received from your lordship. He read it over with much attention, and when he had done, he appeared to be in expectation of some other communication. Upon desiring he would explain himself, he said, that he was in hopes I should have furnished him with the heads of those points, on which it was affirmed, in the note, that the French government had so repeatedly refused all explanation and satisfaction. I told him that it would have been entirely useless to repeat what had been so often urged in vain; that he could not but know, that the explanation required referred to the conduct of the French government, and the system of aggrandizement which it had constantly pursued since the conclusion, and in direct violation of the treaty of Amiens, founded, as it indisputably was, on the state of possession of the two countries at the time; that, with regard to the satisfaction, it evidently referred to the unjustifiable insinuations and charges against his majesty's government, against the officer commanding his forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter, contained in the official report of colonel Sebastiani. He was, by no means disposed to admit, that either of these cases could justify the assertion of the French government having refused explanation and satisfaction, on the ground that no notice had been taken of these transactions, but in a very cursory manner; nor had any explanation ever been required as to any particular transaction, whether in Italy or elsewhere, and if it had, it would immediately have been given; and that the language of col. Sebastiani was not to be put in any comparison with that used by major Wilson, in his account of the campaign of Egypt. I urged the difference of a common publication like that to which he alluded, and a report to the first consul published by him in his official paper. On this occasion, M. de Talleyrand was disposed to call in question the authenticity of the Moniteur. In short, the most ungrounded assertions were substituted for arguments; and, amongst these, I cannot but place that, so often repeated, of the first consul's having entirely given up all idea whatever of Egypt, consequently, we could have no pretext for retaining Malta. He assured me, for the rest, that we could communicate it this evening to the first consul, and that, to-morrow, he should, in all probability, have a communication to make in return. I have, &c.

Le soussigné, ambassadeur extraordinaire et plenipotentiaire de sa majesté Britannique, a reçu ordre de sa cour de communiquer ce qui suit au gouvernement de France.

Sa majesté a vu à regret que le gouvernement de France continue à refuser toute satisfaction et toute explication sur les objets dont elle a se plaindre, et qu'en évitant toute discussion de ce qui fait le sujet de ses représentations il persiste néanmoins à demander l'évacuation de l'isle de Malthe par les forces de sa majesté. Sa majesté sait trop ce qu'elle se doit à elle-même et à son peuple pour acquiescer à de pareils procédés. En conséquence elle a ordonné au soussigné de savoir distinctement du gouvernement de France, s'il est déterminé à persévérer dans son refus de toute satisfaction et de toute explication sur les objets de plainte de sa majesté, ou bien s'il est disposé à donner sans délai cette satisfaction et cette explication sur l'état actuel des affaires de manière à pouvoir conduire à un arrangement qui seroit de nature à ajuster les différens qui actuellement existent entre les deux gouvernemens.

Sa majesté désire sincèrement l'adoption de ce moyen que mettroit fin à un état de suspension et d'incertitude si nuisible à l'intérêt des deux nations, et devoir que les deux gouvernemens agissans par les mêmes principes de justice et de modération puissent s'entendre pour concourir aux mesures le plus susceptibles de leur assurer une tranquillité permanente. No. 53.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated April 9th, 1803.

My Lord;—In my conversation yesterday evening with M. de Talleyrand, I found him, after he had seen the first consul, more disposed to contest the substance of the note which I had presented the day before, than to afford any farther explanation. He said, that, in order to proceed regularly, it would be necessary that the French government should be informed, precisely what were the objects which had created such uneasiness, and on which it was alleged all explanation had been refused. That, although this had, perhaps, been touched upon in general conversation, yet no specific charge had been adduced, in such a manner as to demand a formal explanation. I told him, that if the object of the French government was to protract the present state of suspense and uncertainty, that object might be answered to the extent, indeed, of a very few days, by forcing me to such a reference; but I must, at the same time declare to him, that it could be productive of no advantage, and would serve only to provoke such a recapitulation of the system and conduct which France had pursued since the treaty of Amiens, as would have all the appearance of a manifesto, every item of which would carry conviction to every individual in Europe; that it appeared, therefore, more likely to answer the end which both parties proposed, that of hastening the conclusion of an amicable arrangement, to take up the business on the basis which I should propose, and by which they would admit no more than what was incontrovertible, namely, that if the French government exercised a right of extending its influence and territory, in violation of the spirit of the treaty of Amiens, Great Britain had, if she chose to avail herself of it (which I was confident she would not do, further than was necessary as a measure of security), an undoubted right to seek a counterpoise. He did not seem inclined to dispute this position, but rather to admit that such a right did exist, and might be claimed in consequence of the acquisitions which had been made by France. On the point of satisfaction, I found him much more obstinate. He said that the first consul was hurt at the expression (satisfaction), to which he gave an interpretation I had never understood belonged to it, as implying superiority; so that if the British government required satisfaction of the French, it arrogated to itself a superiority. I told him, what certainly must be understood by every one, that the demand of satisfaction, implied that one party had been offended by another, and, of course, had a right to demand such satisfaction; that an inferior had an equal right with his superior to demand it; but, in the case in question, there was perfect equality, and, consequently, there was no offence to be found, but in the conduct which rendered such an appeal necessary. The discussion of this point took up a considerable time, without producing any thing decisive.

We, at last came to the main point of the business; and on this I cannot say any real progress has been made. M. de Talleyrand repeated to me that the first consul had nothing more at heart, than to avoid the necessity of going to war, and that there was no sacrifice he would not make, short of his honour, to obtain this end. Is there, said M. de Talleyrand, no means of satisfying both parties? for, at the same time that the first consul insists, and will always insist, on the full execution of the treaty, he will not object to any mode by which you may acquire the security you think so necessary. You are not satisfied with the independence of Neapolitan troops; what others will answer the purpose? he then started the idea of a mixed garrison, composed of English, French, Italians, Germans, &c. He begged that I would refer once more to your lordship, and submit the inclosed paper, which he drew up in my presence. I told him that we were only losing time by such a reference; that my instructions were positive, and had certainly not been sent me without the fullest consideration. I could not, however, refuse what he so earnestly required; and your lordship will see by the paper, how the matter rests after this conference. I will confess to your lordship, that my motive for consenting to forward this sort of proposal is, that supposing we should find the first consul as obstinate as he now appears to be, on the point of abandoning Malta to us in perpetuity, and that a temporary possession might be considered as the next best thing, something of this kind might derive from it. I have &c.

The conversation with M. Talleyrand to-day has led us to this result. Every thing which may tend to violate the independence of the order of Malta, will never be consented to by the French government. Every thing which may tend to put an end to the present difficulties, or be agreeable to the English government, and which shall not be contrary to the treaty of Amiens, the French government have no objection to make a particular convention respecting it. The motives of this convention shall be inserted in the preamble, and shall relate to the respective grievances concerning which the two governments shall think it advisable to come to an understanding with each other.

No. 54.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated April 14th, 1803.

Since my last, the negotiation is at a stand, in the expectation, I suppose, of the answer which may arrive, to the overture which I communicated to your lordship on the 9th instant, and which is expected here to produce a good effect, notwithstanding the little hope I have given. To-morrow I shall, in all probability, be in possession of this answer from your lordship, and be enabled to speak still more positively.

No. 55.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated April 13th, 1803.

My Lord;—His majesty has received from his charge d'affaires at Hamburgh, the most extraordinary account of the conduct of Monsieur Rheinhardt, the French minister at that place, with respect to a most gross and unwarrantable libel upon his majesty's government. He has been assured that the French minister, having proposed the insertion of that libel in the official gazette of the town of Hamburgh, and the insertion it of having, in the first instance, been refused, the French minister went so far as to demand, in his official capacity, the insertion of that article by order of the senate. His majesty is unwilling to believe that the French government could have authorized so outrageous an attack upon his majesty and his government, and so daring a violation of the independence of a neutral state. It is his majesty's pleasure that you should communicate these circumstances to the French government, and state, at the same time, the impossibility of bringing the present discussions to an amicable conclusion, unless some satisfaction shall be given to his majesty for the indignity which has thus been offered to him, in the face of all Europe, by the French minister at Hamburgh. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 56.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated April 13th, 1803.

My Lord;—Your excellency's dispatches have been received, and laid before the king. His majesty has observed, with great satisfaction, the admission by the French government of the justice of his claim to some compensation, in consequence of the increased power and influence of France, since the period of the conclusion of the definitive treaty.

Although, under the circumstances of your conversation with M. Talleyrand, and particularly after the note verbale which he gave to you, it might have been expedient that you should have deferred presenting the project contained in my dispatch, No. 7, in the form of a project, it is desirable that you should communicate without delay, in some mode or other, the contents of that project, for the purpose of ascertaining, distinctly, whether the conditions are such as to induce the French government to give way upon the question of Malta. These conditions appear to his majesty so well calculated to save the honour of the French government on the subject of Malta—if the question of Malta is principally considered by them as a question of honour—and, at the same time, hold out to them such important advantages, that the success of the proposition is at least worth trying, particularly as the result of it might be productive of the most easy means of adjusting the most material of our present differences.

With respect to the assertion so often advanced and repeated by M. Talleyrand in your last conversations of the non-execution of the treaty of Amiens relative to Malta, I have only to observe again, that the execution of that article is become impracticable from causes which it has not been in the power of his majesty to control. That the greatest part of the funds assigned to the support of the order, and indispensably necessary for the independence of the order, and defence of the island, have been sequestered since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, in direct repugnance to the spirit and letter of that treaty; and that two of the principal powers who were invited to accede as guarantees to the arrangement, have refused their accession, except on the conditions that the part of the arrangement which was deemed so material relative to the Maltese inhabitants should be entirely cancelled. The conduct of the French government, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, gives his majesty a right, which is now at length, admitted by themselves, to demand some compensation for the past and security for the future. Such compensation could never be considered as obtained by the possession of an island, which would only entail a very heavy expense on this country;—and the degree of security which would be provided by these means, would only be such as his majesty, under the present circumstances, is entitled to demand.

I observe, in the note verbale of monsieur Talleyrand, he makes use of the expression, the independence of the order of Malta. If this is meant to apply to the order exclusively, his majesty would be willing, for the preservation of peace, that the civil government of the island should be given to the order of St. John; the Maltese enjoying the privileges which were stipulated in their favour in the treaty of Amiens; and that, conformably to principles which have been adopted on other occasions, the fortifications of the island should be garrisoned for ever by the troops of his majesty.

In the event of either of these propositions being found unattainable, his majesty might be disposed to consent to an arrangement by which the island of Malta would remain in his possession for a limited number of years, and to wave in consequence his demand for a perpetual occupation, provided that the number of years was not less than ten, and that his Sicilian majesty could be induced to cede the sovereignty of the island of Lampedosa for a valuable consideration. If the proposition is admitted, the island of Malta should be given up to the inhabitants at the end of that period, and it should be acknowledged as an independent state. In this case, his majesty would be ready to concur in any arrangement for the establishment of the order of St. John in some other part of Europe.

You will not refuse to listen to any proposition which the French government may be disposed to make to you with a view to an equivalent security for those objects in regard to which his majesty claims the possession or occupation of Malta; but the three propositions to which I have above alluded, appear, at the present moment, to furnish the only basis for a satisfactory arrangement; and you will decline receiving any proposition which does not appear to you to offer advantages to his majesty as substantial as that which I have last stated.

It is very desirable that you should bring the negotiation to an issue, if possible, without referring to his majesty's government for further instructions, after the receipt of this dispatch; and if you should be of opinion that there is no hopes of bringing it to a favourable conclusion, you may inform M.

Talleyrand of the necessity you will be under, after a certain time, to leave Paris. I have, &c.

No. 57.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, April 18th, 1803.

My Lord;—I did not fail to put into immediate execution the instructions contained in your lordship's dispatch (No. 11.), on the subject of the libel inserted by the French minister in the Hamburgh gazette. I represented the outrageous and unprecedented conduct of M. Rheinhardt in such terms as it deserves; and fairly declared to M. de Talleyrand, that, until satisfaction shall be given to his majesty for the indignity which has been offered him by the French minister, in his official character, there could be no possibility whatever of bringing the present discussion to an amicable issue. M. de Talleyrand assured me, that the French government saw the conduct of M. de Rheinhardt in the same light as his majesty's ministers, and that they could not be more surprised than the first consul had been at seeing such an article inserted by authority; that an immediate explanation had been required of M. Rheinhardt, five days ago; and if his conduct had been such as had been represented, he would, doubtless, feel the effects of the first consul's displeasure; and that, in the mean time, I might inform your lordship that he was completely disavowed. I told M. de Talleyrand, that, as the insult had been public, it would be necessary that the reparation should be so also. He answered me again, that the first consul considered M. Rheinhardt's conduct as so reprehensible, that every satisfaction might be expected. I have, &c.

No. 58.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated April 18th, 1803.

My Lord;—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's dispatches of the 13th instant. I saw Joseph Buonaparté immediately on the receipt of your lordship's dispatch; and without troubling your lordship with a repetition of the arguments I used to hasten the conclusion of the negotiation, amongst which I endeavoured to convince him of the importance of preventing the ultimatum which would inevitably follow the rejection of what I had to propose, I will briefly state, that, on finding it perfectly impracticable to establish the principle of our keeping possession of Malta in perpetuity, I delivered to him, in writing, the second proposal I had to make. He did not fail to observe, that, by this modification, the difficulty which he considered as insurmountable was not removed; that although the order was restored, it could not be considered as independent; and, in fact, Malta would belong to that power which had possession of the forts. I enforced the adoption of this plan by every reason which could serve to recommend it; but the possession in perpetuity was constantly urged as a difficulty which nothing could remove. Our conversation lasted near two hours. I confess that I gained no solid ground of hope that the project, which he assured me he would take to the first consul at St. Cloud, would be adopted. But he said that he was not without hope that he might be authorized to propose to me the occupation of the fortresses for a term of years. It was my wish, that such a proposal should come from him rather than from me. I told him that I did not well see how such a tenure would suit us; but that I wished too sincerely to avoid the fatal extremities to which I saw the discussion was tending, not to give any reasonable proposal which might be made on their part every assistance in my power. This proposal originated with him, and was therefore received by me merely as a matter which I would refer to your lordship. If, however, I can bring the matter to an immediate conclusion, and without further reference to your lordship, on the principle of our retaining possession of the fortresses of Malta for a term of years, not less than that pointed out by your lordship, and with the assurance that this government will not oppose the cession of the island of Lampedosa, I shall have great pleasure in announcing to your lordship such a conclusion.

I do not enter into detail of the conversation which I had the same morning with M. de Talleyrand, immediately upon my leaving Joseph Buonaparté, as it differed in nowise from what I have above-mentioned. He suggested also the possibility of coming to an arrangement on the ground of a temporary occupation, and I made him the same answer.

Such is the state of the discussion at this moment. I am in expectation of hearing very shortly either from Joseph or M. de Talleyrand; and I am not without hopes that I may be able to announce to your lordship that such an arrangement is made, as may answer his majesty's expectations, in a very few days. Your lordship may be assured, that I feel the necessity of expedition. Were it less urgent, I might, perhaps, hope to bring the discussion to even a more favourable issue. I have, &c.

His majesty will consent, for the sake of preserving peace, that the government of the island of Malta shall be given to the order of St. John; the Maltese enjoying those privileges which have been granted on former occasions. The fortifications of the island shall be occupied, in perpetuity, by the troops of his majesty.

No. 59.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris April 20th, 1803.

My Lord;—I had hoped that the first extraordinary messenger I should have occasion to send, would have been to announce to your lordship, that the differences between the two governments were adjusted on one of the modifications pointed out to me by my last instructions from your lordship. In this expectation I am deceived. I saw Joseph Buonaparté the night before last, before I had sealed up my dispatches of that evening to your lordship; but as all he said tended only to justify the hope I had given your lordship in those dispatches, I added nothing to them. He assured me, positively, that I should hear from M. de Talleyrand in the course of yesterday morning, and that a meeting would be appointed in order to settle the term of years for which the first consul might be induced to consent to the cession of Malta. It is true that he declared, that, in order to gain his consent, it would be necessary to hold out the advantages which the British government was willing to offer in return, meaning the acknowledgments of the new governments in Italy. I told him that this offer was made only with a view to the possession of Malta in perpetuity; but after some conversation, I gave him to understand, that I would not refuse to admit the demand, sub sperati, on the condition that the cession should be made for a considerable term of years; that Holland and Switzerland should be evacuated; and that a suitable provision should be made for the king of Sardinia. He seemed to think there could be no difficulty in this arrangement; and I left him in the persuasion, that I should the next day, yesterday, or this morning, receive the summons from M. de Talleyrand, which he had given me reason to expect.

I am sorry to say, that no such summons has been received by me, neither has any further notice been taken of the business. So that I feel that I should betray the confidence your lordship may place in me, were I to delay any longer requesting, that I may be immediately furnished with the terms on which his majesty's ministers would be willing to conclude, and which probably will not differ much from those above stated, in order that I may propose them in the form of an ultimatum; and that, at the expiration of the period allowed for deliberation, I may be authorized, not only to declare that I am to leave Paris, but actually so to do, unless, in the intermediate time, the French government should accede to our demands. I have, &c.

(Signed) WHITWORTH.

No. 60.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated April 23rd, 1803.

My Lord;—Your excellency's dispatches of the 18th and 20th instant have been received, and laid before the king. It is necessary for me to do little more on the present occasion than to refer you to my dispatch of the 13th of April, in which I stated to you the several propositions on which alone, in the judgment of his majesty, the differences between this country and France could be satisfactorily adjusted.

If, upon the receipt of this dispatch, it shall not have been in your power to bring the negotiation to a conclusion on any of the propositions to which I have above referred, it is his majesty's pleasure that you should communicate, officially, to the French government, that you have gone, in point of concession, to the full extent of your instructions; and that, if an arrangement, founded upon one of these propositions, cannot be concluded, without further delay, you have received his majesty's commands to return to England.

His majesty can only consent to relinquish the permanent occupation of Malta by his forces, on the conditions that the temporary possession shall not be less than ten years; that the authority, civil and military, shall, during that period, remain solely in his majesty; and that, at the expiration of that period, the island shall be given up to the inhabitants, and not to the order; and provided likewise, that his Sicilian majesty shall be induced to cede to his majesty the island of Lampedosa. It is indispensable that, as a part of this arrangement, Holland should be evacuated by the French troops within a short period after the conclusion of a convention, by which all those provisions are secured. His majesty will consent to acknowledge the new Italian states, upon the condition that stipulations in favour of his Sardinian majesty, and of Switzerland, form a part of this arrangement.

It is his majesty's pleasure that, in the event of the failure of the negotiation, you should delay your departure from Paris no longer than may be indispensably necessary for your personal convenience; and that you should, in no case, remain there, after the receipt of this dispatch, more than seven days. I have, &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 61.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, April 23rd, 1803.

My Lord;—As I heard nothing from M. de Talleyrand, I called on him on Thursday, in order to learn the effect of the proposal which I had made, conformably to your lordship's instructions, on the basis of a perpetual possession of the forts of Malta, on re-establishing the order in the civil government of the island. He told me, that if I had called on him sooner, he should, two days ago, have communicated to me the first consul's answer, which was, that no consideration on earth should induce him to consent to a concession in perpetuity of Malta, in any shape whatever; and that the re-establishment of the order was not so much the point to be discussed, as that of suffering Great Britain to acquire a possession in the Mediterranean. I told him that I did not call sooner because I was given to understand that he would have himself proposed it to me, for the purpose of communicating the answer of the first consul; and that it did not, in any shape, become me to put myself on the footing of a solicitor in this transaction. After some conversation, and finding (what I most sincerely believe to be the case) that the first consul's determination was fixed on the point of a possession of Malta in perpetuity; I repeated to him what I had previously suggested to Joseph Buonaparté, the modification which I had to propose, namely, that, for the sake of peace, his majesty would be willing to wave his pretensions to a possession in perpetuity, and would consent to hold Malta for a certain number of years to be agreed upon, on the condition that no opposition should be made, on the part of the French government, to any negotiation his majesty might set on foot with his Sicilian majesty, for the acquisition of the island of Lampedosa. We discussed this proposal in a conversation of some length; and I made use of all the arguments which have been furnished me by your lordship, or which occurred to me, in its favour. I begged him, particularly, to recollect that we were in actual possession of the object, and that, therefore, every modification tending to limit that possession was, in fact, a concession on the part of his majesty, and a proof of his desire to sacrifice, to his love of peace, the just claim which he had acquired in consequence of the conduct of France, and which had recently been admitted, of a much more considerable compensation and counterpoise. M. de Talleyrand did not seem disposed to dispute any of my positions, and I left him, I confess, fully impressed with the idea, that the next day (Friday) I should find him prepared to treat on this ground, and that the only difficult point to be arranged would be, the number of years for which Malta should be ceded to his majesty.

Your lordship will conceive my surprise, when, on seeing him the next day, he told me, that, although he had not been able to obtain from the first consul all he wished, still the proposition he had to make would, he trusted, be such as fully to answer the purpose; he then said, that the first consul would on no terms hear either of a perpetual or a temporary possession of Malta; that his object was, the execution of the treaty of Amiens; and that rather than submit to such an arrangement as that I had last proposed, he would even consent to our keeping the object in dispute for ever; on the ground that, in the one there was an appearance of generosity and magnanimity, but in the other, nothing but weakness and the effect of coercion; that, therefore, his resolution was taken, and what he had to propose was the possession we required of the island of Lampedosa, or of any other of the small isles, of which there were three or four between Malta and the coast of Africa; that such a possession would be sufficient for the object we had in view, which was a station in the Mediterranean, as a place of refuge and security for any squadron we might find it convenient to keep in that sea. I suffered him to expatiate a considerable time, and without interruption, on the great advantage we were to derive from such an acquisition, as well as on the confidence which the first consul reposed in our pacific intention in lending a hand to such an establishment. He concluded by desiring I would transmit this proposal to your lordship. I told him that I was extremely sorry indeed, to find that we had made such little progress in the negotiation; that my orders were positive; that I could hear of nothing short of what I had proposed, neither could I possibly undertake to make such a proposal to his majesty, since every word of my instructions (from which I certainly should not depart) applied positively to Malta, unless an equivalent security could be offered; and surely he would not pretend to tell me that Lampedosa could be considered as such; that the possession of Malta was necessary for our security, and was rendered so not from any desire of aggrandizement on the part of his majesty, but by the conduct of the French government; and that so strongly were we impressed with the necessity, that, rather than abandon it, we were prepared to go to war. That it was on this ground I must declare to him, that I could neither take upon myself to forward such a proposal as he had made to me, or, indeed, any thing short of what I had last proposed as a fair equivalent. That, in so doing, I acted in conformity to his majesty's views, who would most assuredly disapprove of my conduct, were I, by unnecessarily protracting the negotiation, to add one day, or one hour, if it could be avoided, to the suspense and anxiety under which his own subjects and all Europe must labour at such a crisis; that I had hoped the French government, actuated by the same generous motives, would have acted in the same manner; that it might, by pursuing a contrary line of conduct, gain still a few days; but I must declare, that, in a very short time, I should have to communicate to him those very terms from which his were so wide, but to draw nearer to which was, perhaps, the object of his negotiating, in the form of an ultimatum, which would at least have one good effect, that of bringing the matter to an issue, and the certainty even of war was preferable to the present state of indecision.

To all I could say, M. Talleyrand objected the dignity and honour of the first consul, which could not admit of his consenting to any thing which might carry with it the appearance of yielding to a threat. I told him that it never could be admitted that the first consul had a right to act in such a manner as to excite jealousy and create alarm in every state of Europe, and when asked for explanation or security, say that it was contrary to his honour or his dignity to afford either. Such arguments might, perhaps, do, when applied to some of those governments with which France had been accustomed to treat, or more properly to dictate to, but never could be used to Great Britain; that his majesty had a right to speak freely his opinion, and possessed also the means, whenever he chose to employ them, of opposing a barrier to the ambition of any individual, or of any state, which should be disposed to threaten the security of his dominions, or the tranquillity of Europe.

Our conversation concluded by M. de Talleyrand's assuring me, that he would report the substance of it to the first consul in the evening, and that, probably, he should have occasion to see me on the following day. I have, &c.

No. 62.—Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, April 25th, 1803.

My Lord;—The conversation I had on Saturday morning with M. Talleyrand has produced nothing from which I can draw a more favourable conclusion, as to the result of the negotiation, than when I last addressed your lordship. He told me, that although he had seen the first consul the night before, he had nothing to add to what he had communicated to me on Friday; that the first consul was determined not to give his consent to our retaining Malta, either in perpetuity or for a term, although, of the two, he would prefer the former, as the less repugnant to his feelings; that he was therefore ordered to repeat the proposal he had lately made me, of acceding to our demand of Lampedosa, or any of the neighbouring islands; and that, as our object was, to obtain a settlement in the Mediterranean, he imagined that which we had ourselves pointed out would answer every purpose we might have in view. But, at all events, the first consul neither could nor would relinquish his claim to the full execution of the treaty of Amiens. To this I could only repeat what I had already said to him on the inadequacy of such a proposal, and of the impossibility in which I found myself to transmit it to your lordship. I lamented the course which the negotiation was taking, and that the first consul should have so little regard to the dreadful consequences which must ensue, as to suffer them to be outweighed by a mistaken notion of dignity. And I added, that notwithstanding the acquiescence which he might have met with from others, the plea of its being incompatible with the dignity of the French government to give satisfaction or security, when both might with justice be demanded, could never be admitted by Great Britain.

M. de Talleyrand heard every thing I could say with the utmost patience, notwithstanding he had nothing satisfactory to say, and seemed unwilling to break up the conference. He constantly brought forward the same inadmissible proposal, requesting that I would at least communicate it to your lordship. This, I told him, I could not refuse to do, since every thing which passed between him and me must, of course, make the subject of my reports to your lordship. I declared, however, at the same time, that I should not think myself by any means authorized to suspend the execution of any instructions I might receive, tending to bring the negotiation to an issue, in the expectation of any change which such a proposal might produce. All I could do, and that I would certainly do, would be to communicate the ultimatum, if his majesty should think proper to furnish me with it, confidentially to M. de Talleyrand, before I presented it officially to him, as minister for foreign affairs. He assured me that he should consider such a conduct as a further proof of my desire to conciliate, and that he could not yet forbear hoping that the differences might be adjusted. I repeated that if his hope was founded on the expectation of his majesty being induced to recede from his demand, it would be deceiving himself to cherish it.

The remainder of the conversation turned on the calamities which would follow the failure of our endeavour to avoid a rupture. He insinuated that Holland, Naples, and other countries connected with Great Britain, would be the first victims of the war. I asked him whether he thought that such a conduct would add to the glory of the first consul, or whether the falling on the innocent and defenceless would not rather tarnish it, and ultimately unite against him, not only the honest men in his own country, but every government in Europe.—That it certainly would excite more detestation than terror in England, at the same time that it would serve to impress upon us still more strongly the necessity of omitting no means of circumscribing a power so perniciously exerted. I could not help adding, that although no act of hostility had actually taken place, yet the inveteracy with which our commerce, our industry, and our credit had been attacked in every part to which French influence could be extended, did, in fact, almost amount to the same, since it went to prove, in addition to the general system of the first consul, that his object was to pursue, under the mask of peace, the same line of conduct in which the preceding governments had acted.

I now trust entirely to the effect of the ultimatum, which will at least convince him that we are in earnest, and that he has nothing to expect from protraction. I shall not, however, as I said before make use of this officially, until I have tried its effect in a more conciliatory manner. I have, &c.

(Signed) WHITWORTH.

P. S. Your lordship's dispatches of the 23rd, with their inclosures, were delivered to me, by Shaw, this evening at nine o'clock. I shall see M. de Talleyrand to-morrow morning; and I trust your lordship will not disapprove my following the line of conduct I had proposed, and which I have mentioned to your lordship, of informing him of the nature of my instructions, a few hours before I carry them officially into execution. W.

No. 63.—Extract of a dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, April 27th, 1803.

I avail myself of the opportunity of a messenger passing through from Constantinople and Vienna, to inform your lordship of the state of the negotiation at this moment. I communicated to M. de Talleyrand the purport of my instructions of the 23rd, yesterday at four o'clock. He immediately asked me if the possession of Malta was still insisted upon. I told him most certain it was; and I repeated to him the particulars of the terms on which it was yet possible to conclude the business. That these were, the possession of Malta for ten years, during which period the authority, civil and military, was to remain solely in his majesty, and that at the expiration of that term it was to be given up to the inhabitants, and not to the order; provided, also, that his Sicilian majesty shall be induced to cede to his majesty the island of Lampedusa; that Holland should be evacuated by the French troops within a month after the conclusion of a convention by which all these provisions shall be secured; and that his majesty would consent to acknowledge the new Italian states, provided stipulations were made in favour of his Sardinian majesty and of Switzerland.

I had no sooner made known these conditions, than M. de Talleyrand told me it would be perfectly unnecessary to delay the official communication; for, as the possession of Malta was still insisted upon, although for a term, the first consul would not consent to them. I accordingly did repeat them to him in the manner he desired; when he told me that he comprehended perfectly what we required, but that, in similar cases, it was usual to state the demand in writing, and he desired I would give him a note upon the subject. I told him that I would repeat to him once more, or as often as he pleased, the express terms which I had stated to him, and that as my communication to him was verbal, I should, of course, be content with an answer in the same form. He consented, at length, to receive it, and to communicate to me the first consul's answer as soon as possible. I desired that he would recollect, that Tuesday next must be the day of my departure.

No. 64.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated April 29th, 1803.

My last letter to your lordship was of yesterday evening. This morning a person came to me, whom I suspect of being employed by the first consul, for the purpose of ascertaining my sentiments, and told me that I should, in the course of the day, receive a letter from M. de Talleyrand, drawn up under the inspection of the first consul, which, although not exactly what I might wish, was, however, so moderate as to afford me a well-grounded hope, and might certainly be sufficient to induce me to delay, for a short time, my departure. I told him that it would be a matter of great satisfaction to me to perceive a probability of bringing the negotiation to a favourable issue; and that I should be extremely sorry to spoil the business by any useless precipitation. But it must be recollected, that I acted in conformity to instructions; that those instructions were positive; that by them I was enjoined to leave Paris on Tuesday next, unless, in the intermediate time, certain conditions were agreed to. Having received no letter in the course of the day, about four o'clock I went to M. de Talleyrand; I told him that my anxiety to learn whether he had any thing favourable to tell me, brought me to him, and in case he had not, to recall to his recollection that Tuesday was the day on which I must leave Paris, and to request that he would have the necessary passports prepared for me and my family. He appeared evidently embarrassed, and after some hesitation observed, that he could not suppose I should really go away; but that, at all events, the first consul never would recall his ambassador. To this I replied, his majesty recalled me in order to put an end to the negotiation, on the principle that even actual war was preferable to the state of suspense in which England, and indeed all Europe, had been kept for so long a space of time. From the tenor of his conversation, I should rather be led to think that he does not consider the case as desperate. Upon my leaving him, he repeatedly said, J'ai encore de l'Espoir.

Saturday Evening.

P. S. This day has passed without any occurrence whatever. The letter in question has not yet arrived.

No. 65.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated May 2nd, 1803.

Another day has passed over without producing any change. I determined to go myself to M. de Talleyrand, and to deliver, instead of sending, the inclosed letter. I told him that it was with great reluctance that I came to make this last application to him. That I had long since informed him of the extent of the term which had been assigned for my stay at Paris, and that as I had received to this moment, no answer whatever to the proposal I had repeatedly made, I could no longer delay requiring him to furnish me with the necessary passports for the return of myself, my family, and the remainder of my mission, to England. Upon this I gave him the letter, a copy of which I inclose, and, on reading it, he appeared somewhat startled. He lamented that so much time had been lost; but said that enough remained, if I was authorized to negotiate upon other terms. I could of course but repeat to him, that I had no other terms to propose, and that, therefore, unless the first consul could so far gain upon himself as to sacrifice a false punctilio to the certainty of a war, of which no one could foresee the consequence, nothing could possibly prevent my departure to-morrow night. He hoped, he said, this was not so near; that he would communicate my letter, and what I had said, to the first consul immediately, and that, in all probability, I should hear from him this evening. I thought it, however, right to apprise him, that it was quite impossible I could be induced to disobey his majesty's orders, and protract a negotiation on terms so disadvantageous to ourselves, unless he should furnish me with such a justification as would leave me no room to hesitate; and that I did not see that any thing short of a full acquiescence in his majesty's demands could have that effect. He repeated, that he would report the conversation to the first consul, and that I should shortly hear from him. In this state the business now rests; I am expecting either a proposition, or my passports, and am consequently taking every measure for setting out to-morrow night.

Paris, May 2nd, 1803.

Sir;—When I had the honour, on Tuesday last, of communicating to you, officially, the last propositions which I was instructed by my court to submit to the French government, for the sake of removing the present difficulties, I had the honour to announce to you, that, in case the first consul should not consent to these propositions, I should find myself under the necessity of leaving Paris in eight days. We are nearly arrived at the end of this period, without my having received any answer to this communication. It remains for me only, therefore, to obey the orders of the king my master to return to him; and, for this purpose, I entreat you, sir, to have the goodness to furnish me with the necessary passports.

WHITWORTH.

No. 66.—Extract of a dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, May 4th, 1803.

Soon after I had dispatched the messenger, the night before last, with my dispatches of the 3rd, I received a communication from M. de Talleyrand, of which I inclose a copy, the purport of which was so completely short of every thing which could be satisfactory, that I did not think myself authorized to enter into any discussion upon it; and, as early as I could on the following morning, I returned the answer, of which the inclosed is a copy.

After this I concluded, of course, that there was an end to the negotiation. I had, for some days past, been preparing for my departure; every measure was taken for setting out at four o'clock this morning, and we were expecting only the passports which I had demanded, for the purpose of ordering the post horses. The day and the evening passed without the passports having been sent; and whilst we were deliberating on the motives of such a delay, about twelve o'clock at night, a gentleman who was with me received a communication, which convinced me that it was not meant to give me my passports without another attempt, and I was, therefore, not surprised when, about one o'clock, I received the inclosed note from M. de Talleyrand. In this situation I am waiting the hour of rendezvous with M. de Talleyrand.

The undersigned has reported to the first consul the conversation which he had with his excellency lord Whitworth, on the 6th of this month, and in which his excellency announced, that his Britannic majesty had ordered him to make, verbally, in his name, the following demands: 1st. That his Britannic majesty should retain his troops at Malta for ten years. 2nd. That the island of Lampedosa should be ceded to him in full possession. 3rd. That the French troops should evacuate Holland. And that if no convention, on this basis, should have been signed within a week, his excellency lord Whitworth had orders to terminate his mission, and to return to London.

On the demand made by the undersigned, that lord Whitworth would, in conformity to the usage of all ages, and of all countries, give in writing what he himself called the ultimatum of his government, his excellency declared, that his instructions expressly forbade him to transmit, on this subject, any written note.

The intentions of the first consul being entirely pacific, the undersigned dispenses with making any observations on so new and so strange a manner of treating on affairs of this importance.

And, in order to give a fresh testimony of the value which he attaches to the continuance of peace, the first consul has directed the undersigned to make the following notification in the accustomed style and forms.

As the island of Lampedosa does not belong to France, it is not for the first consul either to accede to or to refuse the desire testified by his Britannic majesty, of having this island in his possession.

With regard to the island of Malta, as the demand made respecting it by his Britannic majesty would change a formal disposition in the treaty of Amiens, the first consul cannot but previously communicate it to his majesty the king of Spain, and to the Batavian republic, contracting parties to the said treaty, in order to know their opinion; and besides, as the stipulations relative to Malta have been guaranteed by their majesties the emperor of Germany, the emperor of Russia, and the king of Prussia, the contracting parties to the treaty of Amiens, before they agree to any change in the article of Malta, are bound to concert with the guaranteeing powers.

The first consul will not refuse this concert, but it belongs not to him to propose it, since it is not he who urges any change in the guaranteed stipulations.

With regard to the evacuation of Holland by the French troops, the first consul has no difficulty in directing the undersigned to repeat that the French troops shall evacuate Holland at the instant that the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens shall be executed in every quarter of the globe, &c.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Paris, 12 Floreal, Year 11, (2nd May, 1803.)

[Second Inclosure referred to in No. 66.]

The undersigned, in answer to the note which M. de Talleyrand transmitted to him yesterday evening, has the honour to observe to him, that the king has had no other motive in seeking to accelerate the proceedings of the negotiation, than to relieve, as soon as possible, the two countries the most interested, and Europe in general, from the state of suspense in which they are placed. It is with great regret that he perceives nothing in his excellency's note which can correspond with this intention, and consequently nothing that can justify him in delaying to obey the orders of his court. It remains, therefore, only to request the minister for foreign affairs to give him the means of obeying them, by furnishing him with the necessary passports for his return. It is however necessary for him to rectify a mistake which has crept into M. de Talleyrand's note. The undersigned did not say he was expressly forbidden to transmit any written note on the object of the discussion, but that he was not authorized to do it, and that he would not take that responsibility on himself. He avails himself, &c.

[Third Inclosure referred to in No. 66.]

Paris, May 3, 1803.

My Lord;—Having to-morrow morning to make to you a communication of the greatest importance, I have the honour to inform you of it without delay, in order that you may not expect this evening the passports which you had demanded. I propose that you should call to-morrow, at half past four, at the foreign department. Receive, &c.

(Signed) CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 67.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, May 4th, 1803.

I am this moment come from M. de Talleyrand. The inclosed note will show your lordship, that the idea which has been thrown out, is to give Malta to Russia. My only inducement for having undertaken to refer again to your lordship is, to avoid every reproach of precipitation. The difference will be but five days, and I have declared, that I see so many objections to the plan, that, although I would not refuse their solicitation to send it, I could give no hope whatever of its being accepted as a ground of negotiation.

The undersigned has submitted to the first consul his Britannic majesty's note of the 3rd instant.

After the last communication, addressed to his excellency, it is more difficult than ever to conceive, how a great, powerful, and enlightened nation can be willing to take upon itself to declare a war, which would be accompanied by such heavy calamities, and the cause of which would be so insignificant, the object in question being a miserable rock.

His excellency must have been aware, that the twofold necessity of making an agreement with the guaranteeing powers of the treaty of Amiens, and of not violating a compact, in the execution of which, the honour of France, the security for the future, and the good faith of the diplomatic intercourse between the nations of Europe, were so deeply interested, had imposed a law upon the French government, of discarding every proposition diametrically contrary to the treaty of Amiens.—Nevertheless, the first consul, accustomed for two months to make every species of sacrifice for the maintenance of peace, would not reject a mezzo-termo of a nature to conciliate the interests and dignity of the two countries.

His Britannic majesty appears to have been of opinion, that the Neapolitan garrison, which was to be placed at Malta, would not afford a sufficient force for securing the actual independence of the island.

This motive being the only one which can explain his majesty's refusal to evacuate the island, the first consul is ready to consent, that the island of Malta shall be placed in the hands of one of the three powers who have guaranteed its independence—either Austria, Russia, or Prussia, with a proviso, that, as soon as France and England shall have come to an agreement upon this article, they shall unite in their requisitions, to engage other powers, either contracting or acceding to the treaty of Amiens, to consent to it.

Were it possible that this proposition should not be accepted, it would be manifest, not only that England never intended to comply with the terms of the treaty of Amiens, but that she has not been actuated by good faith in any of her demands, and that in proportion as France conceded one point, the British government advanced another. If this should be demonstrated, the first consul will at least have given another proof of his sincerity, of his anxiety to devise the means of avoiding war, of his eagerness to embrace them, and of the value which he would place on their being adopted.—Paris, 14 Floreal, Year 11.

No. 68.—Dispatch from Lord Hawkesbury to Lord Whitworth, dated May 7th, 1803.

My Lord;—Your excellency's dispatches have been received, and laid before the king. The propositions which have been made to you, on the part of the French government, and which have induced your excellency to delay your departure until the return of the messenger Sylvester, are in every respect so loose, indefinite, and unsatisfactory, and fall so short of the just pretensions of his majesty, that it is impossible that the French government could have expected them to have been accepted. During the whole of the discussions which have lately occurred, his majesty has had a right to consider himself in the character of the injured party. No means have been omitted, on his part, to induce the French government to make a full and early explanation of their views, and to afford to his majesty that satisfaction and security to which he considered himself to be entitled. It was in consequence of the apparent determination of the French government, to evade all discussion on the points of the difference between the two countries, that his majesty was induced to state the grounds on which, according to his views, an arrangement might be concluded satisfactory to both governments: and he accordingly authorized your excellency to communicate the three projects which, at different times, I had forwarded to you.

Until the very moment when your excellency was about to leave Paris, the French government have avoided making any distinct proposition for the settlement of the differences between the two countries; and when, at the very instant of your departure, the French government felt themselves compelled to bring forward some proposition, they confined that proposition to a part only of the subject in discussion, and, on that part of it, what they have brought forward is wholly inadmissible.

The French government propose, that his majesty should give up the island of Malta, to a Russian, Austrian, or Prussian garrison.

If his majesty should be disposed to wave his demand for a temporary occupation of the island of Malta, the emperor of Russia would be the only sovereign to whom, in the present state of Europe, he could consent that the island should be assigned; and his majesty has certain and authentic information, that the emperor of Russia would on no account consent to garrison Malta. Under these circumstances, his majesty perseveres in his determination to adhere to the substance of his third project as his ultimatum: as, however, the principal objection stated by the French government to his majesty's proposition is understood to be confined to the insertion of an article in a public treaty, by which his majesty shall have a right to remain in possession of the island of Malta for a definite number of years (being in no case less than ten), it may be stated in a secret article; and the public articles may be agreed to conformably to the inclosed project. By this expedient, the supposed point of honour of the French government might be saved. The independence of the island of Malta would, in principle, be acknowledged, and the temporary occupation of his majesty would be made to depend alone on the present state of the island of Lampedosa.

You may propose this idea to M. Talleyrand, at the same time assuring him that his majesty is determined to adhere to the substance of his ultimatum. And if you shall not be able to conclude the minute of an arrangement on this principle, you will on no account remain in Paris more than thirty-six hours after the receipt of this dispatch.

I observe by your dispatch, you did not consider yourself authorized to deliver to the French government any note or project in writing. The words of my dispatch were, that you were to communicate the terms officially, which left it at your own discretion to communicate them verbally, or in writing, as you might judge most expedient. You were certainly right in communicating them, in the first instance, verbally; but, as so much stress has been laid by M. Talleyrand on this distinction, it is important that I should inform you, that his majesty neither had, nor has, any objection to your delivering the inclosed project as an ultimatum, accompanied by a short note in writing.

I cannot conclude this dispatch, without recalling again your attention to the conduct of the French minister at Hamburgh, and referring you to my instructions, by which you should abstain from concluding the arrangement, unless you have received from M. Talleyrand an assurance that his conduct would be publicly disavowed.—I have &c.

HAWKESBURY.

No. 69.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, May 9th, 1803.

The messenger, Sylvester, is arrived with your lordship's dispatch, No. 15, of the 7th of May. As soon as I received your lordship's instructions, I prepared a translated copy of the project furnished me by your lordship, and a short note, with which it is my intention to accompany the communication. I then sent a person to Monsieur Talleyrand, to know when I could see him, and I was informed, that he was at St. Cloud. I soon after learnt that he was gone there in consequence of the accident which happened yesterday to the first consul. I understand that no bad consequences are likely to ensue, and that he is able to transact business. I cannot, however, expect to see M. Talleyrand before to-morrow morning. Although this circumstance may cause a delay of a few hours, your lordship may be assured, that the execution of those instructions with which you have furnished me, shall not be protracted. I shall leave Paris most assuredly, or have concluded a satisfactory arrangement, within the time specified by your lordship, reckoning from the moment of my being able to make an official communication, rather than from that of the receipt of your lordship's letter.

No. 70.—Extract of a Dispatch from Lord Whitworth to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Paris, May 12th, 1803.

The messenger, Sylvester, as I mentioned in my last dispatch, returned on the 9th, at twelve o'clock; and I wrote to M. Talleyrand, informing him of it, and desiring him to name an hour when I might wait on him, in order to communicate to him the purport of my instructions. To this letter, I received no answer that evening or the following morning. Anxious to execute my orders, and to lose no time, I enclosed the project furnished me by your lordship, accompanied by an official note, and a private letter to M. de Talleyrand, and sent it to the foreign department by Mr. Mandeville, with directions to deliver it to M. de Talleyrand, or, in his absence, to the Chef du Bureau. He delivered it, accordingly, to M. Durand, who promised to give it to his chief as soon as he came in, which, he expected, he said, shortly. At half past four, having waited till that time in vain, I went myself to M. de Talleyrand; I was told that the family was in the country, and that they did not know when the minister would be in town. Half an hour after I had returned home, the packet which Mr. Mandeville had given into the hands of M. Durand, was brought to me, I believe, by a servant, with a verbal message, that as M. de Talleyrand was in the country, it would be necessary that I should send it to him there. In order to defeat, as much as depended upon me, their intention of gaining time, I wrote again to M. de Talleyrand, recapitulating the steps I had taken since the return of the messengers; and desired Mr. Talbot, the secretary of the embassy, to take it, himself, at nine o'clock at night, when I thought M. de Talleyrand would be at home, to his house at Meudon. He was, however, not at home. Mr. Talbot was told that he was at St. Cloud, where he had been all day, and that he would not be back until very late. He, therefore, left my private letter, with his name, and returned with the packet. It was my intention to have sent it on the following morning to the Bureau, with orders, that it should be left there; at one o'clock in the morning, I received a note from M. de Talleyrand, accounting for his not being able to answer me sooner, and appointing me at twelve o'clock at the Bureau des Relations Extérieures. I went at the appointed time. He began, by apologizing for having so long postponed the interview, which he attributed to his having been the whole day with the first consul. We then entered upon business. I told him that, limited as I was by your lordship's instructions, he could not be surprised at my impatience to acquit myself of my duty. I explained to him the nature of your lordship's observations on the proposal of the 4th; and that it was considered as, on one hand, impracticable, from the refusal of the emperor of Russia to take charge of Malta, and, on the other, as being wholly inadequate to his majesty's just pretensions. I gave him the note in which this was expressed, and the project, on which alone a satisfactory arrangement could be framed. He read with apparent attention, and without many remarks; and, after some time, he asked me, if I felt myself authorized, by my instructions, to conclude with him a convention, framed on the basis of my project, or, indeed, extending that basis, since the first article of it would be the perpetual possession of Malta to England, in a return for a consideration. I told him, I most certainly was not authorized to enter into any engagement of such a nature, which would make the negotiation one of exchange, instead of a demand of satisfaction and security. To this he replied, that the satisfaction and security which we required was Malta, and that this we obtained. That the first consul could not accede to what he considered, and what must be considered by the public and by Europe, as the effect of coercion, but if it were possible to make the draft palatable, did I think myself justifiable in refusing to do so. I told him that, acting in strict compliance with my instructions, I could have no need of justification, and that I came to him with the determination of abiding strictly by them. He contended, that by communicating a project, I merely stated on what grounds we would be willing to conclude, and that a counter-project, founded on the basis of giving us what we required, could not be refused a fair discussion. To this, I urged the resolution of his majesty's ministers, to avoid every thing which could protract the negotiation. That I saw no other means of acting up to those views, than by making my stand on the project at all events. I urged him, repeatedly, to explain himself more fully on the nature of the demand which he should make for Malta, but he could not, or would not, explain himself. After much contest, it was agreed the proposal should be submitted to me in the course of a few hours, and that I should determine on the line of conduct I might feel myself justified in pursuing, either to sign it, to send it home, or to leave Paris.

The remainder of this day passed without receiving any communication from M. de Talleyrand. Upon this, I determined to demand my passports, by an official note, which I sent this morning by Mr. Mandeville, in order that I might leave Paris in the evening.

At two, I renewed my demand of passports, and was told I should have them immediately. They arrived at five o'clock, and I propose setting out as soon as the carriages are ready.

The undersigned, his Britannic majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the French republic, having transmitted to his court the proposal which was made to him by the minister for foreign affairs, on the third instant, has just received orders to transmit to his excellency the accompanying project of a convention, founded on the only basis which his majesty conceives, under the existing circumstances, to be susceptible of a definitive and amicable arrangement. The minister for foreign affairs will not fail to observe to what degree his majesty has endeavoured to conciliate the security of his interests with the dignity of the first consul. The undersigned flatters himself, that the first consul, doing justice to these sentiments, will adopt, in concert with his majesty, an expedient so suitable for restoring permanent tranquillity to both nations, and to all Europe. The undersigned, &c.

(Signed) WHITWORTH.

[Second Inclosure referred to in No. 70.]

Project.—I. The French government shall engage to make no opposition to the cession of the island of Lampedosa to his majesty by the king of the Two Sicilies. II. In consequence of the present state of the island of Lampedosa, his majesty shall remain in possession of the island of Malta, until such arrangement shall be made to him, as may enable his majesty to occupy Lampedosa as a naval station; after which period, the island of Malta shall be given up to the inhabitants, and acknowledged as an independent state. III. The territories of the Batavian republic shall be evacuated by the French forces within one month after the conclusion of a convention, founded on the principles of this project. IV. The king of Etruria, and the Italian and Ligurian republics, shall be acknowledged by his majesty. V. Switzerland shall be evacuated by the French forces. VI. A suitable territorial provision shall be assigned to the king of Sardinia, in Italy.

Secret Article.—His majesty shall not be required by the French government to evacuate the island of Malta until after the expiration of ten years. Article IV, V, and VI, may be entirely omitted, or must all be inserted.

[Third Inclosure referred to in No. 70. Paris, May 10, 1803.]

Sir;—In order not to lose an instant of so precious a time, I have the honour to convey to you the project which I have received from my court, with the note which accompanies it. I shall have the honour of calling on your excellency at any hour you may appoint, in consequence of the request I made yesterday. But, in the mean while, you will be in possession of the contents of my instructions. I hope to God that they may be of a nature to insure the tranquillity of both countries and of Europe. I avail myself, &c.
(Signed) WHITWORTH.

Sir;—Having yesterday morning received some important instructions to communicate to you, I wrote to you that evening to ask your excellency at what hour I could have the honour to acquit myself of this duty. That letter has not been answered. At two o'clock this afternoon I sent Mr. Mandeville, attached to the embassy, to the office for foreign affairs, in order to deliver to your excellency, or in your absence to your first secretary, a sealed packet, containing the papers which I had to communicate to you, and I added a second letter to your excellency. M. Mandeville delivered this packet into the hands of M. Durand, who assured him that it should be communicated to you without delay. At half past four, not having received any answer to my letters, I went to the foreign office, and I there learnt that you were in the country, and that it was not known when you would return to town.

Half an hour afterwards, having returned home, the papers which my secretary had taken and delivered to M. Durand, were brought to me, with a message that I must send them to the minister in the country.

In this state of things, since your excellency does not give me an opportunity of making you this communication, I have no other alternative than to give it in charge to Mr. Talbot, secretary to the embassy. He will have the honour to deliver to you the project of a convention, which, I hope, will serve as the basis to an amicable arrangement between our two governments.

I have only to add, that the term of my stay in Paris is limited, and I must set out on my journey for England on Thursday morning, if the negotiation is not favourably terminated before that time. I request you, &c.

(Signed) WHITWORTH.

[Fifth Inclosure referred to in No. 70.]

It being impossible for the undersigned to delay any longer executing the orders of his court, he finds himself obliged to request the minister for foreign affairs to have the goodness to expedite the necessary passports for his return to England. He requests, &c.

No. 71.—Extract of a Dispatch from Sir George Rumbold, Bart. to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Hamburg, March 29, 1803.

Late last night it was determined that the senate should be convened extraordinarily on this day, in order to consider of a requisition from the French minister, to insert in the Hamburg paper a most offensive article, intended as a justification of the first consul, and an attack on the measures of the British government. It is with great regret that I inform your lordship, that the senate have judged it prudent to comply with this demand; and that the article will be inserted in the paper of to-morrow. It is now in the hands of the publisher for that purpose. It was the wish of the senate that they might at least be allowed to omit or qualify the most offensive passages, but Mr. Rheinhardt said his orders were positive, for the full and exact insertion of the whole.

No. 72.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Hill to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Copenhagen, April 2, 1803.

The French minister at Hamburg, received orders from his government to have inserted in the public papers of that city, an article which was sent to him, containing a commentary upon his majesty's communication to parliament, respecting the necessity of increasing the military forces of the country in the present circumstances. The senate of Hamburg consented with much repugnance to the insertion of this paragraph. The French minister desired that the same should be published in the papers of Altona; but the Danish magistrates said that they could not possibly permit it without an express order from this government. In consequence of this refusal, M. Daguesseau, the French minister at this court, received from his colleague at Hamburg, a copy of the article, with a request that he would solicit the permission of its publication in the Danish papers. To my knowledge he had no answer yesterday, and I have every reason to suppose that this government will show the greatest reluctance in acceding to the French minister's request.

APPENDIX.—No. 1.—Report made to the French Consul by Colonel Sebastiani, extracted from the Moniteur of the 30th of January, 1803.

On the 16th of September I embarked at Toulon, on board the Cornélie; and on the 30th I arrived at Tripoli. I immediately wrote to baron Cederstrom, the Swedish rear-admiral, as well as to the minister of the pacha, to offer them my mediation to terminate the differences existing between the Swedish court and the Regency. My mediation was accepted: the minister and the rear-admiral repaired to the commissarial house of France, and we entered on the negotiation. The two parties were far asunder; the pacha demanded a considerable sum, and an augmentation of the annual tribute. He urged a treaty made two years ago by an envoy of the king of Sweden, which assured the payment of 245,000 heavy piastres, and of an annuity of 20,000; he added, that two years of war had subjected him to extraordinary expenses, and that he used great moderation in conforming himself to the treaty in question. M. de Cederstrom only offered, in the name of his court, 100,000 piastres for the redemption of the Swedish slaves, who were to the number of a hundred and fifty, and an annuity of 5,000 piastres. After much debate, I succeeded in making them sign a treaty which fixed the payment of the ransom at 150,000 piastres, and the annuity at 8,000.—On the 1st of October I was presented with much pomp to the pacha, who received me in the most distinguished manner. The exchange of the ratification of the treaty of peace took place, and the Italian republic was formally acknowledged. I caused its flag to be hoisted on the commissarial house of France, and it was saluted by the frigate and the place with twenty-one guns. It was not without difficulty that the pacha consented to acknowledge that republic. He feared that all Italy was comprised in this new republic, and that, in consequence, he would be obliged to respect indiscriminately all the ships of commerce of that part of Europe:—this would destroy his marine. I gave him the necessary explanations, and particularly those which related to the object of his apprehensions, and he replied to me, “Certainly I wish to be at peace with the Italian republic, without too much injuring my interest; but if it were still more difficult, I would do it, since the great Buonaparté desires it. The pacha of Tripoli is a brave and enterprising man, the friend of France. The English have furnished succours to his brother, who is at present at Derue, without means or credit. His plan is to raise the country against the bey. The political and administrative affairs of the regency are conducted by Seid-Muhammed-el-Deghais, minister of the pacha. This man is full of sagacity, and has even some notions of European politics. He has been in France, and preserves for our country a predominant sentiment of affection. On the 2nd of October I set out from Tripoli, and on the 16th arrived at Alexandria: the same day I waited upon general Stuart, commandant of the English forces by land and sea. I communicated to him the order of the minister for foreign affairs, which enjoined me to proceed to Alexandria, and, if the English still occupied that place, to demand a speedy evacuation, and the execution of the treaty of Amiens. General Stuart then told me, that the evacuation of the place would shortly be effected; but seeing that I insisted, and that I desired an answer less vague, he declared to me, that he had no orders from his court to quit Alexandria, and that he even believed he should pass the winter there. General Stuart is a man of mediocre talents: he has for his aide-camp a French emigrant, called the Chevalier de Sades, a man of talent, and an enemy of France, who has much influence over the general. I went the same day to see Khourchid-Ahmid, the pacha of Alexandria and the capitan bey, commander of the forces of the Ottoman Porte. After the customary compliments, and some language agreeable to the Sublime Porte, I announced to them, that the agents of French commerce would assemble in Egypt. This communication gave them the greatest pleasure, and they did not conceal that they saw with grief the stay of the English in the country. I told them that their stay could not be much longer, and that the general peace left no doubt of their approaching departure. On the 17th I visited the cheik El-Messiry. The same day I also visited the cheik Ibrahim Mufti. On the 18th I visited the Coupure du Khalidj, which has formed the lake Mareotis. The current of the waters of the lake Madié is still very strong, and if the Porte does not make haste to re-establish this important canal, the overflows which take place on the little tongue of land that separates the two lakes, will render the opening so considerable, that it will be impossible to travel. I do not think that the Swedish engineer sent by the Porte to direct these labours has the necessary talents. The formation of the lake Mareotis appears to have contributed to the salubrity of the air. The city has no other water than what it draws from the wells of Marabouf. This little fort I found guarded by an English and Turkish garrison, in order to protect the inhabitants who came to draw water. I employed the day of the 19th in perambulating the town, and receiving different individuals who came to visit me. On the 20th, I set out for Cairo, escorted by two Turkish officers, and six French soldiers, whom I had taken on board the frigate; but contrary winds obliged me to return to the port. The next day I was at Aboukir, where I passed the night. I profited by this opportunity to visit the fort, which is in a very ruined state. On the 22nd I arrived at Rosetta, after having visited the Fort Julien; I saw the same day Osman, Aga, and Duvanny of the town, as well as all the Christians who reside there. The 23rd I was at Faoné, where I visited the commandant of the place, the cadi, and the cheiks: I received from the latter, and from all those whom I entertained, protestations of attachment to the first consul. I passed the next day at Ralimanie, where I visited the cheik Muhammed Abou-Aly; the fort of the town is almost entirely destroyed. I visited on the 25th, at Menouf, the cheik Abdin, whom the first consul had appointed cadi. The other cheiks of that town who came to visit me held the same language as those of Faoné. I said to them, "the first consul loves your country much, he speaks of it often; he interests himself in your happiness; he did not forget you, and recommended you to the Porte. He has made peace with Europe, and this country will feel the interest which he takes, and the recollection which he has preserved of the poor cheiks of Egypt." — Muhammed Kacheff-Zourba Matzellem, who commanded at Menouf on my journey through that town, has been beheaded, in consequence of being accused of communications with the Mamelouks. The two forts of Menouf are destroyed. I arrived the same day at Boulak. I sent immediately citizen Joubert to inform the pacha of Cairo of my arrival. The next morning, the 26th, the pacha sent 300 cavalry and 200 infantry, commanded by the principal officers of his household, to accompany me to him, amidst a great many discharges of artillery. Having arrived at the pacha's, I said to him, "peace has been concluded between the French republic and the Sublime Porte: the ancient relations of amity and commerce have been re-established, and I am charged by the great consul Buonaparté to assure you of his benevolence, and to announce to you the arrival of commissaries of the French commerce in Egypt." The pacha answered me, "the benevolence with which the first consul has honoured me penetrates me with gratitude, and his commercial agents shall meet here the most friendly reception." I proceeded then to the house which the pacha had prepared for me. I received the same day the visits of all the principal men of the country, and of the Copt intendants. On the 27th I again repaired to the pacha, with whom I had a long conference. I spoke to him in these words: "the first consul takes in you, and the country which you govern, a very lively interest, and desires to contribute to your happiness; he has charged me therefore to offer you his mediation, in order to make peace between you and the beys."

The pacha thanked me warmly and sincerely for the interest which the first consul took in his behalf; but he protested to me, that he had the most positive orders from his court to make a war of extermination upon the beys, and not to enter into any arrangement with them. I observed, that the unfortunate circumstances which had happened to the Ottoman troops (they had been beaten five times successively by the Mamelouks) rendered their position very critical, and that obstinacy exposed them to the loss of the province. He then communicated to me the order of the Porte, and I saw beyond a doubt that it was not possible for him to enter into any accommodation. I informed him that I intended to visit the different cheiks of Cairo, and also Madame Murad Bey, and to inspect the environs and fortifications of the city. He ordered immediately that the guard which he had sent should accompany me wherever I wished to go, informing me, that he would use every means in his power to render my stay at Cairo agreeable. The same day I commenced my visits, beginning with the cheik Abdallah-el-Chescanoi, of the Great Mosque. As I was expected by him, he had assembled a considerable number of cheiks. The conversation turned upon the interest which the first consul took in Egypt, on his power, his glory, and on his esteem and benevolence for the learned cheiks of Cairo. Their answers expressed their attachment to his person. He must have been a witness, like myself, to the enthusiasm excited at the view of the portrait of the first consul, to form an idea of the exaltation of their sentiments. I have given it to all the principal cheiks of Cairo, and of the towns where I have travelled. On the 28th I invited the cheik Omar El-Berky, prince of the Shiriss: he was ill, and I saw only his son. The cheik Suleiman El-Fargoumy received me with much friendship, and assured me of his boundless admiration for the first consul. The citizens Joubert and Beye have certified to me that the inhabitants of Cairo never testified so much attachment to France as on my arrival. When we pass along the streets, every body salutes us. Their astrologers make predictions every day as to what concerns the first consul. On the 29th I went to visit Madame Murad Bey: her intendant had already prayed of me that I would grant her an interview. I informed her, that the first consul had charged me to interpose my mediation, in order to make their peace with the Sublime Porte; but that the pacha had ordered that no negotiation should be entered into. I employed that day and the following in visiting the citadel, the Isle of Roda Gize, Boulak, and all the other little forts which surround the city. The Turkish soldiers murmured to see me visit their forts, but I feigned not to hear them, and continued my course and my observations. On the 29th, in returning to Fort Dupuy, a soldier menaced me with his attagan: but as the inhabitants of the city testified highly their indignation against him, I did not stop at his menaces, and continued my route. A moment afterwards Mustapha Oukil, one of the chiefs of the city, passed before me on horseback. In passing, he reproached my guides with marching before a Christian, and, above all, before a Frenchman, and menaced them with the bastinado after my departure. I could not be silent under such an insult; and upon my return, I sent citizen Joubert to the pacha to make my complaint, and demand a prompt redress. I declared to him that I expected this man would come publicly to me to ask my pardon, place himself at my disposal, and implore my pity. He found that Mustapha was greatly protected by the pacha, and wanted to arrange it otherwise; but I persisted by declaring formally to the pacha, that, if this reparation was not made in the manner in which I demanded it, I should instantly depart, and immediately write to Paris and Constantinople to state my complaint. This declaration produced all the effect which I expected; and Mustapha, alarmed, came on the following day to me, conducted by Rosetti, and he publicly asked my pardon, and put himself at my disposal. I told him that my first intention had been to cut off his head, and that I only gave him his life at the solicitations of the pacha and M. Rosetti; but if in future he should ever insult the French, or those in their suite, his destruction would be inevitable. This affair, which was instantly spread throughout the whole city, produced the best effect. The same day an attempt was made to excite the Albanese against me. Two letters from Rosetta, written by English protégées; assured that there had been seen upon the coasts of Natolia a French fleet of 300 sail; that we were marching against Constantinople, and that my visit to Egypt had no other object but to deceive them, and blind them to their dangers. I made the merchant come to me who had received the letter: I made him give it me. I instantly sent it to the pacha himself, telling him that this absurd news was spread to occasion disorders, and to endeavour to alter the good understanding which existed between France and the Sublime Porte; and I guaranteed the falsehood of it with my head. The pacha had discovered the snare, and did not fall into it. He even communicated to me a letter from general Stuart, which he had just received, and to which was joined an order of the day of the first consul, when he commanded the army of Egypt. This order of the day was dated in August 1799, and recalled to the recollection of the Egyptians that Constantinople was tributary to Arabia, and that the time was now come to restore Cairo to its supremacy, and to destroy the Eastern empire of the Ottomans. General Stuart begged the pacha to consider the spirit of that order, and to judge from it of our attachment, and of our peace with the Turks. I was indignant to find that a soldier of one of the most polite nations of Europe should degrade himself so far as to instigate assassination, by means of such an insinuation.—The pacha treated me with the greatest politeness, and the English at Cairo were witnesses of the attachment of that city to the French. I received a deputation from the monks of Mount Sinai, whom I recommended to the pacha: I wrote to their superior, to assure them of the friendship and protection of the first consul. The monks of the Propaganda at Cairo, whom I placed under the national protection which they enjoyed before the war, celebrated a Te Deum for the prosperity of the first consul. I assisted at this ceremony, at which all the Christians of Cairo were present. The evening before my departure (the 2nd of November) I had another interview with the pacha, and recommended all the Christians of Cairo to his protection, as well as the Turks, who, during the residence of the French in Egypt, were connected with them. He not only promised to respect them, but even to treat them with bounty. On the 3rd, I set out in a conveyance of the pacha's, in order to repair to Damietta. The pacha ordered me to be escorted to Boulak, with the same honours that I received on the day of my arrival. I had written to captain Gourdin to repair to Damietta with the frigate, in order to convey me to Syria. On the 5th, I stopped a short time at Simenoud, and afterwards at Mansoura, where I saw the commandant of the city and the cheik Esseid-Muhammed-El-Chenaoni, who came to see me, as well as all the other cheiks. I spoke to them in the same manner as the other cheiks of Egypt, and received the same promises of attachment. The Tower of Mansura is destroyed. The same day I arrived at Damietta. The next day I went to Ahmed-Pacha-Behil, a creature of the grand vizier's; he returned my visit the same day. He conducted himself perfectly well to me during my stay in that city. On the 7th I went to visit the Fort of Lesbe, and the Towers of Bogaz. They have not continued the works of that fort, which is in a bad state: those of Bogaz are in a good condition. There is a garrison of 200 men in the fort and in the towers. On the 8th I received the visit of Hassan Toubar: his influence over the inhabitants of Mensale is still the same. On the 9th I went to Senenie, where I saw the cheik Ibrahim-El-Behlout, he who behaved so well to the French under the orders of general Vial, when they were taken and imprisoned. The first consul had exempted his village from all contributions. I saw all the cheiks at Damietta, particularly Ali Khasaki, whom the first consul had invested with a pelisse: he is possessed of great credit, and is much attached to the French. There are at Damietta two Christians, who are men of merit, and may be very useful to us: they are M. Bazile and Don Bazile. They are possessed of good information, have very considerable fortunes, and are very highly respected. In Egypt, chiefs, merchants, people, all like to talk of the first consul; all offer up prayers for his happiness. All the news which concerns him spread from Alexandria or Damietta to the Pyramids and the Grand Cataracts with astonishing rapidity. On the 14th the frigate arrived at Bogaz from Damietta: I immediately set out for Acre, at which place I arrived on the 19th.

The 20th of November, in the morning, I dispatched citizens Joubert and Legrange to Dgezzar-Pacha, with a letter in which I stated to him, that peace being concluded between France and the Porte, the relations of commerce should be re-established on the footing they stood before the war, and that I was charged by the first consul to confer with him on these objects. I begged of him to answer me in writing, if he was inclined to treat with me. In some hours the messengers returned Dgezzar had received them coldly. He expressed his desire to see me personally, but was unwilling to write. Every body advised me not to see him, without an assurance written by himself; but this he appeared unwilling to do: but notwithstanding this cautionary advice, and his obstinate refusal to write, I determined to repair myself immediately to Acre. I repaired to the house of the commissary of the Seven Isles. Very soon after, the Dragoman of the pacha, informed of my arrival, came to conduct me to the pacha, who received me in an apartment where he was unattended, and which was without any other furniture than a carpet. He had on one side of him a pistol with four barrels, a small air-gun, a sabre, and a hatchet. After inquiring as to my health, he asked me whether I was not persuaded that our end is pre-ordained in Heaven, and that nothing could change our destiny. I answered that I believed, as he did, in predestination. He continued to speak for some time on that subject. I perceived, however, that he affected a degree of simplicity; but that, at the same time, he wished to pass for a man of wit, as well as for a just man. He repeated several times, "It is said that Dgezzar is barbarous; this is false, he is but just and severe. Request of the first consul not to send me, as commissary of commercial relations, a lame or a blind man; because such a person would be sure to say, that Dgezzar had made him so." Soon after he said, "I desire that the commissary you may send shall reside at Seide, as that is the most commercial port in my dominions: beside it is not necessary he should reside here, where I shall be myself the French commissary, and shall take care that your countrymen be well received. I highly esteem the French. In stature Buonaparté is small, but he is nevertheless the greatest of mankind. I know that he is greatly regretted at Cairo, where they wish to see him again." I made a few observations on the peace between France and the Porte; to which he answered, "Do you know why I have thus received, and feel so much pleasure at seeing you? It is because you come unauthorized by a firman, and without any orders from the divan. I have the greatest contempt for its blind vizier. They say that Dgezzar is a Bosnian, a man of straw, and cruel to excess; but nevertheless, I can stand the ordeal. I was once poor. My father had nothing to bequeath me but courage. I have achieved my own elevation by dint of exertion. This, however, does not make me proud, and Dgezzar, perhaps, will soon finish his career: not that he is old, as his enemies report, (he then performed some of the manœuvres of the Mamelukes, in their mode of rising their arms, &c. which he really executed with surprising adroitness and agility), but because most likely God will have it so. The king of France, once so powerful, has perished. Nebuchadnezzar, the greatest of all kings, was, when his time was come, killed by a fly, &c." He made several observations in this strain, and afterwards spoke of the motives which induced him to make war upon the French army; from the whole of his demeanor it could easily be seen, that he wished to be on good terms with the first consul, and that he stifled his resentments. The following is the apologue, which he used to demonstrate the causes of his resistance. "A black slave," he said, "after a long journey, in which he had suffered the greatest privations, arrived at a little field of sugar canes; he stopped therein, and indulged himself in partaking of the delicious liquor they afforded; and at length was determined to remain on the spot. Very soon afterwards two travellers, who had followed him, came up. The first said to him, Salamalle (the mode of wishing health). The devil take it, answered the black. The second traveller then approached, and inquired why he had answered in such a way to so good a wish. I had very good reason for it, replied he; if I had answered in a friendly manner, the man would have entered into conversation with me, and afterwards sat down beside me; he would have partaken of my refreshments, and finding them desirable, would have endeavoured to obtain exclusive possession." I recommended to the favourable attention of Dgezzar the Christians and the convents at Nazareth and Jerusalem: he assured me that he would treat them with much regard. I did not forget the Mutuales, and received the same assurance in their behalf. Dgezzar frequently observed to me, that his word was, with him more sacred than treaties. Our conversation was interrupted for some moments by a kind of military music, which he performed in a very agreeable style. The palace of Dgezzar is built with much taste and elegance; but in order to arrive at the apartments, a number of turnings are necessary. At the foot of the staircase, however, is situated a prison, the gate of which is allowed to be open from noon till evening. I saw a number of the unfortunate inhabitants. In the courts I observed twelve field pieces well mounted, and in admirable order. Never did I encounter a sight more hideous or repulsive than that of the minister of Dgezzar, whom I met in going out. The pacha had caused one of his eyes to be put out, and his nose and ears to be cut off. I saw in the town more than a hundred individuals in the same state. On beholding the domestics of Dgezzar, and even the inhabitants of Acre, one would imagine himself in the resorts of brigands ready to assassinate. This monster has imprinted the mark of his atrocious character upon every thing within the limits of his power. I had an opportunity of seeing, while at Acre, the procurateur of the propaganda, as well as that of the Holy-land. Of the former, and of the commissary of the Seven Isles, I collected some information concerning the present state of Syria, and the fortifications of Acre, of which I had seen but a part: I was not suffered to visit them. The procurateur of the Holy Land is grateful to the first consul for the protection he had afforded the monks. He assured me that my recommendation to Dgezzar would be very useful. He hinted to me Dgezzar's earnest wishes to be on good terms with the first consul. It is certain that the former behaved very well to the crew of a French vessel which put into Acre shortly before my arrival. Dgezzar occupies all Palestine, with the exception of Jaffa, where Aboumarak Pacha has been besieged nearly five months, by a force of 9,000 men. This operation prevents Dgezzar from carrying on hostilities with the desired vigour against the emir of the Druses, who for the space of a year, had paid him no tribute. Tripoli is tranquil at present: it is different at Aleppo, whence the pacha has been driven. Damascus is in open rebellion against the Porte; not only has the pacha of the divan been expelled, but the aga, who commanded the citadel for the Turks, has been delivered up by the soldiers to the insurgents, who have decapitated him. Tripoli is now under a rebellious pacha, who is a creature of Dgezzar; who has lately ordered him to protect the pilgrims from Mecca. In a word, all Syria is with Dgezzar, and the Ottomans are as much detested here as in Egypt. The Mutuales live peaceably in their villages; they have, however, been obliged to retire from the borders of the sea. Aboumarak is now at the last extremity: this man is equally inconsiderate and cruel, and is surpassed only by Dgezzar. The Christians are even more in dread of them, and tremble for their future situation. The monks of the convent of Jaffa have withdrawn to Jerusalem. The 21st of November I quitted Acre. As the winds were unfavourable to a voyage to Jaffa, I set sail for Zante, where I arrived the 4th December. I landed the same day, but the ship's company were put under quarantine. I repaired to the house of the French commissary, escorted by the officers of health. I soon learned that the isle and the republic were split into different parties, and that even the tranquillity of the place was threatened. I assembled the members of the constituted authorities, and the principal persons of the town, at the house of the governor M. de Calishipode. After having represented to them the interest which the first consul took in their welfare, I induced them to lay aside that spirit of party which distracted them, and to wait without passion, and in silence, the new constitution. These few words were received with enthusiasm, and all of them exclaimed, "France for ever! Buonaparté for ever!" These cries were reiterated on my going out by more than 4,000 men, who followed me to the door. The governor and the Russian commandant were alarmed at it; and I learned by the French commissary, on the following day, that two of the leading men were sent to prison, but that on his solicitations, and fearful of my reproaches, they were set at liberty in the course of the night. I went to the Conciergerie, and had the governor brought there. I spoke to him strongly on the irregularity of his conduct: he was alarmed, and promised that he would look upon those who cried out, "Live the first consul!" as good citizens, and should in future treat them as such. As he sent, in the course of the night, a courier to his government, and I had reason to believe he had made a wrong report, I immediately wrote to the charge d'affaires of the republic at Corfou, to inform him what had passed, and that I was setting off for Messina. I do not stray from the truth in assuring you, that the islands of the Ionian Sea will declare themselves French as soon as an opportunity shall offer itself.

English army in Egypt.—That army commanded by general Stuart, consists of 4,430 men; they wholly and exclusively occupy Alexandria and the neighbouring forts. The Turks, who formed the garrison of some of these forts, have been removed. Lately the English general has occupied Demanhour with 100 infantry, and 100 horse, under the pretext of curbing the Arabs. The English have made no necessary works for the maintenance of the forts; the palisades are almost entirely destroyed, and the branches occasioned by the rains have very much damaged all the new fortifications. They occupy none of the works which are beyond the line of the Arabs, and all the redoubts which existed at the departure of the French army are destroyed. The pacha of Cairo furnishes to the English army corn, rice, wood, and provisions, without any payment. The consumption is treble what it should be: they commit great waste. A great misunderstanding reigns between general Stuart and the pacha.

State of the Army.—Dillon's regiment; emigrants 450; British Chasseurs; emigrants 550; Role's regiment; Swiss, 600; Wetteville's regiment, Swiss 680: the 10th reg. of infantry English 600; the 61st reg. of infantry, English 650, the 88th reg. of infantry, English 400; dragoons of the 26th light, English 350; artillery English 150; total 4430.—The Turkish army.—Muhammed, pacha of Cairo, who has taken, it is not known why, the title of viceroy of Egypt, does not command the troops in person. Muhammed Aly-Serr-Chersme, who had the command since my arrival, was killed before Gaza; they are now under the orders of Jussef Kiabia. Tair is pacha of the Arnaoutes, who compose the greatest part of this army, amounting to about 16,000 men. They from time to time receive reinforcements. Chourchid-Amid, a pacha of two tails, is at Alexandria with 600 men, who occupy no fortification. This pacha is, as one may say, a prisoner with the English. The Turkish army consists of 7,640 men, and that of the Arnאות of 8,500, making a whole of 16,140. It is useless to add, that this is not an army: they are men ill armed, without discipline, without confidence in their chiefs, and enervated by excessive debauchery. The chiefs are in every thing like their soldiers; ignorant even of the first principles of the military art; and uniformly actuated by the love of wealth, they think of nothing but of obtaining it, and of finding the means of carrying it off in safety. Six thousand French would at present be enough to conquer Egypt.

Army of the Mamelukes.—The army of the beys is composed of 3,000 Mamelukes, of 3,500 Arabs of the tribe of Ababde of Chark, and of 3,500 of the tribe of Binialy. Muhammed Bey Elfy married the daughter of the cheik of the first, and Maarzouk Bey, son of Ibrahim Bey, the daughter of the cheik of the tribe of Binialy. The power in this army is divided between Ibrahim Bey, who is the chief, Eley Bey, and Osman Bey, who has succeeded Murad Bey. Their head-quarters are at Djergé. They have eighty French deserters, which form a small corps of artillery. To the present time they have beat the Turks in every action, and the Egyptians prefer them to the Osmanlis. The whole of upper Egypt has submitted to them.

Syria.—Acre. The body of this place has been repaired; the port has been covered with a small horned work, and the tower of the angle by a half-moon. They have likewise made a small fleche, in front of the palace of the Pacha. All the works are well kept. The weakest part is that towards the sea, and particularly the point which defends the entrance of the port. The forces of Dgezzar are at present 13 or 14,000 men, of which 9,000 are employed at the siege of Jaffa. Jerusalem and Nazareth are occupied by the troops of the Pacha of Acre. The Naplonsains serve against Aboumarsk—Jaffa. The vizier, after the taking of Egypt, caused the body of the place to be re-constructed, which is at present in a very good state. Aboumarak, pacha of Palestine, who defends this place, has a garrison of 4,000 men. Gaza is occupied by 400 troops of Aboumarak. The emir of the druses has refused to Dgezzar his annual contribution, and has raised a respectable armament. The pacha waits till the fall of Jaffa to attack him. The English wished to interfere as mediators between the emir and Dgezzar, but the last refused their mediation. The Port has, at this moment, little connexion with Syria.

No. 2.—Acts of the Government. Decree of the Government of the 21st February.

The Government of the Republic decrees, that a View of the present situation of the republic shall be carried to the legislative body by the messengers of the government, and also the same be inserted in the bulletin of the laws. (Signed) BUONAPARTE, First Consul.

VIEW OF THE STATE OF THE REPUBLIC.

Events have neither frustrated the wishes nor disappointed the expectations of government. The legislative body, on resuming its labours, has the satisfaction of finding the republic strengthened by the union of its citizens, more active in its pursuits of industry, and more confident in its prospects of prosperity.

The execution of the Concordat, from which the enemies of public order still ventured to conceive criminal hopes, has almost every where produced the most beneficial effects. The principles of an enlightened religion, the voice of the sovereign pontiff, the firmness and perseverance of government, have triumphed over every obstacle. Mutual sacrifices have reunited the ministers of religion; enlightened reason and cordial unanimity have revived the Gallican church; and the happiest change has already manifested itself in the public morals. Every day produces a more perfect coincidence of opinion and of sentiment. Childhood is more docile to the instructions of parents, and youth more submissive to the authority of magistrates. The conscription goes on smoothly in those very places where the mere name of conscription was sufficient to stimulate insurrection, and to serve the country is now become a duty of religion.

In those departments which the first consul visited, he every where received pledges and observed proofs of a return to those principles which constitute the strength and the happiness of society.

In the departments of the Eure, the lower Seine, the Oise, the inhabitants proudly exult in the national glory. They are sensible to their full extent of the advantages of equality. They hail with blessings the restoration of peace; they receive with blessings the re-establishment of public worship. These are the ties that bind down every heart to the state and the constitution.

It is the duty of government to cherish and direct these auspicious dispositions.

Other forms of worship have been regularly organised. Consistories are formed of enlightened citizens, tried and acknowledged defenders of public order, of civil and religious liberty.

Public instruction, that indispensable support of society, is every where sought after with eagerness and alacrity. Several lyceums have already been opened; already, as government had well foreseen, a number of private schools aspire to the rank of the secondary schools. The whole body of citizens show their conviction that there can be no happiness without the light of education; that, without talents and information, there can be no equality but that of misery and servitude.

A military school is opened to receive the young defenders of the country. Soldiers, they will learn to support the life of camps, and endure the fatigues of war. By long habits of obedience they will be trained up to the art of commanding, and they will bring to the armies courage and discipline, united with talents and with knowledge.

In the lyceums, as well as in the military school, the youth of the departments newly incorporated with the republic, will live mingled without any distinction with the youth of Old France. From this confusion of minds and manners, from this communication of habits and of dispositions, from this commixture of interests, of projects, and of hopes, will spring up that fraternity, which of several nations will make but one people, destined by their position, by their courage, and by their virtues, to form the centre of union, and the example of Europe.

The national institute, which has its ascendancy over public instruction, has received a more useful direction, and henceforward will exert a more active influence over the national character, over the language of the country, and over the arts, sciences, and literature.

In order to insure the stability of our infant institutions, in order to remove from the eyes of the public the spectre of discord which appeared to them in the periodical return of elections to the supreme magistracy, the friends of the country called for the consulate for life to be granted to the first magistrate. The people upon being consulted, answered to their call, and the senate proclaimed the will of the people.

The system of lists of eligibility could no resist the test of experience, and the force of public opinion.

The organisation of the senate was incomplete.

The national justice was left to be administered by tribunals without harmony, and without dependence on each other. There was no authority to protect or to reform them; no tie of restraint to subject them to one common discipline.

In fine, there was wanting to France a power to reclaim justice itself, the power of granting pardon. How often these twelve years past has that power been implored! How many unfortunates have fallen the victims of an inflexible sternness with which wise men reproached our laws? How many criminals have been acquitted through a false indulgence, because our punishments were too severe!

A senatus-consultum has restored to the people the exercise of those rights which the constituent assembly had acknowledged; but it has restored them surrounded with precautions which preserve the people from errors or precipitation in their choice; with precautions which guard the influence of property, and the preponderance of enlightened talents.

Should the first magistracy become vacant, the duties and the proceedings of the senate are traced out for such an emergency: forms of certain operation guide the wisdom and the liberty of their choice; and the quick decision of that choice deprives ambition of the means of conspiring, and anarchy of the means of destroying.

The cement of time will every day consolidate, more and more, this tutelary institution. It will be not only the term of all inquietudes, and the object of all hopes, but likewise the fairest recompenses that can be held out to public services and public virtues.

Justice embraces all the tribunals with one common bond. They have each their subordinate station and their censor: they are always free in the exercise of their functions; always independent of power, but never independent of the laws.

The privilege of granting pardon when the interest of the republic requires it, or when circumstances prescribe indulgence, is entrusted to the hands of the first magistrate; but it is only confided to him under the guard of justice itself; he is to exercise it only under the eyes of a council, and after having consulted the severest oracles of the law.

If institutions be appreciated by their effects, never was any institution more important in its result than the organic senatus-consultum. From that moment the French people began to confide in their destiny; property began to resume its former value, and speculations of distant view to be multiplied;—until that moment every thing seemed to float in uncertainty. The present moment was cherished: the next was a subject of alarm, and the enemies of the country continued to cherish hopes. Since that moment they are reduced to impotence and to detestation.

The island of Elba has been ceded to France: that acquisition gives her a mild and industrious people; two fine ports, a productive and precious mine: but being separated from France, it could not be intimately united with any of her departments, or subjected to the regulations of a common administration. Principles have been made to bend to the necessity of circumstances; exceptions have been established for the island of Elba, which its position and the public interest prescribed.

The application of the sovereign, the will of the people, and the necessity of existing circumstances, had placed Piedmont under the power of France. Amidst the nations that surrounded it, with the elements that composed its population, Piedmont was unable to support either the weight of its own independence, or the expenses of a monarchy. United to France, it will reap the benefits of its security, and its greatness; its laborious and enlightened citizens will exert their industry and their talents in the bosom of the arts, and under the shade of peace.

Security and tranquillity prevail in the interior of France. The vigilance of the magistracy, the severity of justice, and a gendarmerie vigorously appointed, and directed by a commander grown grey in the career of honour, has every where impressed terror on the minds and the attempts of the brigands.

Private interest has raised itself to a sentiment of public interest. Citizens have not shrunk from attacking those whom they formerly dreaded, even when they were chained down at the foot of the tribunals of justice. Whole communes have taken up arms and destroyed the brigands. Foreigners envy the security of our public roads, and that public force, which, though often invisible, is always present, attend on their footsteps, and watch for their protection, without any necessity of imploring its aid.

During the course of a difficult year, amidst the exigences of a general security, the poor looked with confidence to the care of government. They supported with courage the privations which necessity imposed; and they received with gratitude the succours which they were taught to expect.

The crime of forgery is no longer encouraged by the hope of impunity. The zeal of the tribunals appointed to prosecute and punish it, and the just severity of the laws, have at length checked the progress of an evil which threatened both the public treasure, and the fortunes of individuals.

Our cultivation daily improves, and defies the most boasted agricultural systems of Europe. In every department are to be found enlightened farmers, who afford both instruction and example.

Premiums have been held out for improving the breed of horses; and similar encouragements are proposed for the improvement of wool by the introduction of a foreign breed of sheep. Zealous administrators are every where occupied in tracing out and revealing the richness of our soil, and in disseminating the useful plans and the happy results which experience daily discovers.

Our manufactures multiply and receive new spirit and improvement. While they emulate each, they will soon, no doubt, become the rivals of the most renowned manufactures of foreign countries. Henceforth there will be nothing wanting to their prosperity but capitals less dearly purchased. But capitalists begin already to give up the hazardous speculations of stock-jobbing, and devote their attention to the improvement of land, and the pursuit of useful enterprises. More than twenty thousand workmen, who were dispersed throughout Europe, have been recalled by the attention and by the favours of government, and will soon be restored to our manufactures.

Among our manufactures there is one which is almost peculiar to France, which Colbert kindled up by his genius. It was buried under the ruins of Lyons: government has exerted all its endeavours to extricate it. Lyons is again restored to splendor and opulence; already do its manufactures impose a tribute on the luxury of Europe. But the principle of their success is to be found in the luxury of France itself; it is in the changefulness of our taste, and the mutability of our fashions, that foreign luxury must look for its aliment; it is it that gives motion and life to an immense population, who, without that encouragement, must lose itself in corruption and misery.

There will soon be at Compeigne, there will soon arise on the confines of La Vendée, a number of Prytanées, where our youth will be brought up in habits of industry, and instructed in the mechanical arts. From that source our dock-yards and our manufactures will one day draw inspectors to direct their labours.

Fourteen millions arising out of the barrier tax, and ten millions out of the extraordinaries, have been employed during the year 10 in improving the public roads, in keeping up the old communications. New communications have also been opened. The Simplon, Mount-Cenis, and Mount-Genèvre, will soon open a triple and easy access to Italy—a high road will lead from Genoa to Marseilles—a road is chalked out from Saint Esprit to Gap—another from Rennes to Brest, through Pontivy. At Pontivy establishments are to be raised which will have a powerful influence over the public mind of the departments of which ci-devant Brittany was composed—a canal will introduce into it new sources of commerce and prosperity.

On the banks of the Rhine from Bingen to Coblenz, a necessary road is cut through inaccessible rocks. The neighbouring communes associate their labours to the sacrifices of the public treasury, and the people of the other bank, who ridiculed the folly of the enterprise, are astonished and confounded at the rapidity of the execution.

A great number of workmen are employed on the canal of Saint Quintin. The canal of Ourcq is opened, and soon will Paris people enjoy the benefit of its waters, and the salubrity and the embellishments which they promise. The canal intended to unite the navigation of the Seine and the Saone, of the Danube and the Rhine, is almost entirely finished as far as Dole; and the public treasury already receives in the increased price of wool, to which that canal opens the approach, a sum equal to that which it has furnished for the continuance of the work. The canals of Argues, Mortes, and the Rhone, the draining of the marshes of the Lower Charente, are begun, and will open up new channels of commerce, and afford new lands for cultivation. Works are going forward for the reparation of the dykes of the isle of Cadsand, of Ostend, of the Cotes du Nord, and the re-establishment of the navigation of our rivers. This navigation is no longer given up solely to the labours and the cares of government. The owners of boats plying on these rivers have already felt that it was their patrimony, and they fix on themselves the taxes by which the works are to be kept in proper repair. On the ocean forts are erecting to cover the roads of the isle of Aix, and to protect the vessels of the republic. Every where funds are raised for the reparation and improvement of our ports. A new bason and locked sluices will terminate the harbour of Havre, and will form an excellent port for the commerce of La Manche. A company of pilots is formed to secure the safe navigation of l'Escaut, and to free foreign pilots from the danger to which an unknown navigation must expose them.

At Antwerp labours are begun which will have the effect of restoring to its commerce its ancient celebrity; and the government has in contemplation a plan for forming canals to unite the navigation of the Escaut, the Meuse, and the Rhine, to give to our docks those materials of wood which grows in our own soil, and to our manufactures a perfection which the manufacturers of other countries dispute with us on our own territory.

The islands of Martinique, Tobago, and St. Lucie, have been restored to us with all the elements of prosperity. Guadaloupe, reconquered and pacified, returns to cultivation. Guiana arises from a long protracted infancy, and assumes a flourishing appearance.

St. Domingo had submitted, and the author of its troubles was in France. Every thing announced the return of prosperity, but a cruel malady delivered it up to new miseries. At length the scourge which desolated our army has ceased its ravages. The forces which now are on the island, and those which will speedily arrive from our different ports, guarantee the prospect of its speedy return to peace and to commercial pursuits.

Vessels are setting sail for the isles of France and Reunion, and for India.

Our maritime commerce is seeking to renew its ancient connexions, to form new relations; and by these efforts it gains new strength. Already happy experience and wise encouragements have re-animated a spirit for engaging in the fishery which was long the patrimony of France. Commercial expeditions still more important are formed or projected for the West India colonies, the isle of France, and the East Indies.

Marseilles resumes in the Mediterranean its ancient ascendancy.

Chambers of commerce have been restored in the cities where they formerly existed. New ones have been established in those places, which, by the extent of their operations and the importance of their manufactures, have appeared to deserve them. In these associations, formed by persons whose situation entitles them to the honour of choosing the members, the spirit as well as the science of commerce will revive. There its interests will be developed, inseparable from the interests of the state. The merchant will there learn to place, in preference to riches, the consideration which honours them, and before the enjoyments of a vain luxury, that wise economy which fixes the esteem of his fellow-citizens and the confidence of strangers.

Deputies, chosen from the different chambers, will discuss, in the presence of government, the interests of commerce and manufactures, and the laws and regulations which circumstances may require.

In our forces, by sea and land, instruction and the love of discipline are sedulously inculcated. Responsibility becomes more rigid in our military corps. An economical administration has succeeded to the dilapidating system of contracts. The soldier, better fed and better clothed, understands economy, and his savings, which he throws into the common stock, attach him to his standard as well as to his family.

Every branch of our finances becomes more productive. The collection of direct contribution is less rigorous with regard to the contributors. In the year 6 it was reckoned that about fifty millions were in the hands of the collectors of taxes, and payments were three or four years in arrear. At this moment the sum in the hands of the collectors is not above three millions, and the contributions are paid even before they are due.

All the rules which have been made, and all the plans of administration which have been formed, give a produce still increasing. The rules applicable to the registering of commercial transactions are productive to a degree which attests the rapid movements of capital and the multiplicity of business which is transacted.

In the midst of so many signs of prosperity, the excess of the direct contributions is still made a ground of complaint. The government has learnt from every one versed in the principles of taxation, that the surcharge consisted chiefly in the inequality of the mode in which the taxes were imposed. Measures have been taken, and are carrying into effect, to ascertain the real inequalities which exist in the different departments. In the course of the year 12, regular and simultaneous operations will have ascertained what is the relation which ought to exist betwixt the contributions of the different departments, and what in each department is the just rate of the land tax. The moment that a certain result has been fixed, the government will give orders for those alterations which justice requires. But in the course of this year, and without waiting for those results, it will propose an important diminution in the land tax. Innovations are still proposed in our financial system; but every change is an evil, if it cannot be satisfactorily demonstrated that certain advantage would result from it. The government will seek from time and from discussions, weighed with all possible care, the maturity of these projects which inexperience often hazards; which they support by those past examples, the memory of which has been almost effaced from the public mind, and on the financial doctrines of a nation which, by unnatural and exaggerated efforts, has broke through every measure of public contribution and expenditure.

With an increase of revenue which no one ventured to calculate, extraordinary circumstances have led to wants which it was impossible to foresee. It was necessary to reconquer two of our colonies, and to re-establish in all the power and the government of the mother country. It was necessary, by means sudden and too extended to admit of rigid economy, to procure subsistence for the capital and several of the departments. At least, however, the success of the government has been equal to its efforts, and after these vast exertions, resources remain henceforth to guarantee the capital against the return of want, and to disconcert the projects of monopoly.

In the methodized statement of the minister of finance will be found a general view of the annual contributions and the different branches of the public revenue, what was their amount during the last year, what prospect of amelioration existed; whether from the mode of administration or the progress of public prosperity; what have been in the different departments of the ministry, the elements of expenditure during the year 10; what are the sums still remaining to be paid for that and former years; what resources exist to cover them, whether arising from outstanding arrears of taxes, or from the extraordinary funds appropriated to pay off the debts contracted in these years, and which have not yet been exhausted; what is the actual amount of the public debt; what has been its increase, how it has been diminished by natural causes, and how its extinction has been affected by the sinking fund. In the account of the minister of the public treasury will be seen a statement of the receipts, the payments of the year 10; what belongs to the different branches of the revenue; what is chargeable in each year and on each part of the administration. The united accounts of the two ministers will form a complete table of our financial situation. The government hold up with equal satisfaction the picture which it presents to its friends and its detractors, to citizens and to foreigners. After authorizing the foreseen expense of the year

12, and appropriating the necessary revenue, objects of the greatest interest will occupy the attention of the legislative body. It is necessary to introduce a change into our system of coinage. The custom-house duties must be re-organized, so as more effectually to check the progress of contraband trade. It is at length essential to give to France that civil code so long promised and so long expected.

Above all, projects of laws have been formed under the observation of government, and matured in conferences where commissions from the council of state and the tribunate were animated only by the love of truth and regard for the public interest. The same sentiments, the same principles will guide the deliberation of the legislators, and secure to the republic the wisdom and the impartiality of the laws which are adopted.

On the continent, every thing offers us pledges of repose and tranquillity. The Italian republic, since the proceedings at Lyons, has been daily strengthening itself by the more intimate union of the people of whom it is composed. The happy harmony among the authorities by which it is governed, its internal administration, its military force, already give it the character and the attitude of a state long established; and if wisdom preserve them, they guarantee to it a destiny of uninterrupted prosperity. Liguria, placed under a mixed constitution, sees at its head, and in the bosom of its authorities, all those of its citizens, the most estimable for their virtues, by their illumination and their fortune. New shocks have convulsed the Helvetic republic. The government owed its support to neighbours, whose repose was essential to the repose of France, and it will use every exertion to ensure the success of its mediation, and with it the happiness of a people whose position, whose habits, and whose interests, make it the necessary ally of France. Batavia successively takes possession of the colonies which the peace restored to her. She will ever remember that France must ever be her most useful friend or her most destructive foe.

In Germany the last stipulations of the treaty of Luneville are carrying into effect. Prussia, Bavaria, all the secular princes who had possessions on the left bank of the Rhine, will obtain on the right bank suitable indemnities. The house of Austria finds in the bishopricks of Salzburgh, Aischtett, Trent, and Brixen, and the greatest part of Pau, more than it had lost in Tuscany. Thus, by the happy co-operation of France and Russia, all permanent interests are conciliated, and from the bosom of that tempest which seemed ready to overwhelm it, the Germanic empire, that empire so necessary to the equilibrium and the repose of Europe, rises more powerful, composed of elements more homogeneous, better combined and more adapted to the circumstances and opinions of the present age. A French ambassador is at Constantinople, charged with renewing and fortifying the ties which attach us to a power which seems to be threatened with destruction, but which it is our interest to sustain, and to support the foundations by which it is upheld. The British forces are still in Alexandria and Malta. The government had a fair right of complaint, but it has received intelligence that the vessels which are to convey them to Europe are already in the Mediterranean.

The government guarantees to the nation the peace of the continent, and it is permitted to entertain a hope of the continuance of maritime peace. This peace is the want, as well as the desire of all nations. For its preservation, the government will do every thing compatible with national honour, essentially connected with the strict execution of the treaties.

But in England, two parties maintain a contest for power. One of those parties has concluded peace, and appears desirous of maintaining it. The other has taken an oath of eternal hatred to France. Hence that fluctuation of opinion and of counsels which prevail. Hence that attitude, at the same time pacific and menacing.

While this contest of parties continue, measures of precaution are what the government is called upon to adopt. Five hundred thousand men ought to be, and shall be ready to undertake its defence, and avenge its injuries. Strange necessity which miserable passions impose on two nations, whom interest and inclination mutually prompt to the cultivation of peace. Whatever success intrigues may experience in London, no other people will be involved in new combination—the government says, with conscious pride, that England alone cannot maintain a struggle against France. But we have better hopes, and we believe that in the British cabinet nothing will be listened to but the counsels of wisdom and the voice of humanity. Yes, doubtless, the peace will daily be more consolidated. The relation of the two governments will assume that character of good-will which is suitable to their mutual interests. A happy repose will bury the recollection of the long calamities of a disastrous war, and France and England, rendering their happiness reciprocal, will deserve the gratitude of the whole world.

By order of the First Consul,

The Secretary of State, H. B. MARET.

No. 3.—Letter from Citizen Talleyrand to Citizen Fauvelet at Dublin, dated Paris, 26 Brumaire, 10th year, (17th November 1802.)

I forward to you, citizen, a series of questions, concerning which I am desirous of having your answers. You will have the goodness to place them opposite the questions on the same sheet of paper, doubled in two, similar to the one which I have the honour to send to you. I shall be obliged to you to send me this paper as soon as possible, without, however, suffering your too great haste to be prejudicial to your accuracy. If you are doubtful upon any point, you will have the goodness to mention it. You will probably find no difficulty in consulting with some well informed merchants, or clerks in the Custom house, who you think may have it in their power to give you some positive information, and you will declare the sources from whence you have drawn that information. You will not consider this business as forming a part of your official correspondence. You must not number it, but you must content yourself with putting at the top of it, as in the projet which I enclose to you, Private Correspondence.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 4.—Private Correspondence. Questions.

1. What number of vessels have entered and cleared out of the ports within your district within each year from 1792 to 1801 inclusive?—2. What is their tonnage or their admeasurement in sea tons of 2,000 4 P. S.?—3. Under what flag do they navigate?—4. From whence they come?—5. Whither bound?—6. With what merchandize freighted?—7. What was the price of freight to the principal ports of Europe, each sea ton of 2,000 4 P. S.?—8. What French productions are most in request in the market of the town where you reside, as well as of the other considerable towns in your district?—9. What is the merchandize which can be exported to France with greater advantage from the said markets than from any other?—10. What are the course of exchange, and the current prices of merchandize from three months to three months from the year 1792 to 1801?—11. You are required to furnish a plan of the ports of your district, with a specification of the soundings for mooring vessels.—12. If no plan of the ports can be procured, you are to point out with what wind vessels can come in and go out, and what is the greatest draught of water with which vessels can enter therein deeply laden?—13. What are the principal commercial houses?—If the heads of these house are foreigners, you are to point out of what country they are; and in all cases you are to state with what countries they are principally connected, and what is their chief line of commerce.—14. What is the usual course of exchange?—15. Whether there is a public bank, and what is its organization?—16. Whether there are any insurance companies, public or private, and what are their customs and rules, and the prices of insurance, for European and long voyages?—17. In case there exists any other public establishment which relates to commerce, you are to give every possible detail concerning it, especially in whatever regards manufactures and fisheries.—18. You are to point out the relative conformity of weights and measures with those of France, ancient and modern, as soon as you shall have obtained practical and exact information on those points.—19. You are to add to all this the most extensive information, as well general as particular, which you may be able to obtain from authority, especially with regard to commerce, and particularly respecting false accounts of purchases and sales of different merchandizes, in order to ascertain the expenses, rights, and local customs, in cases of purchases and sales.—20. Whether there are any fairs in your district; what species of traffic is carried on there, and to what amount?

No. 5.—Translation, from the Hamburgh Correspondenten of March 30th, 1803. The following article is inserted by desire.

For some months a war of newspapers and of the press has been kept up between France and England. This seemed merely the dying embers of an extinguished conflagration; the last consolation of a desperate party; the food of some low passions and a few hungry scribblers. The French government was far from attaching importance to such matters. Notwithstanding some difficulties in the complete execution of the treaty of Amiens, they still believed they might rely on the good faith of the British government, and directed their attention solely to the re-establishment of the colonies. Relying upon the sacredness of treaties, they securely dispersed the remains of the French naval force, which had been given a prey to the English fleet. In this situation, suddenly appeared a solemn message from the cabinet at St. James's, and informed all Europe that France was making considerable preparations in the ports of Holland and France; an address was voted by parliament, promising to the king of England such extraordinary means of defence as the security of the British empire and the honour of the three crowns might require.—From the sudden appearance of this message, people doubted whether it was the effect of treachery, of lunacy, or of weakness. Let any one cast his eye over the ports of France and Holland, where he will find only detached naval preparations destined for the colonies, and consisting only of one or two line-of-battle ships, and a few frigates. On the other hand, let him look at the ports of England, filled with a formidable naval force; on such a review one could be tempted to believe that the message of the king of England was mere irony, if such a farce were not unworthy the majesty of a government. If one considers the influence of factions in so free a country, one might suppose that the king of England had only had the weakness to yield, if weakness were compatible with the first quality of a king. In short, no rational motives remain to which it can be ascribed, except bad faith—except a sworn enmity to the French nation—except perfidy, and the desire of openly breaking a solemn treaty, for the sake of advantages which will be maintained, and the sacrifice of which the honour of France and the faith of treaties forbid.—When a man reads this message he thinks himself transported to the times of those treaties which the Vandals made with the degenerate Romans, when force usurped the place of right, and when, with a hasty appeal to arms, they insulted the antagonist they meant to attack. In the present state of civilization, there is a respect which a great monarch, which a polished people owe to themselves, were that respect no more than to seek a plausible pretext for an unjust war. But in this instance every thing is precipitate, and repugnant to decency and to justice. An eternal war would succeed a dreadful contest, and the more unjust the attack, the more irreconcilable would be its animosity.—Such a novelty would doubtless excite the disapprobation of Europe. While even the English, whose national pride had not entirely blinded them, sighed at this prospect, did the Times call the peace of Amiens an armistice, and in doing so, passed the severest satire on the government it defended; and the rapid fall of the national funds is the first prelude to the misfortunes which may follow as the revenge due for the wound given to all social rights.—The French are less intimidated than irritated by the threats of England. They have neither been dispirited by their reverses, nor elated by their victories; in a war to which there appeared no termination, they saw all Europe confederated against them. Their constancy, their courage, and the prompt activity of their government, brought it to a conclusion. This war would have a different object; France would contend for the liberty of the states of Europe, and the sacredness of their treaties: and if the English government, be determined to make it a national war, perhaps her boasted formidable naval strength would not be sufficient to decide the result, and to secure the victory.—The French, strong in the justice of their cause, and the confidence they repose in their government do not dread the new expenses and new sacrifices which such a war might render necessary. Their system of finance is more simple and less artificial than that of London, and so much the more solid. It all lies in their soil and in their courage. On the first news of the English Message, all eyes were turned to the cabinet of the Thuilleries. As most trifling motions received a character of importance, its most unpremeditated words were eagerly caught up. Every one impatiently expected the assembly for the presentation of foreigners, which Madame Buonaparté holds once a month. Every one was prepared to draw some inference from it. It was as splendid as usual. The first consul made his appearance and said, on his entrance, to the English ambassador, who was standing beside M. Markoff, "We have been at war for twelve years. The king of England says that France is making immense naval preparations. He has been led into an error. In the French ports there are no preparations of any magnitude. The whole fleet is gone to St. Domingo and the colonies. With regard to the ports of Holland, to which the message likewise alludes, there are only the preparations for the expedition under general Victor, and all Europe knows its destination is for Louisiana. The king says farther, that between the cabinets of Paris and London differences continue. I know of none. It is true that England ought to have evacuated Malta, and Malta is not evacuated: and as his Britannic Majesty has bound himself by the most solemn treaty ever entered into, it is impossible to doubt of the speedy evacuation of that island: and," added the first consul, "those who would attempt to frighten the French people should know, that it is possible to kill, but not to intimidate them."—During the course of the evening, when the first consul happened to be near M. Markoff, he said to him, half aloud, "that the British minister wished to keep Malta for five years more. Such a proposal was insulting, and no treaties should be entered into, which it was not resolved to observe." At the conclusion of the assembly, when the English ambassador was about to retire, the first consul said to him, "Madame the duchess of Dorset has spent the unpleasant part of the year at Paris. It is my sincere wish that she may also spend the agreeable season. But if it should happen that we really must go to war, the responsibility is exclusively with those who deny the validity of their own contracts, since they refuse to observe treaties which they had concluded."—These words of the first consul require no comment. They explain completely his present opinions, his past conduct, and his resolution for the future. It is sufficient to compare them with the tergiversations, the duplicity, the evasions, and the message, of the English government, in order to be enabled to decide on the justice of the dispute.

No. 6.—Letter from Spiridion Foresti to Lord Hawkesbury, dated Corfu, Dec. 10th, 1802.

My Lord;—The last letters from my agent at Zante furnish me with the information that the Cornelia French frigate, having on board Horatio Sebastiani, chief of brigade, and charged with a public mission on the part of the first consul of the French republic, came to anchor there on the 3rd instant. The envoy finding that a vessel coming from Alexandria was subject to a long quarantine, and could not be permitted to communicate freely with the shore, applied to the delegate of that island for permission to land, which being granted him, he was conducted to the delegate's apartment. He then requested that a meeting of the three orders might be called, which was also complied with, and twelve persons, four of each order, met in the delegate's house. The envoy Sebastiani then harangued them nearly in the terms of the address, which I have herewith the honour of inclosing to your lordship. His speech, however contained some additional observations, importing, that Buonaparté had been the first to break the chains of the islanders. When he had done speaking, a tumultuous cry was uttered, of "Viva la Liberta! Viva l'Uguaglianza."

Before his departure, however, he caused to be forwarded to the delegate of Cephalonia, and to the senate of Corfu, copies of the enclosed address, expressing a wish that it might be generally circulated among the people of each island. I have, &c.

No. 7.—Letter from Spiridion Foresti to lord Hawkesbury, dated Corfu, Jan. 2th, 1803,

My Lord;—In my letter of the 10th ultimo, your lordship will perceive that I inserted the arrival of the Cornelia French frigate at Zante, and that Horatio Sebastiani harangued the people of that island. At that time I was not in possession of his exact oration, but since then the delegate of Zante transmitted the speech to the senate of Corfu; a copy of which I beg leave to submit to your lordship's attention. M. Romieu, the French minister here, communicated to the prince of the senate, that the first consul of the French republic had taken under his protection the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman churches of this republic; and on the 19th December wrote to the vicar general of Corfu to inform him of the same; a copy of which permit me to inclose for your perusal. From the proceedings of the French commissary here, and those of the other islands, together with the disposition of the natives, I am afraid that this republic will be a constant theatre of French intrigue. The aforesaid commissaries occasion count Mocenigo and this government an infinite deal of trouble. I have, &c.

Horace Sebastiani, Chief of Brigade of a regiment of Dragoons, and Envoy of the First Consul in the Levant.

To his Excellency the Delegate of Zante.

Sir;—The first consul Buonaparté has charged me to visit these islands which compose your republic, and to assure the inhabitants that he takes a lively interest in their prosperity. I know that the difference of political opinions divides this rising republic into various parties, and that without the wise measures taken by your government, its tranquillity will be destroyed. I could wish you to make known to your administrators and fellow citizens how much the first consul wishes to see a stop put to those intestine divisions which afflict these islands. Your political independency has been guaranteed by France, Russia, and the Sublime Porte. These powerful nations, united together by the bonds of the truest friendship, are occupied in concert with your most enlightened and most virtuous fellow citizens, to give you a form of government suitable to your situation and the genius of your inhabitants. Wait with confidence and moderation the result of these important operations, and be assured that you will see the end of your ills and the beginning of your prosperity. All exaggerations of political opinions are inimical to the general prosperity. Absolute democracy, always tempestuous, sacrifices to vain chimeras the security, the property, civil liberty, and in short all that constitutes the happiness of a state: aristocracy which is not moderated is always tyrannical, and the elevation of a small number of families is preferred to talents and to virtue. In order that a government may be prosperous, it is necessary that it should have in its formation a happy combination of the advantages of different forms of government; the power and promptitude of monarchy, the vigilance and intelligence of aristocracy, and the vigour and elevation of democracy; that the citizen may find the security enjoyed under the first, the tranquillity of the second, and the equality of rights fixed by the laws which are found in the third. Recollect that the man who forms a part of society only preserves the liberty of doing that which is not prejudicial to the rights of others; and that equality only consists in the exact execution of the laws, and in the protection which they afford to every member of the political body. As the quarantine prevents communication, I beg you will communicate this my letter to all the authorities, and also to the principal inhabitants. I avail myself, &c.

Corfu, 29th Frimaire, 11th year of the French Republic.

The Adjutant Commandant Romieu, Commissary General of Commercial Relations, and Chargé d'Affaires to the Republic of the Seven Islands, to the Vicar General of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Churches at Corfu.

Mr. Vicar General;—I hasten to inform you, with the greatest joy, that I have just received the express orders of my government to place the church of the Roman religion in the republic of the Seven Islands under its special protection. I make this communication to the prince of the senate. This proof of the good will of the French towards this church, will be a powerful motive, Mr. Vicar General, for addressing through the faithful in your communion, the most ardent vows to Heaven for the prosperity of the French republic, and the preservation of the lives of its consuls, in the same way as the Roman churches practise in the French republic. With the &c.

DECLARATION.

His Majesty's earnest endeavours for the preservation of peace having failed of success, he entertains the fullest confidence that he shall receive the same support from his parliament, and that the same zeal and spirit will be manifested by his people, which he has experienced on every occasion when the honour of his crown has been attacked, or the essential interests of his dominions have been endangered.

During the whole course of the negotiations which led to the preliminary and definitive treaties of peace between his majesty and the French republic, it was his majesty's sincere desire, not only to put an end to the hostilities which subsisted between the two countries, but to adopt such measures, and to concur in such propositions, as might most effectually contribute to consolidate the general tranquillity of Europe. The same motives by which his majesty was actuated during the negotiations for peace, have since invariably governed his conduct. As soon as the treaty of Amiens was concluded, his majesty's courts were open to the people of France for every purpose of legal redress; all sequestrations were taken off their property; all prohibitions on their trade which had been imposed during the war were removed, and they were placed, in every respect, on the same footing with regard to commerce and intercourse, as the inhabitants of any other state in amity with his majesty, with which there existed no treaty of commerce.

To a system of conduct thus open, liberal, and friendly, the proceedings of the French government afford the most striking contrast. The prohibitions which had been placed on the commerce of his majesty's subjects during the war have been enforced with increased strictness and severity; violence has been offered in several instances to their vessels and their property; and, in no case, has justice been afforded to those who may have been aggrieved in consequence of such acts, nor has any satisfactory answer been given to the repeated representations made by his majesty's ministers or ambassador at Paris. Under such circumstances, when his majesty's subjects were not suffered to enjoy the common advantages of peace within the territories of the French republic, and the countries dependent upon it, the French government had recourse to the extraordinary measure of sending over to this country a number of persons for the professed purpose of residing in the most considerable sea-port towns of Great Britain and Ireland, in the character of commercial agents or consuls. These persons could have no pretensions to be acknowledged in that character, as the right of being so acknowledged, as well as all the privileges attached to such a situation, could only be derived from a commercial treaty; and as no treaty of that description was in existence between his majesty and the French republic.

There was consequently too much reason to suppose, that the real object of their mission was by no means of a commercial nature, and this suspicion was confirmed, not only by the circumstance that some of them were military men, but by the actual discovery that several of them were furnished with instructions to obtain the soundings of the harbours, and to procure military surveys of the places where it was intended they should reside. His majesty felt it to be his duty to prevent their departure to their respective places of destination, and represented to the French government the necessity of withdrawing them; and it cannot be denied that the circumstances under which they were sent, and the instructions which were given to them, ought to be considered as decisive indications of the dispositions and intentions of the government by whom they were employed.

The conduct of the French government, with respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, must therefore be considered as ill suited to a state of peace, and their proceedings in their more general political relations, as well as in those which immediately concern his majesty's dominions, appear to have been altogether inconsistent with every principle of good-faith, moderation, and justice. His majesty had entertained hopes, in consequence of the repeated assurances and professions of the French government, that they might have been induced to adopt a system of policy which, if it had not inspired other powers with confidence, might at least have allayed their jealousies. If the French government had really appeared to be actuated by a due attention to such a system; if their dispositions had proved to be essentially pacific, allowances would have been made for the situation in which a new government must be placed after so dreadful and extensive a convulsion as that which has been produced by the French revolution. But his majesty has unfortunately had too much reason to observe and to lament that the system of violence, aggression, and aggrandizement, which characterized the proceedings of the different governments of France during the war, has been continued with as little disguise since its termination. They have continued to keep a French army in Holland against the will, and in defiance of the remonstrances of the Batavian government, and in repugnance to the letter of three solemn treaties. They have in a period of peace, invaded the territory, and violated the independence of the Swiss nation, in defiance of the treaty of Luneville, which had stipulated the independence of their territory, and the right of the inhabitants to choose their own form of government. They have annexed to the dominions of France, Piedmont, Parma, and Placentia, and the island of Elba, without allotting any provision to the king of Sardinia, whom they have despoiled of the most valuable part of his territory, though they were bound, by a solemn engagement to the emperor of Russia, to attend to his interests and to provide for his establishment. It may, indeed, with truth be asserted, that the period which has elapsed since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, has been marked with one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult, on the part of the French government.

In the month of October last, his majesty was induced, in consequence of the earnest solicitation of the Swiss nation, to make an effort, by a representation to the French government, to avert the evils which were then impending over that country. This representation was couched in the most temperate terms; and measures were taken by his majesty for ascertaining, under the circumstances which then existed, the real situation and wishes of the Swiss cantons, as well as the sentiments of the other cabinets of Europe. His majesty learned, however, with the utmost regret, that no disposition to counteract these repeated infractions of treaties and acts of violence, was manifested by any of the powers most immediately interested in preventing them; and his majesty therefore felt that, with respect to these objects, his single efforts could not be expected to produce any considerable advantage to those in whose favour they might be exerted.

It was about this time that the French government first distinctly advanced the principle, that his majesty had no right to complain of the conduct, or to interfere with the proceedings, of France, on any point which did not form a part of the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens. That treaty was unquestionably founded upon the same principle as every other antecedent treaty or convention, on the assumption of the state of possession and of engagements subsisting at the time of its conclusion: and if that state of possession and of engagements is materially affected by the voluntary act of any of the parties, so as to prejudice the condition on which the other party has entered into the contract, the change, so made, may be considered as operating virtually as a breach of the treaty itself, and as giving the party aggrieved a right to demand satisfaction or compensation for any substantial difference which such acts may have effected in their relative situations; but whatever may be the principle on which the treaty is to be considered as founded, there is indisputably a general law of nations, which, though liable to be limited, explained, or restrained by conventional law, is antecedent to it, and is that law or rule of conduct to which all sovereigns and states have been accustomed to appeal, where conventional law is admitted to have been silent. The treaty of Amiens, and every other treaty, in providing for the objects to which it is particularly directed, does not therefore assume or imply an indifference to all other objects which are not specified in its stipulations, much less does it adjudge them to be of a nature to be left to the will and caprice of the violent and the powerful. The justice of the cause is alone a sufficient ground to warrant the interposition of any of the powers of Europe in the differences which may arise between other states, and the application and extent of that just interposition is to be determined solely by considerations of prudence. These principles can admit of no dispute; but if the new and extraordinary pretension advanced by the French government, to exclude his majesty from any right to interfere with respect to the concerns of other powers, unless they made a specific part of the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens, was that which it was possible to maintain, those powers would have a right, at least, to claim the benefit of this principle, in every case of difference between the two countries. The indignation of all Europe must surely then be excited by the declarations of the French government, that, in the event of hostilities, these very powers who were no parties to the treaty of Amiens, and who were not allowed to derive any advantage from the remonstrances of his majesty in their behalf, are nevertheless to be made the victims of a war which is alleged to arise out of the same treaty, and are to be sacrificed in a contest which they not only have not occasioned, but which they have had no means whatever of preventing.

His majesty judged it most expedient, under the circumstances which then affected Europe, to abstain from a recurrence to hostilities on account of the views of ambition and acts of aggression manifested by France on the continent; yet an experience of the character and dispositions of the French government could not fail to impress his majesty with a sense of the necessity of increased vigilance in guarding the rights and dignity of his crown, and in protecting the interests of his people.

Whilst his majesty was actuated by these sentiments, he was called upon by the French government to evacuate the island of Malta. His majesty had manifested, from the moment of the signature of the definitive treaty, an anxious disposition to carry into full effect the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens relative to that island. As soon as he was informed that an election of a grand master had taken place, under the auspices of the emperor of Russia, and that it had been agreed by the different priories assembled at St.

Petersburgh to acknowledge the person whom the court of Rome should select out of those who had been named by them to be grand master of the order of St. John, his majesty proposed to the French government, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise in the execution of the arrangement, to acknowledge that election to be valid. And when in the month of August, the French government applied to his majesty to permit the Neapolitan troops to be sent to the island of Malta, as a preliminary measure for preventing any unnecessary delay, his majesty consented without hesitation to this proposal, and gave directions for the admission of the Neapolitan troops into the island. His majesty had thus shown his disposition not only to throw no obstacle in the way of the execution of the treaty, but on the contrary, to facilitate the execution of it by every means in his power. His majesty cannot, however, admit that at any period since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens the French government have had a right to call upon him, in conformity to the stipulations of that treaty, to withdraw his forces from the island of Malta. At the time when this demand was made by the French government, several of the most important stipulations of the arrangement respecting Malta remained unexecuted: the election of a grand master had not been carried into effect. The tenth article had stipulated that the independence of the island should be placed under the guarantee and protection of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. The emperor of Germany had acceded to the guarantee, but only on condition of a like accession on the part of the other powers specified in the article. The emperor of Russia had refused his accession, except on the condition that the Maltese langue should be abrogated; and the king of Prussia had given no answer whatever to the application which had been made to him to accede to the arrangement. But the fundamental principle, upon the existence of which depended the execution of the other parts of the article, had been defeated by the changes which had taken place in the constitution of the order since the conclusion of the treaty of peace. It was to the order of St. John of Jerusalem that his majesty was, by the first stipulation of the tenth article, bound to restore the island of Malta. The order is defined to consist of those languages which were in existence at the time of the conclusion of the treaty: the three French langues having been abolished, and a Maltese langue added to the institution. The order consisted, therefore, at that time, of the following langues, viz. the langues of Arragon, Castile, Germany, Bavaria, and Russia. Since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, the langues of Arragon and Castile have been separated from the order by Spain, a part of the Italian langue has been abolished by the annexation of Piedmont and Parma to France. There is strong reason to believe that it has been in contemplation to sequester the property of the Bavarian langue, and the intention has been avowed of keeping the Russian langues within the dominions of the emperor.

Under these circumstances the order of St. John cannot now be considered as that body to which, according to the stipulations of the treaty, the island was to be restored; and the funds indispensably necessary for its support, and for the maintenance of the independence of the island, have been nearly, if not wholly, sequestered. Even if this had arisen from circumstances which it was not in the power of any of the contracting parties to the treaty to control, his majesty would nevertheless have had a right to defer the evacuation of the island by his forces, until such time as an equivalent arrangement had been concluded for the preservation of the independence of the order and of the island. But if these changes have taken place in consequence of any acts of the other parties to the treaty; if the French government shall appear to have proceeded upon a system of rendering the order whose independence they had stipulated, incapable of maintaining that independence, his majesty's right to continue in the occupation of the island under such circumstances, will hardly be contested. It is indisputable that the revenues of the two Spanish langues have been withdrawn from the order by his Catholic majesty; a part of the Italian langue has in fact been abolished by France, through the unjust annexation of Piedmont, and Parma, and Placentia, to the French territory. The elector of Bavaria has been instigated by the French government to sequester the property of the order within his territories; and it is certain that they have not only sanctioned but encouraged the idea of the propriety of separating the Russian langues from the remainder of the order.

As the conduct of the governments of France and Spain have, therefore, in some instances directly, and in others indirectly, contributed to the changes which have taken place in the order, and thus destroyed its means of supporting its independence, it is to those governments, and not to his majesty, that the non-execution of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens must be ascribed.

Such would be the just conclusion if the tenth article of that treaty were considered as an arrangement by itself. It must be observed, however, that this article forms a part only of a treaty of peace, the whole of which is connected together, and the stipulations of which must, upon a principle common to all treaties, be construed as having a reference to each other.

His majesty was induced by the treaty of peace, to consent to abandon, and to restore to the order of St. John the island of Malta, on condition of its independence and neutrality. But a further condition which must necessarily be supposed to have had considerable influence with his majesty in inducing him to make so important a concession was the acquiescence of the French government in an arrangement for the security of the Levant, by the eighth and ninth articles in the treaty, stipulating the integrity of the Turkish empire, and the independence of the Ionian islands. His majesty has, however, since learnt, that the French government have entertained views hostile to both these objects; and that they have even suggested the idea of a partition of the Turkish empire. These views must now be manifest to all the world, from the official publication of the report of colonial Sebastiani; from the conduct of that officer, and of the other French agents in Egypt, Syria, and the Ionian islands, and from the distinct admission of the first consul himself, in his communication with lord Whitworth. His majesty was, therefore, warranted in considering it to be the determination of the French government, to violate those articles of the treaty of peace, which stipulated for the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire, and of the Ionian islands, and consequently he would not have been justified in evacuating the island of Malta, without receiving some other security, which might equally provide for these important objects. His majesty accordingly feels that he has an incontestible claim, in consequence of the conduct of France since the treaty of peace, and with reference to the objects which made part of the stipulations of that treaty, to refuse, under the present circumstances, to relinquish the possession of the island of Malta.

Yet notwithstanding this right so clear and so unquestionable, the alternative presented by the French government to his majesty, in language the most peremptory and menacing, was the evacuation of Malta, or the renewal of war.

If the views of ambition and aggrandizement, which have thus been manifested by the French government since the conclusion of the treaty of peace, have in so very particular a manner attracted the attention of his majesty, it has been equally impossible for him not to feel, and not to notice, the repeated indignities which have been offered by that government to his crown, and to his people.

The report of colonel Sebastiani contains the most unwarrantable insinuations and charges against his majesty's government, against the officer who commanded his forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter. This paper cannot be considered as the publication of a private individual; it has been avowed, and indeed bears evidence upon the face of it, that it is the official report of an accredited agent, published by the authority of the government to which it was addressed, who thereby have given it their express sanction.

This report had been published a very short time, when another indignity was offered to this country in the communication of the first consul of France to the legislative body. In this communication he presumes to affirm, in the character of chief magistrate of that country, "That Great Britain cannot singly contend against the power of France;" an assertion as unfounded as it is indecent, disproved by the events of many wars, and by none more than by those of the war which has been recently concluded. Such an assertion, advanced in the most solemn official act of a government, and thereby meant to be avowed to all the powers of Europe, can be considered in no other light than as a defiance publicly offered to his majesty, and to a brave and powerful people, who are both willing and able to defend his just rights, and those of their country, against every insult and aggression.

The conduct of the first consul to his majesty's ambassador at his audience, in presence of the ministers of most of the sovereigns and states of Europe, furnishes another instance of provocation on the part of the French government which it would be improper not to notice on the present occasion, and the subsequent explanation of this transaction may be considered as having the effect of aggravating instead of palliating the affront.

At the very time when his majesty was demanding satisfaction and explanation on some of the points above mentioned, the French minister at Hamburg endeavoured to obtain the insertion in a Hamburg paper of a most gross and opprobrious libel against his majesty, and when difficulties were made respecting the insertion of it, he availed himself of his official character of minister of the French republic to require the publication of it by order of his government in the gazette of the senate of that town. With this requisition so made, the senate of Hamburg were induced to comply; and thus has the independence of that town been violated, and a free state made the instrument, by the menace of the French government, of propagating throughout Europe, upon their authority, the most offensive and unfounded calumnies against his majesty and his government. His majesty might add to this list of indignities, the requisition which the French government have repeatedly urged, that the laws and constitution of his country should be changed relative to the liberty of the press. His majesty might likewise add the calls which the French government have on several occasions made upon him to violate the laws of hospitality with respect to persons who had found an asylum within his dominions, and against whose conduct no charge whatever has at any time been substantiated. It is impossible to reflect on these different proceedings, and the course which the French government have thought proper to adopt respecting them, without the thorough conviction that they are not the effect of accident; but that they form a part of a system which has been adopted for the purpose of degrading, vilifying, and insulting his majesty and his government.

Under all these insults and provocations, his majesty, not without a due sense of his dignity, has proceeded with every degree of temper and moderation to obtain satisfaction and redress, while he has neglected no means, consistent with his honour and the safety of his dominions, to induce the government of France to concede to him, what is, in his judgment, absolutely necessary for the future tranquillity of Europe. His efforts in this respect have proved abortive, and he has therefore judged it necessary to order his ambassador to leave Paris. In having recourse to this proceeding, it has been his majesty's object to put an end to the fruitless discussions which have too long subsisted between the two governments, and to close a period of suspense peculiarly injurious to the subjects of his majesty.

But though the provocations which his majesty has received might entitle him to larger claims than those which he has advanced, yet anxious to prevent calamities which might thus be extended to every part of Europe, he is still willing, as far as is consistent with his own honour, and the interests of his people, to afford every facility to any just and honourable arrangement, by which such evils may be averted. He has, therefore, no difficulty in declaring to all Europe, that notwithstanding all the changes which have taken place since the treaty of peace, notwithstanding the extension of the power of France, in repugnance to that treaty, and to the spirit of peace itself, his majesty will not avail himself of these circumstances, to demand in compensation all that he is entitled to require, but will be ready to concur, even now, in an arrangement by which satisfaction shall be given to him, for the indignities which have been offered to his crown and to his people, and substantial security afforded against further encroachments on the part of France.

His majesty has thus distinctly and unreservedly stated the reasons of those proceedings to which he has found himself compelled to resort. He is actuated by no disposition to interfere in the internal concerns of any other state; by no projects of conquest and aggrandizement; but solely by a sense of what is due to the honour of his crown, and the interests of his people, and by an anxious desire to obstruct the further progress of a system which, if not resisted, may prove fatal to every part of the civilized world.

Debate in the Commons on the King's Message relative to the Discussions with France.] May 23. This day there was a very animated debate on the motion of lord Hawkesbury for an Address to his Majesty on his Message relative to the termination of the Discussions with France. The public curiosity was so great, that the strangers gallery was filled at an early hour, by persons admitted in an unusual manner; in consequence of which, none of the gentlemen accustomed to report the parliamentary proceedings, could gain admission: a very imperfect sketch is all, therefore, that has been preserved of the very interesting discussion which took place on the first day's debate.—The House, according to order, proceeded to take into consideration his majesty's message of Monday last. And the same being read by the Speaker, the House was moved, "That the entry in the Journal of the House, of the 14th of May 1802, of the Address agreed to by this House, to be presented to his Majesty, respecting the Definitive Treaty of Peace, might be read." And the same being read accordingly,

Lord Hawkesbury opened the discussion with a general recapitulation of those topics which are recounted in his majesty's Declaration. He appeared throughout strongly impressed with the statements he was making; and his appeal to the House for unanimity and support, in the present urgent circumstances, was particularly powerful and affecting. He concluded with moving,

"That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this House for his most gracious Message, and for the communication of the several Papers which have been laid before it in obedience to his majesty's command:—To assure his majesty of the just sense we entertain of his majesty's anxious and uniform endeavours to preserve to his people the blessings of peace, and of our perfect confidence in his majesty's disposition to terminate the calamities of war, whenever that object can be accomplished, consistently with the honour of his majesty's crown, and the interests of his people:—That we have observed, with the strongest feelings of indignation, that his majesty's endeavours have been frustrated by that restless spirit of ambition and domination by which the government of France have been led to advance pretensions the most extravagant and injurious, and to avow designs at once inconsistent with the obligations of good faith, and with the essential interests of the British empire; and that for these indignities and provocations, his majesty has in vain demanded satisfaction and redress:—That, actuated by these sentiments, we feel that the trust reposed in us by a brave and loyal people, requires, on our part, a firm determination to co-operate with his majesty in calling forth the resources of the United Kingdom for the vigorous support of a cause in which are involved the dignity of his majesty's crown, the rights and liberties of his people, and all that is dear and valuable to us as a free and independent nation."

Mr. Erskine warmly expressed his sense of the hostile disposition and proceedings of France. To some parts of the conduct of ministers in the negotiation, and of the Address, he urged objections; but he assured them of his readiness to contribute, at all times, and by every method in his power, toward an effectual resistance of all aggression, either upon the dominion, the interests, or the honour of the country.

Mr. Pitt began by observing upon some passages of Mr. Erskine's speech, the tendency of which he professed not entirely to understand, but from which he was led to hope that the learned gentleman, and those with whom he usually acted, were not likely materially to object to the proposed address. He flattered himself that this was likely to be the case, because, whatever difference of sentiment might arise, and much was certainly to be expected, on many points included in the great mass of information contained in the papers on the table, yet upon the great and important question at issue between this country and France, and upon the justice and necessity of the grounds on which we were compelled to enter into the war, he thought it almost impossible that the House should not be unanimous. In those transactions which had most immediately produced our present situation, the learned gentleman himself appeared, notwithstanding some doubts which he had thrown out on particular points, to admit, upon the whole, that there was such clear evidence of views of aggression and hostility on the part of France, as justified this country in retaining Malta for its own security. This he maintained to be the first great point on which the question turned; and he contended, that the whole of Sebastiani's report, and the circumstances of his mission to Egypt, the express and deliberate avowal by Buonaparté himself of his views and intentions, in a formal conference with lord Whitworth, and the information of the same intentions through the official channel of the minister for foreign affairs, afforded the most indisputable evidence, that the first consul had formed the determination, even while Malta was yet in our hands, of resuming his hostile project against Egypt; that the pursuit of such a project was an undeniable act of hostility against this country, and aimed at some of its most important interests; that it was, besides, a direct violation both of the letter and spirit of the treaty of Amiens itself, under pretence of which treaty alone our evacuation of that island was demanded, though under circumstances which, in other respects, according to the letter of that treaty, did not authorize such a demand; that the disclosure of this hostile project clearly justified this country in requiring fresh security against it, and if such security was refused, in having recourse to arms for that purpose, at the moment which appeared to be most for our advantage.

He then more particularly commented on each of these several circumstances with respect to the report of Sebastiani. He stated, that that was evidently an official paper addressed to the government, by a person regularly commissioned and employed by the consul himself; that its contents could never have been published in France but by his consent, and that they were published in fact in the official paper, under the direct authority of the government; that the whole tenor of that paper, and the account thus given by Sebastiani himself of his conduct in Egypt, made it impossible to doubt that he was sent there to prepare for the execution of a fresh attempt to put that country under the dominion of France; but that it was not necessary to dwell on the particular contents of the report; the mere circumstance of a military man having been sent at that time with such a commission to Egypt, was a sufficient evidence of the object of his mission. The time, he remarked, was very material, because it at once destroyed the chief pretext under which the French government had attempted, in the course of the official correspondence, to justify or extenuate the publication, or to deny the conclusion to be drawn from it. This pretext was, that the honour of the chief consul had been wounded by a narrative of the expedition to Egypt, published by a respectable officer in the British army (sir Robert Wilson), and that the publication of Sebastiani's report became necessary for his vindication. The facts stated in that narrative, he observed, were not even contradicted by the report, but even if they had been, in what degree would that circumstance account for originally sending Sebastiani to Egypt, with such a commission as had been already stated? It appeared, that that officer had actually embarked from Toulon on the 16th of September, and after proceeding to Tripoli, had arrived at Alexandria on the 16th of October; whereas, it is notorious that, at that time, sir Robert Wilson's narrative had not been published. With respect to the avowal of his design by the first consul himself, he referred to lord Whitworth's account in his dispatch of the 21st of February. He observed, that so far from the conversation appearing, as some persons had imagined, only loose and desultory, it was one which took place by the express appointment of the first consul—that it was therefore evidently prepared and deliberate, and that it was actually opened by the first consul himself, as being the mode which he had adopted for the purpose “of conveying to his majesty, in the most clear and authentic manner,” his sentiments on points which must be brought to an issue. In the course of this conversation, the first consul did not attempt to disguise his ultimate views upon Egypt, and though he professed to disclaim any intention of seizing it at present, he assigned as the reason for his forbearance, “that sooner or later it would belong to France, either by the falling to pieces of the Turkish empire, or by some arrangement with the Porte.” That in a subsequent conversation with M. Talleyrand, it was expressly admitted, that the acquisition of Egypt had been, and still was, a favourite object of the first consul, but he at the same time endeavoured to convince his majesty's ambassador, that it was not so great an object as to allow him to go to war for its attainment; and yet, upon being pressed to explain what security it was intended to give, to remove apprehension on this point, for which he had before stated there was a project in contemplation, he referred only to a passage in the first consul's message to the legislative body, saying that “there is a French ambassador at Constantinople, who is charged to give every assurance of the disposition of France to strengthen instead of weakening the Turkish government.”

To all the evidence founded on these several documents, he had heard but one argument opposed—the improbability of the French government thus disclosing its views, if it really entertained them. On this point it might be sufficient to observe, that it might indeed be difficult to account for such a disclosure, even on the supposition of such a project being really intended; but that it was not only difficult, but impossible to account for it at all, on the supposition of its not being intended. He asked whether, on the latter supposition, any motive could be assigned, either for the mission having been sent, or the report having been made and published, or for the avowals contained in the conversations of the first consul and of M. Talleyrand. He thought, however, that the difficulty of accounting for the disclosure was removed, by referring to the new and peculiar policy which had marked the conduct of France on many extraordinary occasions, from the very beginning of the Revolution; that where any measure was in contemplation more flagrant and atrocious than another, and more likely to shock the general feelings of Europe, and perhaps to excite vigorous and united resistance, instead of carefully concealing it till the moment of execution, it had, on the contrary, been studiously announced beforehand; that the object of this policy had been gradually to familiarize men's minds to that which at first they could scarcely even believe, and that their schemes which, in the first instance, were received with horror, and would have been opposed with indignation, came afterwards to be contemplated with neglect and indifference; and that which at first no man thought it possible seriously to attempt, was by degrees considered as natural and probable, and, in the end, as that which it was hopeless and impossible to resist. He therefore put it to the House, whether, after having observed this practice, it was possible for us to be so credulous and childish, as to act on the belief that Buonaparté would abandon the projects he had formed, only because he had himself told us he would persist in them; and whether we thought that if, for whatever reason, he had been led prematurely to disclose this project, even while Malta, the great security against its execution, was still in our possession, he would renounce the attempt when that security had been surrendered by us, and put, in fact, into his possession? If, then, the design against Egypt was apparent, he desired the House to consider, whether, upon every principle of justice and self-defence, admitted by all the systems of the law of nations, and adopted by the practice of all countries, we had not the clear right to take, from this moment, such measures of prevention and security as were sufficient to guard against the danger to which we should be in consequence exposed — whether it was not admitted, on almost all hands, that our possession of Malta was essential, or at least in the highest degree material, for the defence of Egypt — whether the importance of Egypt to this country was not in itself sufficiently evident, from its connexion with the safety of our Indian possessions — and whether it might not at this day be considered as a point of our national policy, already decided and attested by the glorious efforts which had been made, and the heroic blood which had been shed in the last war for recovering it from France, and which had in a manner consecrated it in the hearts and affections of Englishmen? He therefore wished the House to consider what was to be our future conduct, if, after all the warnings given us, we were now to surrender Malta out of our hands, and the attack upon Egypt were to follow in six or in twelve months afterwards. Were we prepared for the ridiculous, but disastrous alternative to which we should be reduced, of either submitting without a struggle to national calamity and disgrace, because, foreseeing our danger, we had voluntarily and wantonly sacrificed the best means of averting it; or, when it was perhaps too late to enter upon a difficult and almost hopeless contest, having by our own act given up the arms by which we could be enabled to conduct it to a successful issue?

If the question were closed here, for the reason he had given, he was prepared to maintain, that on these grounds alone the war was both just and necessary, and such as ought to call forth the utmost exertions of parliament and the nation in its support. But so far was it from being the case, that there was not any one of the leading transactions subsequent to the treaty of Amiens, to which his majesty's declaration referred, which was not, in his opinion, as far as justice was concerned, a clear and evident cause of war, and such as would have been acted upon, if there were sufficient means of co-operation on the continent, in almost every period of the history of this country. He here referred to the annexation of Piedmont, as the first act by which the French government had proceeded, subsequent to the treaty, to pursue the same system of aggrandizement, which had appeared in all their previous conduct, and which it was vainly hoped they had relinquished. He referred also to the transaction respecting the German indemnities, where the French government, with an arrogance, he believed unprecedented in the history of Europe, had presumed to dictate to all Germany the detailed mode of arranging those indemnities, on which the diet of the empire was expressly convened to deliberate, pursuant to the treaty of Luneville, and had publicly announced their scheme as settled and decided, before it was even communicated to those to whom it ought, in the first instance, to have been proposed. — He next passed to the violence offered to Switzerland, on which he thought it the less necessary to dwell, because he believed the conduct of France towards that unfortunate and devoted country had excited one universal sentiment of detestation. He wished here to declare (as this had been a subject so often adverted to on former occasions, when he had been unavoidably absent) that he considered the interference of his majesty's ministers on this subject, as not only evidently warranted by the circumstances, but such as was their duty to employ to the extent to which he understood it to have been carried, in order to give time for learning whether a confederacy could be formed in Europe, really sufficient for saving that country from the yoke of France; but that when upon trial all hopes upon such a confederacy vanished, he thought them equally right in not pushing the contest, on the part of this country, to extremities. He then adverted to the continuance of the French army in Holland, which appeared, from the papers on the table, to have been directly inconsistent with the principles on which the treaty of Amiens had been negotiated, and with the engagements which were known to subsist between France and Holland. After dwelling on these points, he stated, however, that he thought it less material to discuss whether they were each in itself sufficient causes of war on the part of this country, because he admitted that whatever might be the justice of the case, our conduct upon them at that time was necessarily regulated, not by that consideration only, but by the question of policy, which was unavoidably dependant upon the state of the continent; but that whatever it might be right to decide upon them at the time they occurred, it was impossible to contend that they were not now material, as symptoms of that deliberative system of ambition and encroachment which had been thus uniformly pursued towards others, and which was now directed to a quarter where it immediately affected our separate interests, and was in direct violation of the treaty with this country itself. He here drew a strong picture of the continued and rapid succession of the acts of violence and oppression which, during that period, had desolated so many of the countries of Europe; and after comparing the irresistible force and overwhelming progress of French ambition to those dreadful convulsions of nature by which provinces and kingdoms were consumed and buried in ruins, he asked, whether we could contemplate those scenes of havoc and destruction without reflecting how soon that torrent of liquid fire might direct its ravages against ourselves.

Having here closed his review of what had passed on the continent, he next observed, that the period of which he had been speaking was marked not only by the hostile acts which he had detailed, with respect to other powers in Europe, but by others immediately affecting the separate rights and interests of this country. He referred, he said, principally to two points which appeared in the correspondence. The first point was the demand which had been made by the French government respecting restraints on the liberties of the press, and the expulsion of the French emigrants now remaining in the country. On this it was unnecessary to enlarge, because the insolence of the proposition was sufficiently felt, and because it had been at the time resisted by his majesty's ministers, on grounds which were stated with great force and ability in one of the papers on the table. The second point related to the commercial agents: the indignity and outrage which attended their mission, was one of which it was difficult to speak with composure. The French government had made a formal proposition to send persons of this description, who had never been found necessary even when a commercial treaty subsisted, at a time when not only there was no such treaty, but when, as appears from the papers on the table, the commercial intercourse of his majesty's subjects with France was suffering every degree of violence and oppression. This proposition had naturally and wisely been refused. The French government then proceeded clandestinely to send these agents in the train of their ambassador; and, not content with this breach of the law of nations, they afterwards addressed to them instructions, under the official character in which they had received admittance, and the object of these instructions was, to direct them to take measures, in time of peace, for ascertaining the soundings of ports, and for obtaining military information of districts, acts for which they would have been hanged as spies in time of war. Under such circumstances, he could not but lament to find that his majesty's ministers had contented themselves with merely applying to the French government to withdraw those persons, and had not at once advised his majesty, by his own authority, to order them to depart the kingdom within twenty-four hours, reserving it to himself afterwards to require from France the reparation due for so gross an insult.

He did not think it necessary to dwell separately on another head of complaint, the violence committed against the vessels and property of his majesty's subjects in the French ports, and the withholding, to this hour, all satisfaction for those injuries. These proceedings, he said, would have been sufficient ground of complaint in ordinary times, but they could scarcely give additional force to the outrageous transactions which he had just enumerated, and which appeared to him as if they had been designedly calculated to include, under two distinct heads, the grossest insults that could be offered to the independence of any country. The first pretension of which he had spoken, that of restraining the liberty of the press, was nothing short of claiming the right to dictate to us in a point of municipal law, and to require that we should sacrifice to the caprice of the first consul, a known and important privilege of our constitution, and model at his pleasure the judicial proceedings and internal regulations of the country. The second pretension, that respecting his commercial agents, manifested, as had been already stated, an avowed determination to introduce, in defiance of our formal refusal, authorized emissaries into our arsenals and ports, in order to prepare in time of peace, the most effectual means for our annoyance and destruction in time of war. This was nothing less than to insist on our surrendering, beforehand, the right and the means of national defence, and if the former claim had struck at the liberty, this struck as directly at the actual safety of the country. It was true, he believed and hoped, that the commercial agents had at length been withdrawn, upon the representation of his majesty's ministers, but as he had already stated and lamented, it did not appear that any disavowal had been obtained of the principle on which they had been sent. The claim respecting the restraint upon the press, and the expulsion of the emigrants, had also been suspended for a time, in consequence of the unanswerable representations in the dispatch before referred to. But the first part of this claim had since been expressly revived in the course of the late negotiation. At all events, he contended, that the circumstance of the first consul having even suspended it as he did, only afforded a striking lesson of the benefit to be derived from a firm and seasonable resistance, but that the fact of such pretensions having at any time been urged (whether they were persisted in or withdrawn) must be remembered as the strongest proof of the nature of the views which he really entertained, and which he would unquestionably accomplish whenever he found it in his power. He maintained, therefore, that all these indignities and insults, as well as the encroachments and violences of which he had before been speaking, on the continent, must enter deeply into our consideration, in judging of the character and ultimate views and policy of our enemy. They must decisively confirm us in the resolution, to employ without hesitation the most vigorous and determined resistance, when, in addition to these proofs of his general disposition, both towards this country and towards Europe, we found him now engaged in that project of direct and separate hostility against ourselves, which had already been argued.

On all these grounds, he felt convinced that there never was an occasion on which it more clearly became the indispensable duty of parliament to concur with his majesty in the declaration of the necessity and justice of the war in which we were engaged, and to assure him of their firm and effectual support. But in giving these assurances, he trusted that other gentlemen felt impressed with the same sense which he did, of the awful importance of the engagement into which they were preparing to enter, and that they considered those assurances, not as formal words of ceremony or custom, but as a solemn and deliberate pledge on behalf of themselves and the nation whom they represented—knowing and feeling to their full extent the real difficulties and dangers of their situation, and of the arduous struggle which it compelled them to endure, and being prepared to meet those difficulties and dangers with every exertion and every sacrifice which the unexampled circumstances of the times rendered indispensable for the public safety. For his own part, although he considered the war as a war of necessity, and one which we could not decline without surrendering both our security and our honour, he should enter upon it with little hope of ultimate success, if these sentiments were not deeply impressed on the minds of parliament and the people. The scale of our exertions could not be measured by those of former times, or confined within the limits even of the great, and till then, unexampled efforts of the last war. He was convinced that some system far more vigorous and effectual than any even then adopted, would be found necessary, both in our finance, and in the preparation for national defence. On the provisions to be made for these two primary and paramount objects, it would principally depend whether we could effectually disconcert the favourite projects, and disappoint the main hopes of the enemy. It was evident that if they indulged themselves in any expectation of success in the present contest, it was built chiefly on the supposition that they could either break the spirit, and shake the determination of the country, by harassing us with the perpetual apprehension of descent upon our coasts, or that they could impair our resources and undermine our credit, by the effects of an expensive and protracted contest. To defeat the first of these purposes, it was not, in his judgment, sufficient to make those naval and military preparations, which would prevent any invasion that might be attempted from being ultimately successful (an event which he trusted he was justified in common with others, in considering as utterly impossible), but to make such vigorous and extensive arrangements for national defence, as might diffuse a sense of the most complete security against even the temporary impression to be produced by such an attempt, and might enable every individual to lay down his head to rest, in the persuasion and confidence that nothing was omitted which could enable us at once to meet and repel the danger, at any moment, and in any quarter, in which it might threaten us.

In order to disappoint the second object—that of wearing out our resources, he trusted the House would from the beginning form its system of finance, not with a view only to the expense which might be necessary in the first year of the contest, but that they would look at once to the possibility of its being protracted to as long a period as that which lately was terminated—that they would consider fully what, on the probable scale of the war, would be the whole extent of the burthens necessary to be imposed on that supposition. He was persuaded, that it could only be by providing, in the outset, means adequate to the whole extent of these purposes, that we could in fact prevent the ultimate amount of our expenses from being unnecessarily, and perhaps intolerably augmented, or that we could ensure the best chance either of bringing the contest to a speedy conclusion, by convincing the enemy of our sufficiency to maintain it, or could meet its continued exigencies, if necessary, without the annual recurrence of growing and accumulated embarrassments. He trusted, therefore, that his majesty's ministers would, on their part, feel the necessity of bringing both these points under consideration with all practicable promptitude and dispatch, and that, if possible, not even a fortnight might be suffered to elapse without enabling parliament to adopt such measures as would convince both France and the world, that we had from that hour provided the means of supporting the force, and defraying the expenditure which might be necessary for maintaining our internal security, and for the vigorous and effectual prosecution of the war, to any period to which it could reasonably be supposed to extend. He repeated, that he was aware that these measures could not be effected without material and extensive personal sacrifices, and without great additional burthens, which must to a degree affect the ease, convenience, and even comfort of many classes of society—that he lamented these consequences as much as any man, and if he saw any prospect that, by present concession, we could obtain a real and desirable interval of peace, security, and repose, he should be as anxious as any man to avoid the necessity of such arduous and painful exertions; but that under the present circumstances, a weak and timid policy could perhaps scarcely even postpone the moment when they would become indispensable for our existence, and would infallibly expose us to the certainty, at no distant period, of a similar struggle, with those means given out of our hands which we now possessed, and with the chance diminished, of finally conducting it to a successful issue—that we had not an option at this moment between the blessings of peace, and the dangers of war—that from the fatality of the times, and the general state of the world, we must consider our lot as cast by the decrees of Providence, in a time of peril and trouble—that he trusted the temper and courage of the nation would conform itself to the duties of that situation—that we should be prepared collectively and individually to meet it with that resignation and fortitude, and, at the same time, with that active zeal and exertion, which, in proportion to the magnitude of the crisis, might be expected from a brave and free people; and that we should reflect, even in the hour of trial, what abundant reason we have to be grateful to Providence, for the distinction we enjoy over most of the countries of Europe, and for all the advantages and blessings which national wisdom and virtue have hitherto protected, and which it now depends on perseverance in the same just and honourable sentiments still to guard and to preserve.

Mr. Wilberforce began by observing, that the critical situation of the country naturally rendered every member who had ever taken a part in public affairs, desirous of stating his sentiments. He must therefore trespass on the patience of the House for a short time, though the lateness of the hour would make him endeavour to avoid detail, and be satisfied with explaining the general views he found himself compelled to take of the question before them. He the rather also was anxious to do this, because he could not perfectly accord with any gentleman who had hitherto spoken. His majesty's ministers had, with great candour, desired to separate their own cause from that of their country, and not to draw in the House to any indirect approbation of their conduct, under the colour of offering to his majesty the assurance of the loyal and cordial support of the House of Commons in the perilous exigency of the present moment. He would as far as possible adhere to this line which others had pursued, and reserve for a future occasion such remarks on the conduct of ministers during the negotiation, as had been suggested by a careful perusal of the papers on the table, except so far as would be necessary for explaining his general views.

In general, then, he must avow, that he could not, consistently with his sense of duty, concur in that part of the address which affirmed that his majesty's government had uniformly endeavoured to preserve to their country the blessings of peace, and to prevent that fatal result with which the negotiation had at length terminated. Let me not (said Mr. Wilberforce) be misunderstood. I mean not to deny, that on grounds of strict self-defence, which alone can ever vindicate war, we might justly resort to that dreadful extremity. I admit that the general spirit of faithlessness, ambition, and aggrandizement manifested by the French government towards all other countries, with the commanding tone and port which they have assumed in all their dealings with other nations; that the marked hostility towards this nation which they have uniformly discovered, combined with the formidable means which they possess of giving effect to that hostility; to which I may fairly add the views they have indicated on Egypt, their possession of which, would be highly dangerous to our possessions in the East Indies; all these considerations confirmed and heightened by the several acts of injustice and indignity, stated so forcibly in his majesty's declaration, constitute such a body of aggression, injury, and insult, and manifest such a rooted spirit of hostility towards us, as to give us a right, on principles of provident self-defence, to declare war against France, if, all circumstances considered, war should appear to be dictated by the principles of sound policy,

But, for reasons which I will presently assign, it is my decided opinion, that the real security, the true interest of this country strongly enforce the expediency of avoiding war, if possible, in the present situation of our affairs, and, what is more, I cannot but believe that his majesty's ministers have plunged into it rashly and unnecessarily, and that the chief ground on which they have rested their cause, the main hinge on which all has turned, is not such as they can fully vindicate. I mean not that we should tamely submit to indignities or to any infringement on our essential interests, but every consideration of sound policy recommends to us in the present circumstances of this country and of Europe, the lesson which is dictated by still higher principles, that every drop of the cup of conciliation should have been drained before we threw it from us.

Sir, it must not be forgotten, that notwithstanding the various charges brought against France in his majesty's declaration, Malta is in one sense the sole ground of war. In our ultimatum we have distinctly stated, that if the French government would concede to us the island of Malta in perpetuity, or even for ten years, we would pass by all other subjects of difference, and consent to the continuance of peace. All therefore turned on Malta. Now, I must fairly declare my opinion, that his majesty's ministers were not warranted in making this demand of retaining Malta, and that they have acted unwisely, I had almost said unjustly, in putting the whole cause on this issue. Granted that difficulties had occurred—difficulties not only not created by us, but of which France had been the secret instigator—which, by preventing the execution of the conditions by which we meant to provide for the independence of the island, had fairly prevented our evacuating it on the day fixed by the treaty of Amiens; yet still, we should have used our endeavours to overcome those difficulties and to provide other means of accomplishing the same end. In short, without going into detail, instead of claiming the island of Malta for ourselves, either in perpetuity or for a term of years, we should have expressed to France our readiness to concur in and concert any measures which, by providing for the independence and neutrality of Malta, should give effect to the treaty of Amiens, and have declared our readiness to evacuate the island so soon as that independence and neutrality should be secured. This was the language of his majesty's ministers till the 9th of February; then they suddenly changed their style; then for the first time lord Hawkesbury advanced that principle so difficult in its application, and so liable to be perverted and abused, that we had a right to retain Malta, in order to compensate us for the increase of power and territory acquired by France subsequent to the treaty of Amiens. It was stated, however, that though this principle would of itself have justified our retention of Malta, his majesty's ministers would not have acted on it, but for our jealousy of the first consul's views on Egypt, which had been reasonably excited by the publication of Sebastiani's letter. On that letter I will not say much, but I must confess, that I think it scarcely warrants the conclusions which have been drawn from it. Do I mean to deny that it proves that the longing eyes of the first consul are still cast on Egypt? No; I never doubted it—I never entertained a doubt of his wishing to obtain possession of that country, on a thousand principles too obvious to require enumeration. I can appeal to my own sentiments and language at the time of the discussion on the preliminary articles, and on the definitive treaty of peace, to prove, that it was my own decided conviction, that Buonaparté would covet the possession of Egypt, not only as affording the means of assailing our eastern settlements, not only as in itself a province of great fertility and much promise, but as in some sort wiping off the stain which had tarnished his military reputation, and of showing to the world that he had not been finally baffled in a project long so dear to him, by the superior valour and influence of Great Britain. But, did not this House, did not his majesty's ministers entertain the same suspicions of the first consul's views before the signing of the definitive treaty? Were not these suspicions the very ground on which we contended so earnestly for the independence of Malta? Were not all the complicated provisions by which this independency was to be secured, so many outworks for defending our East Indian territories, by preventing Buonaparté's obtaining possession of Egypt? I repeat it—Sebastiani's letter added nothing to my former conviction on this head. For what did it show? not that the first consul would take possession of Egypt if he foresaw that a war with this country would be the consequence of the seizure, but that he still looked to it with desire and hope. But why, on this account, ask to retain Malta in our own possession? The independence and neutrality of Malta would have enabled us to keep a fleet in the Mediterranean, and thereby prevent his execution of his designs on Malta if any such he entertained. This is what, by the treaty of Amiens, we had a right to claim; with this we should have remained contented—Malta is indeed a valuable possession, but the most valuable of all the possessions of this country is its good faith. It is a possession which above all others we should watch with jealous circumspection, and guard from the very suspicion of infringement with anxious care. This, then, is my grand objection to the conduct of ministers, that, by claiming the possession of Malta instead of its independence, they took ground which was barely tenable. They gave our inveterate enemy an opportunity of mis-stating our real views both to France and to Europe. They gave him an occasion of urging, however falsely, those charges on the spirit of commercial rapacity and monopoly by which our councils were influenced, which had been before so industriously circulated, and of stating, that conceiving we had caught him unprepared for war, and unwilling to renew it on account of the situation of his fleet and army in St. Domingo, we had sought to turn this state of his affairs to our own purposes, and had endeavoured unjustly to retain a valuable possession, which, by the treaty of peace, we had stipulated to evacuate.

Again, it appears to me, that the king's message to parliament was a measure which tended to create a breach between the two countries. Certainly it has not been proved that any great armaments were making in the ports of France; but I will pass over this topic—I confess that great allowances ought to be made for administration, who, it must be remembered, were in the painful situation of being responsible for the security of this country. But it was urged in defence of his majesty's ministers, that they must make a stand somewhere; they had been subjected to a long course of injury and insult, and it was unfair to state the point on which they at last took their stand, as if it were the only point of difference; true, but in proportion as it was necessary, in the circumstances of his majesty's ministers, that they must take their ground somewhere, in that same proportion was it incumbent on them to select the ground on which they would make their final stand with more than ordinary caution and judgment. Their title to it should be so indubitably clear, that not the shadow of an argument could be urged against it; and this, for the reasons I have stated, is not the case when they take their stand on the retention of Malta. And after all, is it not unquestionable, that though when war actually took place, we enumerated, as we had a right to do, many other matters of complaint; yet Malta was the real point at issue between the two countries. Malta was that which our being suffered to retain, would render us willing to pass by and overlook all other grounds of difference.

Again,—The conduct of his majesty's ministers in the case of Switzerland renders it almost impossible for me to concur in declaring in the words of the address, my sense of their anxious and uniform endeavours to preserve the blessings of peace.—My feelings towards that brave and much injured people, render it indeed difficult for me to condemn administration, for almost instinctively coming forward, to rescue them from the yoke which was imposed on them by the injustice and oppression of the French government. But contemplating that whole business with a statesman's eye—estimating the interest we have in preserving the independence of Switzerland, estimating also our means of preserving that independence by our single exertions, and the improbability of our effecting any powerful confederacy for this object among the continental powers, I find myself reluctantly compelled to declare it as my opinion, that the conduct of government was in that instance unwarrantable, and that they were not justified in exposing this country to the manifold evils and dangers of war for the sake of the liberties of Switzerland.

After having discussed the justice of the war, I need not spend much time in endeavouring to prove, that whether with a view to the circumstances of our own country, of Europe, or even of the French government itself, sound policy dictated our avoiding a contest with France in the present moment, and our endeavouring, if possible, to put off a recurrence to arms. I will not specify what will but too readily suggest themselves to gentlemen's own minds, the various circumstances in our own situation, in the state of various parts of our great empire, which render it peculiarly desirable for us to obtain a breathing time—a respite from the evils and exhaustion of war, wherein we might be able to reinforce our strength, to repair and invigorate our resources, to gain the hearts and secure the affection of all classes of our people, and to fit the vessel of the state for that stormy sea, for that war of elements which it was but too probable she will ere long have to encounter.

But still more—are we not admonished by the state of Europe, to pause, and, if possible, not to renew the contest just now, when we must be obliged to fight the battle with our single strength. By waiting we have all to gain and nothing to lose.—Europe is now spiritless and exhausted—It bows under the ascendancy of the French government; but after a time, the power and strength and spirit of Austria may be expected to revive: the other great powers may see their real interest, and Holland, Switzerland, and Italy, which now, without a great continental power to combine and head their efforts, must bow to the yoke, and furnish all the supplies both of men and money which the French government will extort from them, for prosecuting the war against us; these subjugated powers would then, we might hope, obey the natural impulse of their hearts, and unite in shaking off the galling fetters under which they had been suffering so grievously. I am glad of this occasion of vindicating myself from that mis-statement which had been sometimes made of my opinions on the subject of continental connexions. Never did I, or could I maintain, that we ought not studiously to join our efforts with those of other continental powers when united by the bonds of a common interest. I only contended, and I am ever ready to justify the position, that it appears from the history of this country, that we have been too apt to make ourselves principals in continental quarrels; we have been somewhat too forward to engage in wars, and above all we have continued them too long, for continental objects, contrary to the true policy and real interests of this country. But with a view to the state of France also, it was highly desirable to put off if possible, the season of war—war at present would serve only to heighten that spirit of hostility towards this country which, I am sorry to say, I have heard from well-informed travellers, exists already in but too great force. War, at present, will tend to confirm that character France has in some degree assumed, which for the happiness of mankind in general, as well as for our own, we should especially deprecate, the character, attributes, and qualities of a military government. War will render it a point of honour with the head of the French government, whoever he may be, to carry on successful war against Great Britain, whereas, peace, by awakening her industry, by reviving her commerce and manufactures, by causing her people to taste the sweets and enjoy the comforts of plenty and security, would create a spirit of a different sort, and render it far more difficult for an unprincipled government to sport with the happiness of a numerous people, and to render their persons and property the blind and servile instruments of his insatiable ambition. Every consideration, therefore, enforces on us the expedience of putting off, if we are able, the season of war. By every year's delay we should have gained; our enemy would have lost. But it was the less necessary for us in the present moment to commence the war, because we already have Malta in our possession. My right hon. friend has said, that such are the provocations we have received, that we should be even justified in declaring war against France, if the peace had continued ten years, and Malta itself were in her possession. I reply to my right hon. friend (Mr. Pitt), on whose return to us this day, with undiminished powers, I congratulate this House and my country, that if Malta had been in the possession of France ten years, it is not necessary for my argument to deny that we ought immediately to attempt to take it. But when we already have it; when we actually enjoy all that security for our eastern settlements which the possession of Malta, by protecting Egypt, affords to them, what need is there, what cause for precipitating a war, which on all other grounds it is so much our interest to delay.

But the first consul, it is alleged, declared that he would regard our retention of Malta contrary to the treaty of Amiens as a declaration of war—true, that declaration was made in an early stage of the proceedings; but I cannot but think what passed afterwards affords us reason to believe, that the independence at least of Malta, if not our retention of it for ten years would have been acquiesced in, rather than that the war should be recommenced—and this is my reply to my right hon. friend who states that it was the alternative, Malta or war—the retention of Malta or the renewal of hostilities. No, Sir, there was another alternative, the independence of Malta; that independence which we had a right to claim under the treaty of Amiens, and which would have secured Egypt, and thereby our eastern possessions. It appears to me also, that we were not sufficiently prompt in our disposition to avail ourselves of the mediation of Russia for the prevention of hostilities, and the settlement of the differences between the two countries. In short, government conceived sanguine hopes, that their claim of Malta, in possession, would be conceded to them, and in pushing forward to this object, they overran themselves, and plunged too precipitately into that war which we must all deplore.

Sir, when I thus maintain that the king's ministers have not used their utmost endeavours for the preservation of peace, do I mean that they did not sincerely wish for its continuance? Nothing is farther from my intention than to insinuate any such suspicion. I believe they sincerely wish to preserve it, but I cannot honestly say that their measures were wisely adapted to that end. Sir, nothing is more common than for the most violent advocates for war to profess themselves friends of peace: in this view we all are desirous of peace. Sic petimus pacem is the motto of a celebrated piece of ordnance which points towards France, on the coast, I think, of Kent. Now this may illustrate my meaning, though I grant it is only latterly that the conduct of ministers subjects them to this illustration. The difference between us is, that in the present moment, my hon. friends seek for peace through the mouth of the cannon, I rather wish it to be sought for through the mediation of the court of Russia. Sir, at this late hour, I will forbear from entering on many other topics which I might otherwise be glad to discuss. Let me not, however, conclude without declaring with truth, that I acknowledge the extreme difficulties of the situation in which his majesty's ministers have been placed; I give them credit for the most pure and honourable intentions. It is unaffectedly painful to me to condemn any part of their conduct; but I am bound to state my honest judgment, and such as I have represented it, is the impression produced on my mind by a careful perusal of the papers which have been laid before us. I feel the importance of unanimity at the present moment, and unanimity I trust there will be, if we must engage in war, in bearing all the manifold evils and sufferings inseparable from a state of hostilities. I shall not be one who will be backward in sustaining, and as far as I may be able, in animating others to sustain, the heavy burthens which will be to be endured; but surely I may be forgiven if I wish that a contest so awful, so perilous as this will be, if it must go forward, should not take place, unless it be absolutely unavoidable. I have not descanted on the evils of war, and endeavoured to affect your passions by turning your minds to the contemplation of its various horrors; not but that I think a very unjust outcry is raised against all those who touch on those topics, while, on the other hand, appeals to pride, to glory, to the reputation of our brave forefathers, are heard with delight and clamorously applauded. It might tend, Sir, to the discovery of the path of truth and wisdom if appeals to the passions were in all cases to be excluded from our discussions, and if we were to confine ourselves to a dry, cold, strict, logical investigation and analysis. But if we allow of appeals to those passions, the influence of which, in persons in our station of life, must be justly affirmed to be particularly strong, surely we should not so squeamishly reject every appeal to those feelings of our nature which teach us to sympathise with the widow and the orphan, and to deplore those various sufferings of which war is above all other calamities the sure and prolific source. Still, great as are these evils, they must be borne, if no other course be open to us consistently with our national security. But on this head let us be very sure we are in the right—let us bear in mind, that it is the nature of the bulk of every people to enter into wars too lightly and easily, but when they begin to feel the pressure, they begin also to scrutinize more accurately the causes of the quarrel, and whether it was unavoidably necessary. If we would then produce and maintain that unanimity which should, in this great and eventful struggle, inspirit our national efforts, and ensure the full exertion of all our force: let us endeavour to render the grounds of the war so indisputably clear and free from all objection, that it will be impossible for any fair mind to entertain a doubt of it; let it be clear to our people, that it is only in the last resort that we have recurred to this fatal extremity; let us endeavour to possess their minds with a just sense of the real cause and object of the contention, and also to make them well acquainted with the conduct of France towards other countries, especially towards those who have too easily given credit to her fair professions, and have believed that she was approaching them in the character of a friend and a deliverer, not in that which properly belongs to her, of an insolent tyrant and a merciless oppressor. Sir, if we can inspire the people of this country with these sensations, as I trust we may, provided we act as we ought to do, arduous as the contest is in which we may have to engage with France, great as is her population, extended as is her empire, under the protection of that gracious Providence to which we owe so many blessings we need not fear for the result. We shall fight not to attack others, but to defend ourselves; and a nation like this never can be conquered, if it be true to itself.

Mr. Grey, though he objected to some points of the late negotiation, acknowledged the necessity of resisting the spirit of encroachment shown by France: yet, with a view to leave an opening to accommodation, he moved as an amendment to leave out from the word "commands" at the end of the first paragraph, to the end of the question, in order to insert these words: "To assure his majesty of our firm determination to co-operate with his majesty in calling forth the resources of the united kingdom for the vigorous prosecution of the war in which we are involved; and to express to his majesty the satisfaction with which his faithful Commons have received his majesty's gracious declaration, that he is willing to afford, as far as may be consistent with his own honour and the interests of his people, every facility to any just arrangement by which the blessings of peace may be restored to his loyal subjects."

The address was supported by lord Castlereagh and the Secretary at War; after which, on the motion of Mr. W. Smith, the debate was adjourned till tomorrow.

May 24. The House having resumed the said adjourned debate,

Mr. T. Grenville said, that when a call like the present, so superior to any other, was made upon the country, he thought that a sufficient motive for confining themselves strictly to the great duty which was then before them. His majesty had told the House that the aggressions and insults offered to this country by France, had forced him to commence hostilities against that power. Those who thought with him that it was their first duty to remove from the question every point which might prevent that unanimity which was so desirable to enable his majesty to prosecute the contest with vigour and energy would put out of their consideration any thing except the important duty which they had to discharge. After complaining so often of the want of information, he ought to be the first to congratulate the House on the full information which they were now in possession of. The first question for consideration was, whether this country had a right to go to war with France? And the second, whether, having a just cause for war, there was such a want of expediency in pursuing it, that, notwithstanding the justice of the cause, it would not be politic to carry it on? Ever since the treaty of Amiens, there had been one continued system of ambition and aggrandizement on the part of the French republic: and when he considered whether there were just grounds of war, his difficulty consisted rather in the abundance from which he was to choose. If he took the first act, that of sending persons here with the appearance of a commercial character, in the character of peace and claiming the rights of hospitality and protection, whilst their real views were the ascertainment of the means of destroying this country, he thought it was so unparalleled an insult, that it furnished of itself a sufficient cause for war. He would not treat of the annexation of Piedmont, of which country we were the direct guarantees, nor upon the subject of Switzerland. These were amply sufficient grounds for war; but although he would not dwell upon the subjects of the German indemnities, the annexation of Piedmont, the invasion of Switzerland, or of the Batavian republic, yet all these were sufficient proofs of the ambition of the French republic, to excite a disposition on the part of this country to resist the ambition of France. It had been doubted how far some of these were just grounds for war: it had been said that they were not, because at the period of signing the treaty of Amiens,

French troops were in Holland, Piedmont was really annexed to France, and Switzerland might be considered to be so. The great argument used in support of the treaty of Amiens was the tone and temper in which it was made, from which if any thing was to be inferred, it was, that a disposition was beginning to arise in France, to act upon the principles adopted by regular governments, and a hope to find in that disposition reasonable grounds for believing, that France would observe the treaties she had made. Now, when there was a general system of ambition and aggrandisement on the part of France, it was said it was no subject of complaint. Be it so. But should this country not be prepared to check that ambition? To say that the influence of France was so great in Holland and Switzerland, that therefore it ought not to be resisted, was so strange an argument, that he did not think it necessary to pursue it. All these acts were, each of them a sufficient cause for war. Here he wished to recur to what related to Egypt, in which there was a direct breach of the treaty of Amiens. By that treaty the French republic was solemnly bound to guarantee the integrity of the Turkish dominions, which became an important object to us, not only in itself, but for the security of our own possessions. In that view he conceived that we demanded security from France against any attempt in that quarter. Egypt was evacuated by our troops, and the evacuation made a sacrifice to peace, whilst we demanded the guarantee as a security for our eastern possessions. If any man doubted the insincerity of France, after reading the report of Sebastiani, it would be extremely difficult to prove it: yet the report was said to be commercial. Vain and idle pretext! Was it possible to conceive that it could be a commercial mission? If any man doubted, however, upon the subject, he desired to refer him to Buonaparte himself, who had distinctly described it as a military mission; and to Andreossi, the French ambassador, who had not attempted to conceal the purpose of the mission under the semblance of commerce, but who distinctly designated it as a military mission. Thus, then, the report of Sebastiani was confirmed in all its military character. But was that all? Look at the supplementary part of the report, view Sebastiani travelling in the republic of the Seven Islands: that republic was, however, not confined to Sebastiani's report; another supplementary account amongst the papers on the table, informed them that the first consul had granted his protection to the Catholic church of the Seven Islands, and that when the members of that communion prayed to God, they must pray for the first consul. Thus stood the case with respect to Egypt. If the report of Sebastiani had merely consisted of an intercepted letter, it might have been said, that it was not a sufficient act of hostility on the part of France towards this country, though he should have contended that it was; but when, in addition to the report, it was adopted by the first consul, and by the French ambassador here, could any reasonable man read that, and doubt that there had been in the mind of Buonaparté an hostile view with respect to Egypt, a disposition to act directly contrary to his own guarantee of the integrity of the Turkish empire? This was even not all; but when, in the declaration of his majesty, it was stated that the French government had suggested the idea of a partition of the Turkish empire, he must suppose that it related to a regular proposal made by France to a great northern power, for such a partition. With respect to this point, no documents were offered; but if ministers had not referred to it, they would have done less than their duty; and to have referred to it more distinctly, would have been more than was called for. Before he quitted this subject, he could not help adverting to an expression that had been used, that Buonaparté had a desire to possess himself of Egypt. If it was meant to be said that there was an abstract wish on the part of the great consul, possessing half the world, secretly, silently, and piously to add Egypt to his dominions, he could not conceive that such a simple abstract wish could be a cause for war. But putting together facts, would any man assert that it was a fair interpretation of those facts, to say merely that Buonaparté had a desire to possess himself of Egypt? That desire was shown by acts so manifestly in breach of the treaty which he had signed, that we were justified in saying that it was a hostile breach of faith. Steps had been taken by the first consul, which clearly indicated the means by which his designs were to be executed. From the moment that any hostile act was committed by France, we were justified in using every means for our own security. The best means by which the first consul could execute his projects upon Egypt were those which he thought the most necessary to the accomplishment of his desire; they depended upon Malta, and if we had evacuated Malta, we should have been justified, after the report of Sebastiani, in endeavouring to retake it. Would any man say that if it was just to retake it, it was not also just to retain it when it was already in our possession? In this view of the subject, he would not go into a minute discussion respecting the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens. He would grant, that if the stipulations of the treaty had been fulfilled, and we had then refused to deliver up Malta, a breach of that treaty might have been alleged against us; but no case had ever been made out by France, which gave her a right to demand the evacuation of Malta by us. He really thought that there never was a period in which so many and such invincible grounds, of war, on the part of this country, were so clearly and distinctly made out. It might be said, that amply sufficient grounds of war might exist, and yet considerations of expediency might render it doubtful whether parliament should recommend the prosecution of the war; but were there or not any such grounds of expediency at the present moment? If they were to say, that such a war at the present moment would not be a dangerous experiment, and that it would not press heavily, in point of expense, upon every man in the country, they would be deceiving themselves, and disguising the truth. But what had they to consider? He lamented that their choice upon this occasion would only be a choice of great evil. Before, however, they agreed to a change for war, they were to consider what they would lose. Was it peace that they would lose? Would any man say that it was a change from peace to war? It was, on the contrary, a change from a state of unequal truce to a state of equal war. They must look danger courageously in the face, and hope with confidence for a glorious result. Did they sacrifice, by such a change, that which was valuable, or even tolerable? Without entering into the consideration of the conduct of ministers, he would ask, whether, if the wisest men in the country had been at the head of affairs, they would have suffered the last two months of protracted negotiation, during which we experienced not a peace but a truce, in which we disarmed whilst the enemy armed—in which we were called upon to give up our conquests, whilst the enemy was pursuing a system of aggrandizement, and completing their military preparations, to be afterwards carried into effect against this country? Was it to be said, that we were to wait till they had completed all their arrangements? And were we to be taught to wait patiently the event of the attack, and not to take those means which we were called upon by God and man to take for our own security? It might be said, that even at the period of the present discussion, we had gained an advantage of vast moment, since the great and mighty republic of France had thought fit to abandon the important acquisition of Louisiana. He could not conceive that any one would be so childish as to ask, whether that was a fresh indication of a pacific spirit? What was the cause of it? The war. However paradoxical it might seem, he considered that cession as a fresh indication of a hostile mind on the part of France. It was evident that it was the object of France, in this cession, to do away one enemy more, and to endeavour to prevent an alliance between the United States and this country. It had been said that we were without allies: he did not see any occasion for treating our former continental alliances so lightly as they had been treated. But however we might be without allies, to those countries with whom we might wish to ally ourselves, it would not be unimportant to show our readiness to repel a danger which was common to all, to show our disposition courageously to meet the difficulties which presented themselves, and bravely to overcome them. With respect to the amendment, it appeared to him that there was no duty more incumbent upon them, when representing the spirit and sense of the country upon the present occasion, than that they should speak with an unanimous voice. There was no sacrifice which he would not make, consistently with conscience and honour, to obtain that unanimity. If, then, he saw in the amendment no material difference, must he not complain, that, without any essential difference, it should have the effect of weakening that unanimity? Though there was not one word in that amendment that he would not willingly subscribe to, yet he could not but lament that it would have the effect of preventing parliament from speaking with an unanimous voice. The country was placed in a very arduous situation; but he was confident that the spirit of Englishmen was amply sufficient to encounter successfully the perils which surrounded them, and that there would be found means, and mind, and spirit to meet the contest in which we were engaged. If the country was true to itself, and parliament was true to the country, there need be no fear for the issue of that contest.

Mr. Whitbread said, the right hon. gentleman had called for unanimity in the discussion of this subject. The right hon. gentleman had said, that there was nothing he would not sacrifice for the sake of unanimity, except honour and conscience. He put it to the right hon. gentleman under the gallery (Mr. Pitt) and to the right hon. gentleman who had just spoken, whether they could, with a safe conscience, vote a direct approbation of the conduct of ministers to which the present address would pledge them? He called upon them to say, whether ministers had uniformly manifested a desire for the maintenance of peace? whether ministers had conducted themselves well, and whether they had not committed the honour of the country? The right hon. gentleman had distinctly admitted, that ministers had committed the honour of the country; and if the right hon. gentleman could not approve of them, he could not approve of that part of the address which went to the approval of their conduct. Let those, therefore, who called for unanimity, vote for the amendment, which went the full length of pledging their lives and fortunes in the support of his majesty in the contest in which we were engaged, without pledging themselves to the approval of the conduct of his majesty's ministers. He acknowledged the brilliancy of the speech made by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) on the preceding evening, and he so much the more regretted the part that right hon. gentlemen had taken, for as it had been said that one person in France had absorbed the whole power of that mighty empire, so it might be observed, that if ever the fate of empires hung upon the lips of one individual, it was on the lips of that right hon. gentleman on the preceding evening. He regretted the part which that right hon. gentleman had taken, and should have been happy if it had been otherwise, for no one would be more happy than himself at the return to power of any one who was disposed to restore peace, which he thought might still be restored. He thought the negotiation had been conducted ill, and that when it was broken off, it might still have been brought to a happy issue. What did we now go to war for? Was it not on account of the single paper of the ultimatum of this country which now lay upon the table? And if France had accepted that ultimatum, should we or should we not be now at peace? If so, let them dismiss all circumstances of aggravation from the discussion of the subject before them. No man felt more than he did the aggravated insults offered to this country by France; but why not make representations upon each insult received, and, if no satisfaction was obtained, why not appeal to parliament? What were the circumstances which related to the treaty of Amiens. On the 23rd of November last, his majesty's speech was made to parliament. He confessed that the speech of the chancellor of the exchequer upon the address, was far from being satisfactory to him. He took the liberty at that period to ask for explanation; and if he did not much misinterpret what was then stated by that right hon. gentleman, it was, that there was no danger of any breach of the treaty of Amiens. From this circumstance, a grave and weighty responsibility rested upon ministers. The subject of Switzerland had been dwelt upon already with so much eloquence, that he should only say, that he viewed the events which had taken place in that country with as much horror as any man. But how did the question stand with respect to that country? At the time that Buonaparté invaded its liberties, a Swiss deputy applied to the powers of Europe, through the medium of their ambassadors at Paris, for assistance; they were only successful in their application to this country. A note was presented from lord Hawkesbury, remonstrating with the French government respecting that subject. A letter of instructions dated the same day with that note, was sent to Mr. Moore, giving him an irrevocable power to involve this country in a war with France. Thus, after the refusal of the other powers of Europe was known, and ministers having, on the 23rd of November, risked a war with France on the subject of Switzerland, and not then knowing the issue of the negotiation, they did then, in point of fact, inform the country, that there existed no danger of any breach of the treaty of Amiens. How was this to be interpreted? Ministers sent out immediate orders, in consequence of this dispute not to evacuate the Cape of Good Hope and other places, which was a direct breach of the treaty of Amiens. Soon afterwards they sent out orders to evacuate those places. This would serve to show how ministers interpreted their own act respecting Switzerland. It was most extraordinary that at the same time when they sent out orders not to evacuate the Cape and other places, no orders were sent out not to evacuate Malta, which was more particularly the subject of dispute between the countries, on the importance of which so much stress was laid, and which it now appeared formed the whole subject of the present contest. On the 8th of December, when a flourishing statement of the finances of the country was made by the chancellor of the exchequer, he then said, that there was no danger of any breach of the treaty of Amiens. At the time of his majesty's message respecting the prince of Wales, the same thing was repeated. Very soon afterwards came his majesty's message, announcing a probable rupture with France: distinct information had been asked for as to the grounds of that message, but ministers had never yet given it. It had been asked by a right hon. gentleman, what we should give up by going to war. Let that right hon. gentleman consider the sorrow which was produced throughout the country by the tidings of that message, and let him imagine the real grief which it occasioned. As to the opinion of the country, if it was polled from one end to the other, there was not one man to be found who would not say, that if we had received insults from France, those insults ought not to go unredressed; but let that opinion be taken in the same way, as to the conduct of ministers, and whether they had done all in their power to avoid war, and he believed the answer of a large majority would be, that they had not. That was also his feeling upon the subject. He thought that ministers had passed over in the Declaration, many points with respect to which the tone of France was more insulting, or at least as much so as in those they had noticed. With respect to the representations of France respecting libels alleged to be published against the government of that republic in this country, such remonstrances should have been treated with contempt. The answer should have been, we have no satisfaction to give you, take your remedy. With respect to the commercial commissioners, did ministers do their duty? were those men sent out of the country? The consequence of their not doing their duty was, that it still remained a problem, whether they had received satisfaction from France on that point: and this, mixed up with other things, was brought forward as matter of aggravation against France. Lord Hawkesbury had been called upon to send out of the country certain individuals because they were obnoxious to France. No Briton would contend that men who had received the protection of this country, ought to be sent out of it; but it appeared that the noble lord had made a promise upon the subject. But how should the representations upon that subject have been met? By a direct refusal; and if France chose to avenge herself, let her do it.—The subject of the aggrandizement of France had been already ably discussed. Those who voted against the peace of Amiens, stated this as a reason why they opposed that treaty. But how was it with respect to his majesty's ministers? The independence of Holland was secured; but the fact was, that French troops were in the Batavian republic at that time, and continued there. Were any representations made respecting those troops? Several motions were afterwards made by those troops, for the purpose, as it was supposed, of quitting the Batavian republic, but they stopped on the frontiers of Holland, under the pretext of being destined to serve in the expedition to Louisiana; but was there any formal remonstrance upon this subject? He should have thought it proper that ministers should have sent a formal representation, in order that they might have had a formal answer; then they might have come to parliament with their doubts; and there would now have been no dispute about the object of war. The independence of Switzerland was secured by the treaty of Luneville; yet, eight or nine months after the signature of that treaty, the French troops were not withdrawn from that country: that might have been considered as an omen of the bad faith of France. A considerable time elapsed between the signature of the treaty of Luneville, and that of the treaty of Amiens, and still the French troops were not withdrawn. Those who made the treaty of Amiens must have considered at that time that Switzerland would be kept by France. All these circumstances were stated, and the argument by which they were answered was, that it was to be supposed that the treaty would be executed. A system of aggrandizement was likewise pursued in Italy; and at the time of signing the treaty, Piedmont was in fact annexed to France, by being made a military arrondissement of that country, which was very little different from being really annexed to France. The isle of Elba was likewise taken under the protection of France, and that protection was sufficiently known. All these circumstances were known at the time the definitive treaty was signed. It was not therefore for those who signed that treaty, or those who supported it, to contend, that those reasons which existed at the time of signing the treaty were now reasons for going to war. It had been asked by the noble lord (Hawkesbury) on the preceding evening, was no country to come forward to take up the cause of an injured sovereign, or an injured people? He (Mr. W.) agreed, that if a case was made out of injury, their cause ought to be taken up; but it was needless to talk of giving what could not be given. That noble lord had alluded to the German indemnities, the whole of which was a complete system of robbery: but did the noble lord and his colleagues, who knew such a system was resolved upon at the treaty of Luneville, set their faces against it? Now, however, we were to go to war to redress the wrongs of the continent. If the ultimatum on the table was not the object of the war, in God's name let them know the object of it; let them not raise a false spirit in the country; let them know whether the object might be attained or not without going to war. With respect to Malta, which seemed to be the sole object in dispute with a view to Egypt, the noble lord had descanted upon the perfidy of the French government, in throwing difficulties in the way of the guarantees; but he forgot that all the while the French government were throwing difficulties in the way of those guarantees, Malta remained in the possession of England, and that it must have done so whilst those difficulties remained. The noble lord and his colleagues had, however, resolved to fulfil the treaty of

Amiens, when, on the 9th of February, a dispatch was sent to lord Whitworth, announcing that the evacuation of Malta would have taken place if a certain circumstance had not happened. This circumstance was Sebastiani's mission. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) had said, that the hostile disposition of the first consul was to be inferred more from the mission than the report. Ministers had stated, that they knew of the mission, and that they knew Sebastiani had seen general Stuart, as in their dispatch to the French government they had stated that Egypt had not been evacuated, in consequence of a mistake. If the report was an act of aggression, he thought that ministers were highly culpable in not remonstrating at the time. Did that report disclose more of the hostile disposition of the first consul than was before known? Egypt was always a favourite object of the French government, and Malta also, with a view to the former. What was done to prevent Malta from falling into the hands of the first consul? It was proposed to garrison it with Neapolitan troops, when the feeling of every military man upon that occasion was, that it was in fact placing it in the hands of France, as the first consul might have it when he pleased. As to the importance of Malta with a view to Egypt, it had been stated upon a former occasion by a gallant officer, that it was of no importance in that point of view. It was not unlikely that the empire of the Ottoman Porte might fall by means of some arrangement of partition, to which the first consul might be supposed to allude in conversation with lord Whitworth, and therefore his words were not to be taken in that sense which was applied to them; but at any rate it only resulted, that all that we knew before upon that subject was confirmed. It appeared that Talleyrand had signified the willingness of the French government to give every security respecting Egypt; he did not think ministers went far enough in inquiring what that security was. The emperor of Russia had offered to guaranty Malta, leaving out the Maltese langue. This morning an important document had arrived, contained in the French official paper, which was a note from the Russian minister, to Talleyrand, stating in the most conciliatory terms, the desire of his Imperial majesty that the treaty of Amiens should be maintained, and his wish to interpose his good offices between the two countries, and at the same time stating, that the English government knew that the emperor could not assent to the Maltese langue, on account of a previous arrangement to the contrary. From this it appeared that his Imperial majesty was willing to interfere between the two countries. With respect to the previous arrangement there mentioned, it appeared very strange, but perhaps ministers might be able to explain it satisfactorily. This however he was sure they would not explain satisfactorily, why they had not noticed that projet of the court of Petersburg at that time, when there had been no Sebastiani and no message to the legislative body. The publication of the report of Sebastiani, notwithstanding what had been said by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt), might be considered as an answer to sir Robert Wilson's work, respecting the transactions of our army in Egypt. If the message to the legislative body had been considered as an insult, ministers might have demanded and obtained satisfaction immediately, as they had done in the case of Mr. Reinhard. With respect to the refusal of Russia to guaranty Malta, it was contradicted by the note which had been laid upon the table that evening by the noble lord. He thought that his majesty's ministers might still avail themselves of the interference of Russia, and that peace might even yet be preserved.

Mr. Dallas* said:—Sir, the papers on the table involve two questions, which may be separate and distinct, or one and the same; the propriety and justice of the war, and the conduct of his majesty's ministers as connected with and preparatory to it: and in this respect the subject seems to be considered in different lights. Some gentlemen are of opinion, that the executive government has borne too much, and think we ought to have insisted upon satisfaction, or to have gone to war long before; others profess to think, that the war might have been avoided, and that not being a necessary, it is not therefore a just war, and in this manner they connect the question of war with the conduct of ministers. The address in substance asserts the war to be just and necessary, and it is to put a negative upon this that the amendment has been moved and supported. To those who think we ought to have gone to war before, and that ministers are culpable in this respect only, no argument, of course, is necessary to induce them to vote an address which affects the justice and necessity of the war at the present moment. They must, upon their own principle, vote against an amendment by which these are denied. The address does not pledge those who vote in favour of it to any approbation of the conduct of ministers, who admit the war to be just and necessary; for it may be just and necessary, and yet ministers may be highly culpable; and in this respect, therefore, it leaves the question of general conduct untouched. On the other hand, it may be possible, that a war may be unjust if no adequate cause of offence exists, or if existing, reasonable satisfaction has been refused; and the hon. gentleman who spoke last, rests his support of the amendment upon this ground; and it is with those only who think in this way that any controversy as to the amendment can arise. Is or is not the war then, on the part of this country, just and necessary? And this depends upon a correct consideration of the evidence now before us. The message from his majesty imputes to the French government a restless spirit of ambition and aggrandizement, a hostile disposition manifested towards this country, and insults and indignities for which we have in vain endeavoured to obtain redress; and the address professing to be founded upon the papers on our table, asserts such to be the conviction of the House. It contains, therefore, two distinct grounds of allegation; the one as to the conduct of France, the other as to the measures pursued by his majesty's government to obtain redress for the conduct alleged. I do not find that the gentlemen on the other side have denied the general conduct imputed to the French government, or the insults and indignities asserted to have been offered to this country. As little has it been denied, that to send spies, under the character of commercial agents, to this country, to attempt to interfere with the internal government of the country, to strive to impose foreign restraints upon the freedom of the British press, the treatment of our ambassador at Paris, the libel contained in the report of Sebastiani, the views professed as to Turkey and Egypt, in direct contradiction to the spirit and letter of the treaty of Amiens, are proofs of a hostile spirit. What, then, is it that the amendment proposes? To omit all that part of the address which states the conduct of the French government as forming the ground of war, to expunge from it all the feelings of just indignation, which this House is called upon to express for the insulted honour of the country, for an audacious attempt to violate its most essential interests, and to approach the throne with a niggardly assurance that his faithful Commons will support his majesty in the war in which he is now engaged! I pass over, therefore, the circumstances stated in his majesty's declaration as proofs of a hostile mind. That they required on the part of ministers an endeavour to obtain redress will not be denied. That it has been sought is clear—but has it been sought in vain? As to Holland, as to Switzerland, the contrary is not even pretended; but the stand seems to be made as to the business of Egypt, and on this ground I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman. From the signing of the treaty of Amiens up to the time when the report of Sebastiani appeared, every thing had evinced a strenuous disposition, on the part of ministers, to carry that treaty into effect. The first steps to procure the guarantee of the foreign powers were taken by us, and we appear to have been constantly stimulating the French government to assistance and co-operation. The delay in procuring the guarantee is to be imputed to the French government. Such was the condition of things when the report of Sebastiani appeared. As to the chief consul, he avowed his desire to have Egypt, but he would not go to war for it—why? Not because he felt himself restrained by the ties of honour, or by the faith of treaties, but because “he would lose more than he should gain by it, as he might be considered by Europe as the aggressor, and sooner or later, by the falling to pieces of the Turkish empire, or by negotiation, Egypt must belong to France!” For the detestation of the present day, for the execration of posterity, I rejoice that we have this picture drawn by his own hand. War with him is a matter of political calculation merely, and his choice of it is to be determined by loss or gain. Next, as to M. Talleyrand—in almost every conversation he distinctly admitted that we were entitled to satisfaction and security with respect to Egypt. The whole negotiation as to Malta proceeds upon this principle. Was, then, the satisfaction offered such as we ought to have received? or is it not clear, that every proposal made was unsatisfactory, and made only for the purpose of gaining time? I have not heard any gentleman maintain that any one proposal ought to have been accepted. Before I conclude, there is one question put by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, as to which I admit he is entitled to a distinct answer. For what are we going to war? It is fit, says the hon. gentleman, that the people of England should know. I agree with him that it is; and, therefore, to the hon. gentleman and the people of England, I explicitly say, We are going to war for Malta! not for Malta only, but for Egypt! not for Egypt only, but for India! not for India only, but for the integrity and security of the British empire! for the cause of justice, good, faith, and freedom throughout the civilized world!

General Maitland said, it was a matter of public notoriety, that armaments, to a considerable extent, were going on in the ports of Havre and Brest. Those armaments were said to amount only to 9,000 or 10,000 men. The accommodation, however, necessary for transporting such a number to foreign parts, would be sufficient to convey twice that number to our shores. The measure adopted by ministers was therefore a measure of precaution. But it was said, that this might lead to irritation. What! irritate the first consul, who had threatened us in the face of Europe with his army of 480,000 men! With respect to the previous conduct of France, it had been universally admitted, that it afforded this country just cause of war. He did not consider Malta as absolutely necessary to this country to carry on offensive operations in the Mediterranean. But when that he found Malta was in the ultimatum of ministers, he would not consider for a moment, whether it was a barren rock, or one of the richest commercial countries; it was sufficient for him that it was in the ultimatum; and from that neither menaces nor apprehension of any probable danger should force him to recede.

Mr. W. Elliot wished to be distinctly understood, that in voting for the address, he meant merely to express his opinion of the justice of the war, and not to give any opinion upon the conduct of ministers. The war appeared to him both just and necessary. It was not necessary to refer to the repeated acts of insult and aggression offered by France to this country. Upon this subject there were not two opinions. With respect to the mission of Sebastiani, it appeared to him to be a cool, deliberate act of aggression. It was true, that we entered into this war with many disadvantages; we had given up all our conquests; we had given up to France many important possessions, and had lost more by the late unfortunate truce, than we could have done by a disastrous war. Of all things, now that the contest had commenced, he deprecated a speedy and insecure compromise with France; he hoped the contest would be continued until real peace and tranquillity could be restored.

Mr. Serjeant Best said, that if he were asked, would he go to war for Malta?—he would answer, “No;” he would not go to war for Malta, nor for a much more extensive possession, in the abstract: but it was the manner in which France demanded Malta, it was the disposition she had shown, it was the designs she had openly avowed, that, in his opinion, justified this country in going to war. If the smallest spot of earth was demanded of us in the manner, and under the circumstances, that France had demanded Malta, he would refuse it, because he would consider it as essentially connected with the safety and the interest of the British empire. He was ready to admit, that between the preliminary and definitive treaties, France had repeatedly given us cause for war; but it did not therefore follow that ministers were to blame for not going to war; for a country was not always to go to war, whenever it had a just cause of so doing. The French government professed a desire to have the treaty of Amiens strictly carried into execution; and had contended, that by that treaty we were precluded from interfering in the affairs of the continent. It was impossible to conceive a more absurd or ill-grounded assertion; because it so happened, that in that very treaty we did stipulate for the integrity of different states upon the continent. What right could the French government have to call upon us for a literal execution of that treaty, when France was at that very time openly planning a gross infraction both of the letter and the spirit of the treaty?

Mr. Canning began by stating, that his anxiety to assign the grounds of the vote which he should give that night, in cordial support of the address as originally moved, and against the amendment which had been proposed to it, arose principally from the attempt which had been made by the gentlemen who had moved and supported the amendment, to confound in one view the conduct of ministers with the cause of the country, and to establish, that whoever voted for the original address must be considered as expressing a distinct approbation of the manner in which the negotiation had been conducted. Had not such an amendment been proposed, or such a construction been attempted to be given to the original address he should have thought it quite unnecessary to trouble the House with a single word in explanation of his vote in support of the address; a vote which was dictated by feelings such as he was confident were shared by every man who heard him, and which had been already called for and enforced on the former night, in a speech so convincing and so commanding, that he must be insensible indeed who could resist the power of such persuasion; and vain indeed must that man be who could hope to add any thing to its efficacy. He should have contented himself, therefore, with evincing by a silent vote his complete acquiescence in the reasoning of his right hon. friend beside him (Mr. Pitt): and he should have thought that vote sufficiently guarded against misconstruction, by the guards and qualifications which his right hon. friend had provided for his own, if he had not heard the assertion again advanced that day by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Whitbread), that an approbation of the address necessarily carried with it a panegyric on the ministers. From this assertion he begged leave entirely to dissent: but still more solicitous was he to protest against the truth of the proposition which was the converse of it. If to support the cause of the country was necessarily to approve the conduct of ministers, the converse seemed to be, that a hearty disapprobation of the conduct of ministers must necessarily preclude him from supporting the cause of the country. He was most anxious not to be so precluded. He would not allow himself to be so. And, reserving therefore to a future occasion, such as must in all probability occur soon, such as when it should occur he would not shrink from, the expression of his opinion upon many parts of the conduct, not only of the last negotiation, but of the whole of our foreign system, from the peace of Amiens downwards, which was now for the first time brought under parliamentary cognizance; he should content himself that day with stating very shortly the view which he took of the causes, the necessity, and the magnitude of the contest in which we are now embarked: and in our conviction of the justice of which contest, in our perseverance under all its difficulties, and our unanimous determination to bring it to a complete and satisfactory issue, was involved, as he firmly believed, the question of our existence as an independent nation.

In reviewing the causes of the war, as we were now called upon to consider of them, the question of that night appeared to him to be simply this, whether, under the circumstances of the present moment, the war was on our part just and necessary—necessary, unless we were prepared to abandon the plainest and most important interests of the country (an alternative which he trusted no man could dream of submitting to); and whether, such being the nature and character of the war, the House of Commons were prepared to tell his majesty, in the face of the enemy, and in the face of Europe, that they would support him to the utmost of their power in the vindication of the honour of his crown, and the rights and interests of his dominions? This was the single question, and upon this he could not conceive that there could exist any difference of opinion. That the papers on the table involved and suggested many other questions—questions material and important in themselves, and fit to become the subject of grave parliamentary deliberation, he was by no means disposed to deny. Whether too much had not been borne, and too much hazarded by delay; whether ministers had made their stand early enough; whether, if made earlier and in a bolder tone, the enemy might not have been checked in time, and the last extremity possibly avoided; whether the honour of the country had not been compromised by forbearance and concession, and a notion of its humility and readiness to bear injuries and put up with insults suffered to grow up in the mind of the enemy: whether our case had been throughout well argued, and exhibited in its fairest light;—were points upon which, undoubtedly, great difference of opinion might arise; but they were points (in his conception), capable of being completely put out of view in that night's deliberation. Would any man contend, that in a suit at law the justice of a good cause could be vitiated by any mismanagement of the counsel employed to conduct it; or would an upright judge or an enlightened jury, suffer that consideration to influence their decision? Still less would the person interested in the cause be likely to agree to so perverse a mode of judging, and to insist upon complicating in a single verdict or sentence the questions of, whether his cause was good, and whether his counsel had managed it to the best advantage? The question of that night was, whether our cause be good—whether, upon the point now at issue between us and France, we are in the right, as against Buonaparté?

As to the point immediately at issue, and upon which the war actually begins, he agreed in the forcible statement of a learned gentleman, who had spoken for the first time that night, and upon the acquisition of whose abilities he congratulated the house (Mr. Dallas), that it was Malta; to which the learned gentleman properly added, Malta, not for its own intrinsic value and importance only, but Malta, as the defence of Egypt against designs, not secretly cherished, but openly and impudently avowed, and the defence, through Egypt, of our empire in the east. To this qualification of the learned gentleman, he would add, Malta not taken by itself, as a single insulated point of discussion (important as it was, from its association with the great interests just described); but Malta, considered as that point upon which the honour of this country was committed, upon which the last stake of its dignity depended, being (as it was) that last point, upon which, after a series of violences, insults and aggressions, more or less injuriously offered, and more or less undisguisedly maintained, the first consul at length, out of patience with all disguise, or moderation, spoke out plainly, declared his will and pleasure, and left us no other alternative than instant submission or open war. "Malta or war," was the doctrine of Buonaparté. The refusal instantly to evacuate Malta will be considered as the commencement of hostilities," was the less pointed, but not less peremptory or less intelligible comment of the minister Talleyrand. We do not evacuate Malta at the word of command. The other alternative is war. War, therefore, and war for Malta, was not only founded in necessity and justice; but it was just and necessary in a twofold view. It would have been just necessary, and unavoidable, if nothing else were in contemplation than to guard those interests, of which Malta is the natural outwork; and which, the report of colonel Sebastiani, the publication of that report in the official gazette of France, and (if after such a manifestation of design any confirmation were necessary) the confirmation of the projects there developed by the direct avowal of the first consul himself, proved to be the objects of constant, hostile meditation with the government of France. Equally just, equally necessary, and equally unavoidable the war would have been, if we were to have considered only the point of honour (and all those consequences, which, to a nation like this, are involved in the maintenance of its honour); if Malta were no other wise important than as being that on which a peremptory defiance had been thrown out against us, that on which France had thought fit to try our courage, and put our spirit to proof; the last remaining pledge of former glory, fortunately still in our hands, and attempted by France to be extorted from us by menace and insult; the last remaining means of effectual resistance against a general and undisguised system of aggression and violence, against a plan to degrade, to harass, to wear us out by continual agitation; against a spirit of envious, malignant, unchanged, and incurable hostility.

The indications of this malignant temper, the proofs of these hostile dispositions and designs, were to be found in every page of the papers laid upon the table. An attempt was made indeed to contend, that however atrocious each particular instance of outrage might be, yet that having suffered each to pass without effectual remonstrance, and substantial redress, at the time of its being committed, ministers had not only precluded themselves from recurring to them to justify their conduct, but had precluded the country itself from citing them in proof of the justice of its cause. To this mode of reasoning he could not subscribe. That in passing over many things, which they did appear to have passed over without any remonstrance at all, that in offering in other instances, futile and unavailing representations, in accepting insufficient assurances of reparation, and in acquiescing, as had too often been the case, in silent neglect or peremptory refusal, ministers had been guilty of highly blameable misconduct, had disgraced themselves and betrayed the country, Mr. Canning said, he was as little disposed as any man to deny, and at a proper time he should be prepared to argue. But that these neglects or omissions were fatal to the justice of their complaint, that the country could be thereby bound to acquiesce in all that had been done and suffered, nay, that ministers themselves were precluded from recalling, in aid and aggravation of the present immediate cause of war, those prior grievances which would have been and were causes of war, so far as justice was concerned, but which they did not think such as to make war necessary and unavoidable; was a proposition which he would venture to say, could not be maintained without leading to the inferences which those who attempted to maintain it would probably be the last to allow. This proposition was maintained by those who were supporters and approvers of the peace of Amiens. Now if it were admitted, as it could not but well be, and had not been denied, that among the instances of outrage and misconduct on the part of France, enumerated in his majesty's declaration, there were many, even within a short space of time after the treaty of Amiens was concluded, nay, some even before that treaty was signed, which called for atonement; and if it were true, that every such instance ought in all cases, to have been instantly pushed to redress, and that the refusal of redress would have been in every instance cause of war;—not only the peace of Amiens, which those gentlemen now so tenderly regretted, could not have lasted an hour, but it could never have been made: unless, indeed, what surely no man would be found to avow (though there might not be wanting some perhaps who secretly felt it) the peace of Amiens was made upon the terms, and held upon the tenure, of surrendering all acknowledged and established principles of national independence, all right to repel injury or resent insult, all pretence to sympathise with the interests of our neighbours, or even to watch with jealousy over our own.

Short, however, of the principle which he confidently maintained, that the country had lost nothing of its right to redress former wrongs by any omission of ministers to claim it at an earlier period, there was another way in which the enumeration of those wrongs bore strongly upon the immediate cause of war, and contributed to justify ministers themselves in the stand which they had at length thought proper to make. It was simply this: The outrages of which France had previously been guilty, even if past redress, were still historically true (that would hardly be denied); and as such furnished at least strong and indisputable indications of the general spirit by which France was actuated, as well towards this country, as towards all the world. War was a mixed consideration; justice ought to be its first character; but it could not be denied that expediency was also to enter for something into the decision. No war ought to be undertaken at all that was not just; but even a just war might be well avoided, if it were not at the same time expedient to engage in it—if it could be avoided without shame, or danger, without loss of character, or hazard of essential interest. Take the instance of Malta itself. If our dispute respecting that island had grown up between us and some other power, to whom we could attribute no general disposition to violence and unlawful aggrandisement, no particular enmity towards us, no design to turn the acquisition (should it fall into their hands) to our disadvantage; if the discussion were with Russia, with Austria, with Naples;—our cause might still be good, our refusal to evacuate Malta under the circumstances of the present time, would still be completely justifiable; but it would neither be equally necessary, nor equally expedient to have pushed the dispute to the issue of war: because we should have had no previous certainty, no “foregone conclusion,” to convince us of the spirit in which the demand was made, of the insult intended to be conveyed in it, and of the advantage to be taken of our compliance. Look then at all those instances of aggression, at all those ebullitions of an insolent and domineering spirit with which the king's declaration is crowded; Piedmont, Parma, Elba, Switzerland, Germany; the press; the emigrants; the confiscation of British commerce; the mission of French commercial commissioners; aggressions abroad, which no former age would have tolerated; insults at home, which at any former period of our history British flesh and blood could not have borne (he would abstain from saying what he thought of the policy of bearing them): but look at them not as distinct causes of war (it was not in that light that the declaration presented them), but as indications of the views, of the general spirit, the animus of the enemy; as helps whereby to judge of the intentions of any future demand, and of the policy of any further submission:—and then let the House judge whether, when the demand for the evacuation of Malta came in the shape in which it did come, ministers could so far mistake the meaning and spirit of it, as not to feel, that in complying with it (if they had so complied), they would have put out of their own hands an instrument of defence, and into the hands of Buonaparté a weapon of offence and attack, of which a few short weeks would have taught him all the value; and that, instead of preserving peace by this last act of condescendence and submission, they would only have invited further aggressions, and ensured the execution of the threat of war, in exact proportion as they had shown themselves unwilling to encounter it, and had thrown away their means of meeting it to advantage?

If in one view, therefore, of the question of the retention of Malta, considering it as the only remaining point upon which (after letting so many others go by, whether wisely or not he would not now argue) ministers could make their stand; considering the demand for its immediate evacuation, accompanied with the threat of immediate war in case of refusal, as the crown and summit of a heap of injuries and insults, as the last of a long train of outrages, either now to be resisted, or to be submitted to patiently for ever; if in this view the choice of ministers was perfectly defensible; if, in fact, they had no choice; Mr. Canning confessed, that in the other view, considering Malta as the possession in the world the most applicable to guard against the specific danger which we foresaw, and the specific attack with which we were threatened, he not only thought ministers right in refusing to surrender the island; he not only thought parliament and the country bound to adopt this refusal as their own; and to support and maintain it with their most cheerful concurrence, and most strenuous exertions; but he perfectly agreed in a sentiment uttered early in that debate by his right hon. friend (Mr. Grenville), that if Malta had not still, by great fortune, been in our hands; if the question had been not about refusing to surrender, but about endeavouring to recover it—not about its retention, but its conquest by force of arms,—we should have been justified in attempting that conquest and recovery; nay, we should have been untrue to ourselves if we had not attempted it with all our means. He agreed in this sentiment most cordially; but he agreed in it, in the sense in which it was uttered by his right hon. friend, not in that which had been put upon it by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Whitbread). That hon. gentleman had (he was persuaded from misapprehension only) represented the avowal of this opinion on the part of his right hon. friend, as an avowal of a resolution to invade the rights of unoffending and neutral nations in a quarrel between Great Britain and France, as if the argument had been of this sort, that the views of France upon Egypt would have been a sufficient reason with us for wresting Malta from the Maltese. No such thing. His right hon. friend had studiously guarded himself from such a misinterpretation: and he (Mr. C.) begged leave to do the same, by stating (not so much by argument as by an assumption which he believed nobody would venture to controvert), that the surrender of Malta on our part, at the demand of France—under any of the provisions which either the treaty of Amiens itself, in the first instance, or any of the fruitless and hopeless attempts which appear in the papers on the table, to amend and make effectual that absurd and impracticable article had yet devised,—would have been tantamount to a surrender of the island directly into the hands of France. It was as against France, therefore, that his right hon. friend had stated, that we should be justified; it was as against France, that he concurred with his right hon. friend, in thinking that we should be not only justified, but compelled by self-defence, to have seized the island of Malta, if it had been out of our possession, from the very moment when Buonaparté's views on Egypt became manifest to the world, the very moment, that is, when colonel Sebastiani's report was published.

There was but one other point respecting Malta upon which he felt it necessary to say a single word. A doubt had been expressed as to the real importance of that island, in the view, and for the purposes, which had been assumed by the government, and by every gentleman who had argued in support of the war; a doubt how far Malta could properly be called the key of Egypt, and of the upper part of the Mediterranean, the rock of defence against all projects against the peace of that part of the world. To this doubt any man unlearned in military and naval science, could only oppose his own belief, founded, of course, on the authorities which he thought most sufficient, and on the observation of what had passed within the last few years. Foremost in the list of these authorities, it must not be forgotten, was Buonaparté himself. What he appeared so strenuously to covet as a line of approach to the more distant objects of his restless ambition, it was natural for those who were interested in preserving those objects to regard as the best outwork of their defence. Nor was it to be overlooked, that in both the expeditions to Egypt, that which conquered, and that which rescued it, Malta was, as it were the first stage of their progress, and the first earnest of their success. When Buonaparté sailed to the conquest of Egypt, the first notice we had of his route, and the first omen of his future victories, was, the occupation of Malta. When that army, which reversed all his victories, and reconquered all his acquisitions, went in pursuit of the glory which Buonaparté's transitory successes had prepared for them—they followed his footsteps; and it was from the rest, refreshment, and recruit which they obtained at Malta, that they arrived in Egypt, vigorous and healthful, and prepared on their first landing to achieve those wonders which decided the fate of an enterprise, the splendid events of which even the history of this country can scarcely parallel, and the fruits of which it is as much our interest as our duty not to throw away. That the possession of Malta can be a matter of indifference towards the preservation of the security which those victories acquired us in that quarter of the world, and under the circumstances of the present time, is not easily to be imagined. The importance of Malta upon any general view and scale of things, might, perhaps, not be so certainly appreciated. It has lain out of the road of European warfare for many ages past. But the gigantic schemes of conquest and of empire, projected by the first consul of France, threaten to make the shores of the Mediterranean in modern, as they were in ancient times, the scenes of the most awful and obstinate struggles, and of the most stupendous revolutions in political and military affairs. Interested as Great Britain must necessarily be in the remote, if not the immediate results of those struggles and revolutions, whenever they are attempted, the experience of the last war would surely justify a strong prejudice at least, if not a confirmed opinion, of the importance of a port, the possession of which has enabled us and will no doubt enable us again, to make that field of renewed conflict in the Mediterranean, whenever we are called to act upon it, a field of new triumph and additional military glory to Great Britain. But while he stated thus strongly his persuasion of the importance of Malta, in the present time, and with a view to the events which appeared to be impending, Mr. Canning begged not to be considered as pledging any opinion that the possession of Malta was, therefore, the sole object of the war; that the war was therefore to be carried on, or the peace (whenever peace should be possible) to be made, solely or principally with the object of retaining Malta to Great Britain. Undoubtedly he should consider the perpetual possession of Malta as very desirable and very advantageous. Undoubtedly Malta did appear to be the best security that could be obtained against dangers immediately menacing some of the most important interests of this country. But he was not one of those who thought that the separate interests of this country were all that we ought to have in our contemplation; or that the war, now that we had been forced into it for them, ought to be conducted, or concluded with a view to them only. He was not one of those who thought that this country could be soundly and lastingly secure by a narrow policy, and a selfish and insulated system. Opinions of that sort had been gaining ground, he was afraid, almost ever since the signing of the peace. They had been brought forward, perhaps, in the first instance, to reconcile the nation to the terms of that peace; they had been encouraged, or, to say the least, had not been sufficiently discouraged, even in that House, because they had a tendency to direct the thoughts of the people from what was passing in the world around them, or to harden their feelings to it, by a persuasion that it was no concern of theirs.

Much stress has been laid by many gentlemen (said Mr. Canning), in the course of this debate, on the advantages resulting to the country from the peace of Amiens, from the experiment, as it is called, of that peace having been fairly tried. I am not inclined to dispute these assertions. And one advantage I am willing to persuade myself, which will have resulted from the trial of that experiment is, that we shall all feel a conviction henceforward, that a peace of such a sort, and on such a system, is not the peace which suits this country; is not one which can assure to us the real blessings, the substantial security, or the uninterrupted continuance, of a state of peace.

There are those who have maintained in this House, and especially in the debates which took place before Christmas, when most, or many of those outrages of France, which are now cited by his majesty's ministers (not as causes of war indeed, but in aid and aggravation of the principal cause), were publicly notorious, and were alluded to in debate; there were those who then maintained (and among them were some persons for whose talents and character I am sure I have the highest respect and regard), that an insulated system of policy, a disclaimer of continental interests, a separation of ourselves from the rest of the world, was the safest and most advisable system on which a country, situated as ours, could act. Any allusions to the course of policy which had distinguished the most splendid and prosperous periods of our history, any lamentations over the rank which we once held in the world, and the influence which we formerly exercised in the affairs of Europe, were then, I well remember, received with rebuke, as incitements to an unseasonable spirit, and instigations of violence and warfare. Great pains were taken, and many arguments used, to reconcile us to a lot more humble. To be great, it was stated, was not necessarily to be happy. No, Sir, I would admit greatness and happiness are not necessarily united, either in a state or an individual. But this is not putting the question fairly. The question is, whether, when they have been long united, they can ever easily be separated, without the hazard of producing, either a convulsion, which shall destroy existence, or a decay, which shall slowly undermine it? An individual may be happy without being a king. But when did abdicated royalty retire to lasting security and peaceful contentment? A nation may be prosperous without being great; but when its greatness and prosperity have been long interwoven together, the alternative is no longer within its choice; it cannot resign the one, without risking the sacrifice of the other.

Sir, we have tried this system, and are now in a state to judge how we like the result of it. We have before us the contrast of two opposite plans of policy; after a century of busy, active, complicated connexions with the powers of Europe, of assistance to their wants, and sympathy with their concerns, which have engaged us in war, no doubt, and subjected us to disquietude and difficulty—we have had eighteen months, or thereabouts, of abstraction from continental interests and alliances, during which we have left Europe to shift for itself, determined on our part to decline all interference, to avoid all contest, and hoping to be respected—or at least (which perhaps, was in truth our utmost hope) to be let alone. Compare the rank and station to which we raised ourselves by the former policy, with that to which we have been fast descending during the prevalence of the latter. Weigh the insults which we have borne, the aggressions to which we have been exposed during the short space of eighteen months, against all the causes and provocations of war scattered over the face of the preceding century, and see if the former do not preponderate.

We have found then (and this is the experiment which I think the peace of Amiens has most fairly proved), that a country, circumstanced as this is, cannot safely abjure a dignified policy, and abdicate its rank among nations. That, with such a country, to be lowly, is not to be sheltered; to be unassuming, is not necessarily to be safe. In vain we brought our minds to be contented with humble security; in vain did we profess ourselves satisfied to ask no more than that in our humility we should be unmolested—

Sed precor ut possim tutius esse miser.—

This might be the limit of our wish; but even this modest wish has been denied us. I do not say that the sense of this disappointment, that the conviction daily forcing itself upon our judgment and our feelings that such a system could not last, ought to have precipitated us into war; but I do say, that once engaged in war, from other more pressing causes, these considerations ought to guide us, and I trust they will, both in the conduct of the war itself, and in the conclusion of the peace which our efforts in that war can alone procure to us. I do trust, that we shall now make up our minds to recur to the ancient and established policy of the nation; and that, taught by the experiment which has been tried (perhaps unavoidably, perhaps necessarily, I give no opinion upon that point; but if to the establishment of a conviction of our true interest, I will agree, fortunately upon the whole), we shall look to conduct and terminate this contest on larger and higher principles; shall endeavour to link ourselves anew with the system of Europe, from which events had broken us off; and to raise ourselves again to that commanding situation, to that rank and consideration in Europe, which must always furnish, at once, the best chance of not being attacked, and the best means of speedily repelling any attack that may be made upon us.

Mr. Fox rose, and assured the House of his unwillingness to ask for its attention, after the long and able discussion which the important subject before them had already received after the fair and comprehensive manner in which his hon. friend (Mr. Grey) had brought forward his amendment to the address, and after that full investigation which it had met with from the several gentlemen who had spoken both on that and the preceding day, did he not feel it his absolute duty to the people of England, to endeavour at least as well as he was able, to prevail on that House, by the timely interposition of its counsels, to rescue them, not only from a considerable danger, but from the certain misery which must be their doom in any event of war, even the most successful. He should first endeavour to clear the subject from the embarrassment into which it had been thrown by some of those who had supported the address, and particularly by a right hon. friend of his on the bench near him (Mr. T. Grenville), for so he would call him, notwithstanding any difference of political sentiment that might subsist between them, knowing that those differences produced as little alteration on that gentleman's private feelings as they did on his own. Among those differences he should class the opinion to which he was about to refer, and which had also received the support of a right hon. gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Canning). To the course recommended by those gentlemen it was impossible for him to assent. It was their object to divide the question in debate into two parts, and to consider the justice and expediency of the war as totally separate from the conduct of the ministers which had produced it. With regard to a question of war, it was, generally speaking, like any other question, extremely difficult to be distinguished from the measures by which it had been occasioned. In the case immediately before the House, the distinction for which those gentlemen contended, appeared more particularly inadmissible than in almost any other. Might not the justice of this war, for instance, rest entirely on the refusal of explanation where explanation had been demanded? on the refusal of redress where redress had been demanded? or on the refusal of satisfaction where satisfaction had been demanded? Was it not, therefore, in the very nature of the thing that the whole question, as to such refusal, might, nay to a certainty must, depend on the terms, the time, and the circumstances under which we had asked this explanation, this redress, or this satisfaction?

Putting the case, however, of its being possible to admit that, without such previous inquiry, it could be fairly decided in that House whether a foreign power was right or wrong in its refusal of satisfaction, Mr. Fox called strongly on his right hon. friend on the bench near him, and on others who agreed with that gentleman in opinion, to say whether, considering the manner in which the address expressed itself, they could with any consistency support it? In the language of that address it was affirmed, that his majesty (which, of course, always meant to say his ministers) had been "anxious and uniform in his endeavours to preserve to his people the blessings of peace." For himself, Mr. Fox said, that voting on this awful event, he could not conscientiously agree, that the efforts of his majesty's advisers had been anxious and uniform to preserve peace. From a due examination of the materials before him, he could find no such anxiety or uniformity in their efforts. The very reverse might, in many instances, be inferred; without much further inquiry, therefore, he could not assent to any proposition which should affirm that fact. But if the gentlemen, to whom he alluded, thought differently from him on this point (although he scarcely conceived it possible that they should), and if they were, indeed, ready to declare that the ministers had been uniform in their efforts to preserve peace, would they be equally ready to applaud them for it? they, who had constantly condemned the object itself, and of course all efforts to obtain it. Were they ready, too, to thank the ministers for the manner in which they had conducted the negotiation, if negotiation it could be called? Consistently with all their known ideas, those gentlemen certainly could not support the proposed address.

His right hon. friend (Mr. T. Grenville), indeed, had said, that although he should vote for the address, there was not one word in the amendment in which he did not fully concur, and which he was not ready to vote without any qualification. But, in voting for the address, he expressly guarded himself against any approbation of the conduct of ministers. It was for the sake of unanimity alone that he did not oppose the original motion. Now, when it was evident that neither his right hon. friend, nor any one of those who professed their intention of voting for the address, would venture to do so without qualifying his support of it, by stating that he did not mean to prejudge the question of the conduct of ministers; when it was evident that the original address contained in it many sentiments, with which those, with whom he (Mr. Fox) acted, could not possibly concur; when not one sentiment or expression in the amendment called for the disapprobation of his right hon. friend, or any other individual of that House; and when the ministers themselves were stated by the noble lord opposite (lord Hawkesbury), not even to desire to obtain from the House any declaration of approval for what they had done,—it struck him, that it was in the amendment, and not in the address, that the true view of the subject was contained, and that by voting for the amendment, unanimity, real unanimity, would be most effectually secured. For how stood the question upon this point? One right hon. gentleman under the gallery (Mr. Canning) was desirous of approving the terms of the address for one day; but it was for that one day only; for he had expressly given the House to understand, that there would be an end of his unanimity on the day following. He had already given notice of a motion for papers. The respite to ministers, therefore, would probably not be very long. “I have lately,” said Mr. Fox,

“been so much out of political life, that I am totally ignorant of the intrigues of parties in this House; but I now see before me a striking instance of the effect produced by the presence of a very eminent and powerful member, who has been unable for a long time to give us the benefit of his attendance. I am ready to acknowledge at all times the advantages to be derived to this House from the assistance of great and splendid abilities; but so much a friend am I to the freedom of debate, that I can hardly think even his presence sufficient to compensate for the loss which we sustain by the silence it imposes on certain hon. gentlemen, who at other times, and in his absence are obliging enough to communicate their sentiments to us. But now they seem to say to each other, “in his awful presence, let us abstain from attacking the ministers; opportunity will soon offer itself; for though he is here to-day, he may be away to-morrow, and then—have at them!” Now, Sir, it certainly is an advantage to the debates of this House to learn in the course of them the sentiments of any eminent person. It is always a rational, and sometimes a profitable pleasure, to listen to superior eloquence; but, when these advantages produce the inconvenience of silencing others, whether from the dread of his presence, the fear of losing his good opinion, or from any other cause, no matter what, I own I have doubts whether, on such terms and conditions, his presence or his absence be most desirable. The effect of his presence, indeed, is no less than an abridgment of the freedom of debate, by silencing those gentlemen, who, on other occasions, stand sufficiently forward in our discussions; and who are so desirous of putting us in possession of all their sentiments, that when the question has been, whether the House should or should not adjourn from the Friday to the Monday, or whether any immaterial paper should or should not be laid before us, have never withheld their opinions, although now—such are the effects of a great man's presence—they are absolutely mute.

Mr. Fox then entered upon the consideration of the justice of the war. The address, he observed, pledged the House of Commons to its justice and necessity, for want of due satisfaction from the first consul of France, without its having been shown in what points satisfaction had been demanded, and refused. To make out the want of satisfaction, it was necessary to consider how, and when, and under what circumstances, satisfaction had been demanded, and, above all, whether it had been actually refused. If all this was admitted to be necessary, it was not to be denied that a review of the conduct of ministers became so too; consequently, that to separate the two questions of the justice of the war, and the conduct of ministers, was impossible. Many points had been urged in the course of the debate, which could not be made out from the documents on the table; many points had been partially stated; others had been omitted, though material to the fair examination of the question; and in some instances conclusions had been assumed, which did not logically follow from their premises: these circumstances had given impressions to his mind, different from those of most of the gentlemen who had spoken before him. In all his reading on this subject, he had always found it admitted, that in disputes between states, a clear distinction was established between insults and injuries. He had uniformly understood that insult, by itself, was no ground whatever for hostility. It was not the insult that was the just ground of war, but the refusal of satisfaction for insult, after representation duly made, and satisfaction demanded. This was, indeed, a true and just ground for war. It followed, therefore, that every insult was to be considered with reference to a demand and a refusal, and this only to a formal demand and a refusal. With regard to an injury actually sustained, the case was not exactly the same. The just and laudable course to follow, in the case of an injury sustained, was certainly first to demand redress; but it sometimes happened, that the injury was of such a nature as to be almost incapable of the redress immediately applicable to it; of such a nature, that while a country was demanding reparation, it was losing the opportunity of obtaining it; in which case, and particularly if the redress happened to be in our own hands, it became fit to use the means which nature and fortune had placed within our reach.

What he should first consider, therefore, was, the conduct which France had held towards other states, so far as such conduct was to be presumed evidence of hostile designs against this country. Every act of injustice of this nature, which France had been guilty of since the peace of Amiens, could not be fairly adduced, with reference to its effect upon ourselves, as constituting a just ground for war. "I hope," said Mr. Fox, "that I shall not be thought to take unnecessarily nice distinctions, when I say, that some acts may be done by one country against another, which, although in the abstract highly unjust and injurious, are not nevertheless acts so directly tending to the injury of a third power, as to amount to a proof of hostile views against that third power, and therefore to call for its interference; neither is it necessary, on the other hand, that you should be bound by specific treaty, to guarantee any particular state against the aggrandizement of its neighbour, in order to be intitled to interfere for its defence. Undoubtedly you may interfere to oppose such aggrandizement, upon the general principles of policy, which include prudence; and upon the first principle which governs states as well as individuals, the principle of self-defence. I go further, and say, that you are authorized by the rank you hold, and I trust you will continue to hold, in the scale of nations, to interfere and to prevent injustice and oppression by a great towards a smaller state, whenever it is offered. This I take to be a ground of just interference with foreign powers, regulated always by the prospect of success, and by that prudence which would abstain from any interference at all, when it could only injure the party it was intended to serve: but these premises do not bring us to the conclusion which it seemed the object of the noble lord (Hawkesbury) to enforce in his speech yesterday, namely, "that whenever any neighbouring power has attempted aggrandizement, and has accomplished her object, either by the operation of war, or by other means, such aggrandizement is necessarily to be taken as an act of malevolence towards ourselves; and that although we will not interfere to prevent the aggrandizement while it is going on, it may be fit to reserve the right of interfering until some other time, and then to bring forward a question upon it on the ground of its being a direct injury to ourselves." Such a doctrine has never yet been insisted upon in any of the transactions which have taken place among the European powers. Among the various instances of the aggression of great states, in modern times, we have the two divisions of Poland, which, even in comparison with any thing we have since seen, still retain a certain pre-eminence in profligacy. Can any man deny that, on the first division of Poland, France and England might have united to prevent that most atrocious act of injustice? Will any man say that such an union, for such a purpose, would not have been laudable? or rather was it not the duty of these independent nations to unite upon the common principles of justice against the other three dividing and spoliating powers, and tell them, "You are doing an act, dreadful in itself, most dangerous in its consequences, most pernicious in its precedent; and although neither of us has any treaty or connexion with Poland, we will prevent the division you are about to make of that kingdom." No man will deny the justice of such an interference. But, on the other hand, if we had afterwards, upon some other point which had no connexion with this subject, gone to war with Russia or Austria, or Prussia, would it not have been extravagant for us to have said, "We never remonstrated against the partition of Poland, while the thing was doing, because, at that time, you had given us no direct cause of offence; but now that we have a quarrel with you, we shall insist on that act as evidence of your original malice against us."

It was under this view, therefore, that Mr. Fox now proposed to consider the general conduct of France towards other states since the treaty of Amiens. First, however, he should consider that treaty not in its detail, but in its principle. The principle on which he had supported that treaty, and on which many other members of parliament had supported it, was not that the state of Europe, as arranged by its stipulations, was satisfactory—not that he had, at the time of making it, much reliance on the good faith, still less on the moderation of France, but upon a feeling that, under all the circumstances, it was better to take the opportunity which then offered of putting an end to the calamities of war. It was true that we did accept an imperfect security on concluding the treaty of Amiens. This was a truth which all men felt; but it was a truth by no means peculiar to that treaty—it had happened in many treaties before, and would happen again. Imperfect security was common to all engagements in almost every condition of society; and nothing short of a state of absolute perfection in all things, which none but a lunatic was extravagant enough to expect, would justify the hope of perfect security in a treaty. All that could rationally be looked forward to was probable security; that is to say, the security which arises from its being the interest of the other contracting party not to break their engagements. It was absurd to calculate upon more. If all nations were to be apprehensive that, unless they were perfectly secure, they enjoyed no security whatever, and fancying themselves, therefore, in danger, were to go to war in search of absolute security, he was afraid there would be but little peace in the world. If Great Britain had pursued this policy, the few intervals of peace she had had would never have taken place, and the last century would have presented one uninterrupted state of war; but we had from time to time, and, as he thought, prudently, been content to take probable security for the continuance of peace. This he took to have been the principle of the treaty in question. Did we therefore relinquish our right to interfere in the affairs of Holland? Certainly not: for, independently of general principles, there are express provisions to the contrary in the treaty. Did we relinquish our right to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland? Certainly not—Or in the affairs of Naples? or of Turkey? or in those of any other part of the globe? Certainly not. That treaty precluded us in no instance from acting upon the system which became a great and generous nation, or from taking any reasonable opportunity that offered for succouring the distresses of others, and protecting the smaller states.

To apply, therefore, this general conduct of France since the treaty of Amiens, to the question of English grievances—Among the alleged aggressions of France, much stress had been laid upon her conduct relative to the German indemnities. Mr. Fox professed himself not to feel on that subject any greater degree of indignation towards the government of France than he felt towards all the other governments who were principles in that transaction. Every one of them had carried through that system in a manner which had most properly called forth the animadversions of the noble lord. He had himself always reprobated the system of indemnity and compensation. It was, and could be no other than, a system of common rapine. To take indemnities from the territories of other states by any authority than that of the rightful possessors, was, in one word, robbery. On this point his opinion had been uniform. With regard, however, to this principle of compensation, it was to be recollected, that it had originated with the treaty of Luneville; it had then been agreed upon by the two belligerent powers, neither of whom would grant any compensation to the other out of its own territory or possessions. The burthen, therefore, was to fall upon the German states. The principle had been adopted with a view to a long continuance of the settlement under it; and France, surely, was not more to blame than other powers in agreeing to those terms, for the sake of putting an end to further litigation. Into the question of right he would not enter; but to complain that Austria was a loser by it, was saying very little. It was impossible it could have been otherwise. Austria must necessarily have been a loser, from the circumstances attending the treaty of Campo Formio, and the subsequent renewal of the war. It was useless to discuss who was to blame for that renewal; but no man who recollected the unsuccessful campaigns of Austria, and, on the other hand, the successful campaigns of Buonaparté, could doubt that she must be the loser. To say that she was so, therefore, was saying no more than that an unsuccessful party in a contest will be a loser by that contest. It was, however, a material part of this case of the indemnities, that Russia was joined with France to carry them through. Whatever blame, therefore, belonged to the transaction, must be shared equally between them.

With respect to Piedmont, at the time of the treaty of Amiens it was, to all intents and purposes, a part of France: it constituted the 27th military Arrondissement. It belonged to France as effectually as Gibraltar belongs to us. At the time of the civil annexation, which is all that has taken place since the treaty, and which is the present subject of complaint, the name only was changed. The different rulers of France, since the revolution, have had the folly to change the names of every thing, and instead of the 27th military Arrondissement, Piedmont is now called the department of the Po. It was but giving two names to the same thing. Whether Piedmont ought to belong to France—whether it ought not to be restored to the King of Sardinia—were not questions for us to enter into at the present time. To all controversies of this sort there must be some given period: that period naturally would be the treaty. What passed on this subject between the two contracting parties at the preliminary treaty was to be compared with what had been assented to afterwards. Whatever had been stipulated for on the signature of the preliminaries, we had a right to insist upon, and whatever had been done contrary to those stipulations, it was our business to object to before the signature of the definitive treaty; but, after its signature, we had no right to complain of what had been done in the interim between the two. It was notorious, that at the conclusion of the treaty, Piedmont, although not called by the name of the department of the Po, was to all intents and purposes a province of France.

The next question was, the transaction respecting Switzerland; a transaction of a very different nature. The French government was bound by treaty, as well as by every principle of justice, to withdraw their troops from Switzerland, to leave that country to itself, even with the miserable government which they had established in it, and to respect its independence. During their dominion in that country they had formed a constitution there utterly repugnant to the principles, and odious to the feelings, of the people. The moment their troops were withdrawn, the people of Switzerland, by an insurrection founded on the truest principles of justice, rose and overturned that constitution. The French government interposed to restore it, and, bad as the system was, the manner of their interfering to restore it, was, if possible, worse. It has terminated, however, and so far the insurrection has been fortunate, in the establishment of a system rather more congenial with the popular sentiments, and appearing, at least, to possess some portion of freedom; since, in the democratic cantons, where the opposition to France first began, the people had very generally elected to their highest offices those who had been the most active in promoting it, and who had most helped to produce the subversion of the government which had been imposed upon them. This violent act of injustice on the part of France no man contemplated with more indignation than Mr. Fox. But was it, after all, an act particularly and peculiarly directed against Great Britain? He hardly knew whether he dared to speak upon this subject, since there were so many persons, both in and out of that House, who, whenever the name of the first consul was mentioned, thought that nothing too violent could be said against him, and that nothing he did, or ever could do, was fit to be endured. Was there, however, in this act of aggrandizement on the part of Buonaparté, any ingredient which made it appear, that it was meant by him to operate against Great Britain? Will any man believe that his sending troops into Switzerland was only with the view of testifying his aversion to this country? It may be said, indeed, that it was so meant, because it was an act of aggrandizement on the part of France, and every such act must be done with a view of hurting Great Britain: this, however, was pushing the construction upon human action to an outrageous degree; to a degree in which it could be supported upon no sound principle. It might with equal justice be argued, that every improvement in the internal condition of France, whether in her agriculture, her manufactures, her commerce, or her revenues, is contributory to her aggrandizement, and therefore intentionally injurious to us. It might equally be said, that the improvements of Brest, of Boulogne, or any other of her ports or harbours, are carried on, not merely for the interest of France, but with an immediate view to the prejudice of Great Britain. If this principle were true, we should be under the necessity of making war on France, and not only on France, but on every other power that attempted to better its condition by any means. What is worse, we could never make peace. France must be exterminated, were the principle true, that every thing she does for the increase of her own strength, is intended hostilely towards Great Britain. Upon the subject of Switzerland, however, what was there to have been done? Was it right to go to war about it? His answer would be, primâ facie, No! He would not say that circumstances might not have happened to justify our going to war; indeed, he thought the acts of France against Switzerland would have been a sufficient justification for it, if policy had permitted; all he was then contending for was, that the conduct of France in this instance, oppressive and tyrannical as it was, could not be taken as an act of hostility against us. He owned that for himself he had always been most anxious that this country should avoid a war on account of Switzerland. Under the then peculiarly unfavourable circumstances of Europe, he had a thorough conviction that we could not make such a war with any effect. Even if those circumstances had been less unfavourable, he should have deprecated the war, although professedly for the purpose of assisting the struggles of that gallant people for their liberties. Even if we could have got Austria to join us, was it sure that that power, was it quite sure that we ourselves, would have had no other object in view than the restoration of Switzerland to her independence? Could such professions, on the part of Austria, be any thing but rank hypocrisy? However good the cause, when that cause was to be only the pretence for war, and was put forward to conceal other purposes, he should be very little disposed to join in it. He could not, for this reason, attend much to the high language which was held about Switzerland; or to other topics which appeared to be introduced into the discussions, only to swell the catalogue of the crimes of France, and give a colour of popularity to the war. That Switzerland could not be one of the objects of the war, was proved by the very negotiation which had just been so unfortunately concluded. It appeared clearly from the correspondence, that if Lord Whitworth's last ultimatum had been acceded to, poor Switzerland would have been forgotten, and left to her fate!

Mr. Fox then proceeded to what he called a still more serious case; he meant the intolerable injustice with which France had treated the republic of Holland. Their conduct in this respect was of a nature that called for the expression of his warmest reprobation. It was one of those acts to which, the stronger the words in which it should be described, the more applicable would they be to its guilt. It was an act to be equalled by nothing but those which prevailed in countries where a difference of colour seemed to have shut up the hearts of men, and extinguished every sentiment of compassion. "Were I a master of the use of colours," said Mr. Fox, "and could paint with skill, I would take the darkest to delineate the conduct of France towards Holland. It certainly has been worse treated by her than any other country whatever. Holland has not only suffered all the evils of war which are unavoidable;

but when peace came, to turn that country, in defiance of a positive treaty with her, into a depôt for French troops, for the mere purpose, I sincerely believe, of making the Dutch pay the expense of maintaining them, was an act no less despicable for its meanness, than hateful for its atrocity." Now, Holland had been spoken of by an hon. gentleman as if it were to be considered as a kind of outpost for France, by which she could more readily annoy Great Britain. How far that might be true, he would not then discuss; but even those who pretended to the best knowledge of the dispositions and intentions of Buonaparté, would hardly say, that they believed the sending these troops to Holland had any reference whatever to Great Britain. For his part, he verily believed it was for the sole purpose of having them fed and clothed at the expense of Holland. It was a refinement in reasoning which he could not understand, to contend that they were brought there, not for present use, but for the purpose of being employed at some other period, when it might be done to better advantage; that they were kept there as a sort of stratagem, in order to prevent this country from taking an alarm when their design of invading us should be ripe. This, however, he would tell the ministers,—that it was their duty to have remonstrated against the occupation of Holland; and in remonstrating, to have taken the highest ground. Had ministers done so, they would have had the feelings of the Dutch nation with them, and the opinion and good wishes of Europe. What ought to have been their precise course it was not for him to tell them; but a direct and spirited remonstrance on the affairs of Holland specifically, not deferred until after his majesty's message to parliament, but immediately on the arrival of lord Whitworth to Paris, ought to have been presented to the French government. This representation should have been made not privately, not couched in peevish language,—such was always beneath the dignity of a great nation, and never could answer any good purpose,—but in an open, candid, manly remonstrance; in terms fit to be published in every part of the globe, as the language of an independent and powerful people. He could not, indeed, undertake to answer positively for the success of such a measure. But it was his firm belief that, if Great Britain had only presented a remonstrance, and had done so without any menace of declaring war in case of refusal, such an endeavour would have had a favourable effect on the affairs of Holland, on the general opinion of Europe, and on the subsequent conduct of France herself.

These material consequences, he was confident, might have been produced if the ministers had taken the proper time for remonstrating. All that they now appear to have done is to have mentioned Holland to the first consul! Now, it was fair to observe, that if this was all they thought proper to do, they had received in return all that they were entitled to expect. They had the assurances of the first consul that he would evacuate Holland as soon as the discussions between the two governments should be terminated. These promises were, at least, fair: and, after the manner in which they had interfered, promises were all the ministers could look for.

The conduct of the French government in thus occupying Holland with their troops, was no less unjust, and eventually, he trusted, would prove no less unwise and impolitic than the attempt to reduce St. Domingo to its former condition of servitude. It had been said, that the expedition to St. Domingo was no affair of ours; that the principles of mere humanity or the consideration of what might turn out to the advantage of the inhabitants of that devoted island, gave us no right to interpose on that occasion. Supposing this country, indeed, to be guided by the dry dis-social principle of self-interest alone, Mr. Fox agreed that that expedition gave us not the smallest reason to complain. So far he agreed with the ministers, and differed from a right hon. gentleman upon the floor (Mr. Windham); that expedition, on the contrary, he conceived to have been one of the most absurd and foolish ever undertaken for the interests of France herself. Not only it was not dangerous to this country, but in one view it had been highly advantageous; since it had employed the forces of France, occupied her attention, and weakened her resources. This had been done without bringing her any benefit in return, since every one saw that the object of the expedition had been lost; it was lost chiefly from the conduct which had been observed towards the blacks, and particularly towards Toussaint, by the person who had the command in that island; a conduct which he considered as implicating and forming a material blot in the character of Buonaparté himself. Here Mr. Fox took occasion to regret the little attention which was paid to these events in England, under the vulgar supposition of their being foreign to British interests; to condemn the fatal weakness which prevailed over the chief part of mankind, rendering them indifferent to the fate of others at a distance; and to reprobate that still more inexcusable apathy, the true source of the wickedness with which all countries, without exception, had treated the blacks, and which seemed to deaden the heart of man to the sufferings of those of his species who happened not to resemble him in complexion. He considered it as a great reproach to this country not to have seized the very first moment of a good understanding with France, to concert measures with her for the extirpation of that dreadful evil, that disgrace to human nature, the slave trade—this he should always consider and lament as a valuable opportunity lost, on a most interesting and important subject.

The last transaction to be considered, under this first head of complaint, was the taking possession of Parma and Placentia. It did not appear by any thing known to the public, whether or not those territories were allotted to France, by any treaty which existed previous to the treaty with us. He believed that the reversion of them to France was insured by a treaty with Spain, entered into during the life of the late duke. It was his opinion, however, under all the circumstances of the rest of the continent, that this was now become a matter of very inferior importance. He adverted to it rather as a subject of regret, than as constituting a ground of war. Most of the others he had mentioned were of the same description: all were subjects of regret, many of them of reproach; although, in his judgment, nothing was of any comparative weight when placed against the transactions in regard to Holland.

Mr. Fox next proceeded to those subjects which constituted the second class of complaints against France, those, namely, which were to be considered under the head of insults, contradistinguished from actual injuries. This question included one of a very wide and general nature, namely, how far the language which the two countries had held towards each other was to be considered as forming a just ground of reciprocal hostility. No one who knew any thing of the constitution of England, or the spirit and temper of its people, could expect that we should condescend even to discuss a proposition with France, which had for its object any diminution of the liberty of the press. This great privilege, he, of all men, was not likely to be suspected of a disposition to surrender. If he would not surrender it to please the government of his own country, much less would he consent to do so for the sake of pleasing the government of any other. This point he would not condescend to argue—it was entirely out of all question. The proposition of France, however, on this head, whatever it may have been, was rejected by us, and in that rejection France acquiesced. Grossly absurd, therefore, as such a proposition was, and founded in complete ignorance of the nature of our constitution, it could not now be considered any farther as an insult, or as the evidence of a hostile mind actually existing. It was true, that out of the liberty, or rather out of the abuse of the liberty of the press, many partial evils, forming just ground of mutual complaint between the two countries, might arise. They had arisen in the present case. Certain publications had produced, what it was natural for them to produce in the minds of nine people out of ten, namely, disgust and irritation. This feeling had been strongly excited on both sides, and, as it appeared, with mutual and very successful industry. It was, indeed, a feeling of bitterness and animosity, which tended in a great measure to undo the good effects of peace, and prepare the minds of the people in both countries for the renewal of the war. Great and serious, however, as was this mischief, still he could not consent to see the freedom of the press abridged; but if abuse was to go on, it was his earnest wish that hostilities at least between the two countries should be confined to the newspapers. This species of warfare, if not the most glorious, was undoubtedly the safest. In the first of poems by the first of poets, it had been recommended to two combatants just preparing to engage in battle; and that poet, who was no less a man than Homer, put his advice into the mouth of the goddess of wisdom herself—"Put up your swords," she says, "and then abuse each other as long as you please." "Such was the advice," plaint advanced by the French government. Mr. Fox, "I gave in this House to both countries long ago. Would to God it had been followed! for weak, foolish, and contemptible as abuse may be, it most certainly is a lesser calamity than war." Such a species of warfare, was one in which neither party was likely to experience any failure of ammunition. This seemed to have been regularly imported, and in sufficient quantities, from both countries. The chief consul complains that, during a certain period, every packet-boat that passed from Dover to Calais, brought over a cargo of libels. Now, this might appear a curious manner of freighting vessels, but it was singular enough that the glorious poet, quoted before, should have imagined the very same thing; for, in another part of the Iliad, upon a similar occasion, he says, "as to abuse, you may have a ship-load of it if you please!" We may conclude, therefore, that the exportation of libels from one country to another was of very ancient practice, and that Homer spoke literally and not figuratively, unless we can suppose him to have had the gift of prescience as to the contents of the packet-boats which crossed during the last summer from Dover to Calais.

Returning to the serious part of this subject. Mr. Fox said, that although no ground for war, this violent abuse was fit matter of complaint on both sides. It was true, that the ministers of this country might state a wide difference in the case of libels between the two countries, and might allege that the ministers of France had the means of restraining them, while no such power existed in Great Britain. Literally speaking, this certainly was true; and God forbid that it should be otherwise! but was there any man who heard him who could not give some guess at least how matters of this sort were always managed even here? Was there any news-writer really so unacquainted with proceedings of this nature, as not to know that there were certain modes of abuse, which according to their direction against particular persons, were more or less agreeable to the king's ministers? Were there really no means for them to come to any understanding with those ministers on such a subject? He could not believe there were many persons who heard him of such a primitive simplicity as not to be in the least aware of what he was advertising to; nor could the French be quite so ignorant as to believe, where they see newspapers teeming with incessant abuse of a foreign power for months together, that it is or that it can be, the serious wish of ministers to prevent it; or that if, they fail, it is for want of the means of accomplishing such an object. They will scarcely be prevailed upon to believe that the only influence, possessed by a minister of state over the newspapers, is derived from a preference shown by them to one editor over another in the sending advertisements, or communicating articles of public information. Even this, however, is considerable, when the value of such information to the public and consequently to the editor is taken into the account. A French minister, too, on his part, might probably reply to a remonstrance from us in a similar manner. He might lament the necessity they were under in France of restraining the liberty of the press. He might profess the highest admiration of that liberty, and the greatest reluctance to fetter it by any restrictions, assuring us, that their only motive was the protection of their own internal government from the effects of libels, but that they had too high a respect for the press to think of interfering with its privileges any farther. He might then call on us to exercise the power we possess by the alien act to stop at least the source of some of those libels; and to our answer that the powers of that act are applicable only to foreigners who should attempt disturbances against the government at home, and not to such as should attempt any thing against those of foreign states, he might retort upon us—"This, too, is the only power we can exercise over our own press. We detest all infringements of its liberties as well as you. We detest the libelling system as much as you do. We wish it were abrogated altogether, but we have not the means. All the power we exercise over the press is limited to the security of our own domestic tranquillity." Such might be the arguments on both sides, and much, indeed, was it to be lamented that the facts in this case were such as not only to have a tendency to create, but actually to have created, in France as well as in England, that degree of soreness and irritation, which, in his opinion, had had so large a share in accelerating the present crisis.

This led him to the consideration of another alleged insult, namely, the comment on the subject of the protection afforded by us to certain French refugees. The demand to send them away Mr. Fox reprobated in the strongest terms. It was his sentiment, he said, that let a man, be he a native of France, of England, or of any other country, observe but the duties of good neighbourhood and submission to the laws, he ought never to be molested for his opinions, in what corner of the world soever he should retire for refuge. Crimes alone could bring him under the judicial cognizance of any just government. To deny any man, be his condition or rank what it might, or coming from whatever part of the globe, the rights of hospitality for his political principles, would be cruel, cowardly, and totally unworthy of the British character. "The demand," said Mr. Fox, "that we should send out of this country persons obnoxious to the government of France, is made upon a most false and most dangerous principle. If it could be so established between the two states, that we should send away from England every person whom it might please the French government to call a rebel; and that reciprocally to please us, France should send away every person obnoxious to the ministers of this country; and if it were possible to conceive the still further extension of this principle among the other governments of Europe, every unfortunate man, who might either from sentiment, connexion, or accident, have been led or driven into some act of resistance, would be exposed to the same dangers, and incur the same penalties, as if he had been taken in actual arms against his country. The union of the two governments of England and France would effectually preclude him from any asylum any where, and would hunt him from the face of the globe. To give up men of this description, therefore, would be the worst and basest act I am capable of conceiving. No man, I believe, is more a lover of peace than I am. No one, perhaps,—and I hope not to be suspected at this time of bearing hard upon an unfortunate and fallen family, when I say it—no one, perhaps, politically speaking, has less respect than I have for the house of Bourbon; yet I am ready to declare, that for that family, nay, for the worst prince of that family, if among them there should be a bad one, I should be ready to draw my sword and to go to war, rather than comply with a demand to withdraw from him the hospitality to which he had trusted. I say this with regard to persons against whom no crime is alleged; there certainly, however, does prevail at Paris, how justly I know not, a belief, or a strong suspicion, that several persons concerned in the plot against the first consul's life, have not only found protection in England, but are carrying on further intrigues against the peace of the two countries. Whether this opinion be well or ill founded, I am ignorant, and indeed should be very slow to believe it (for God knows I am not remarkably credulous in favour of assertions unaccompanied by evidence), but there exists undoubtedly such an opinion, and that certain individuals, to the number of three, now actually in England or very lately so, were concerned in an attempt on the life of Buonaparté. Am I to judge these men guilty of this crime because they are accused of it? God forbid! But when charges of such a nature are brought against individuals by name, and those individuals are within our reach, I think it but due to all parties, to those who are the objects of the charge as well as those who prefer it, that some inquiry should take place into the fact, and that the result, whatever it may be, should be fairly represented and made known. This is a duty we owe not only to France, but to ourselves; for the hostility of a great and generous nation gives no countenance to crimes, even against its worst enemies."

Mr. Fox then proceeded to advert to other topics of complaint under the head of insults, particularly a declaration of the first consul in his speech to the Swiss deputies. It is stated, that in that speech the Swiss were directed by him to beware of forming any connexion with England. Although this declaration made no part of the official charges against France, at which he greatly wondered, Mr. Fox considered it as one of the strongest and most important grounds of complaint, of any which had been adduced. Where the first magistrate of a powerful nation tells another country, that it must have nothing to do with a third, it is an offence which ought to be made the subject of a grave and serious remonstrance. As it was only in the newspapers that he had read this fact, it might possibly not be true: but if it were true, if the first consul had really told the people of Switzerland that they must have no connexion or communication with Great Britain, he had no difficulty in saying, that it ought to have been distinctly complained of, and explanation demanded of the French government. One of two things would have followed had this course been taken; if the words had not been used, they would have been disavowed, and so we should have received complete satisfaction; if they had been used, they might have been atoned for by an apology, and we should thus have derived the benefit of teaching the first consul the propriety of abstaining in future from such offensive language.

Two other points, applicable to this branch of the subject, remained to be considered; the one regarded an expression in the Exposé of the chief consul to the legislative body of the state of the republic: it is there said, that "England alone is not able to contend against France." All expressions of this sort were highly to be condemned. Offensive comparisons serve only to create or inflame a spirit of mutual jealousy and national hatred. In his opinion, it would be much wiser to treat them with contempt. Of this, however, he was perfectly sure, that if they were to be noticed at all, they ought to be made the ground of an immediate demand for satisfaction; it was utterly wrong to suffer them to lie rankling in the minds of the people, and afterwards to bring them forward for purposes of mere irritation. The other point was the passage alluded to in the official papers on Sebastiani's report. With respect to certain expressions in that report, undoubtedly they contained very insulting matter, even if there were no other objection to it. Both the matter itself and the manner of expressing it, were highly injurious and unmanly. In one part of this report, a charge is brought forward against general Steward for incapacity: such charges are indecent enough, when individuals only are the authors of them; but when governments adopt them with a view to wound the feelings of those who have no adequate means of resenting it, their conduct is to the highest degree unpardonable. And what can be more galling to the feelings of a man, especially of a military man, than to hold him out as incapable of his duty? Fortunately, in the present instance, this accusation of incapacity fell upon a worthy and distinguished officer, whose character stood too high in the service to be affected by such an imputation. But there was another and a more serious charge, a charge of giving encouragement to assassination, which assuredly demanded from the king's ministers the most prompt and vigorous remonstrance to the French government.

Such were briefly, Mr. Fox said, the complaints, and such had been the manner in which the king's ministers had treated those complaints, on the two heads on which he had argued, namely, the conduct of France towards foreign states, and the instances of insult, as distinguished from injuries, offered to us by the use of offensive language. The next subject of difference was that of their seizing our ships and detaining our property, and the refusal to grant an adequate redress. In judging of these offences, it is fit first to ascertain how far they have arisen out of the operation of hostile laws, and how far out of the partiality of their application. Most of the French laws on this subject Mr. Fox understood to have been passed during the heats of the Revolution, and to be still retained: in this case the complaint was properly against the existence of such laws; laws, to the last degree unwise and impolitic. It was, indeed, highly absurd in France, with the desire to become a commercial nation, to make or to continue laws so inimical to the growth of commerce; but at the same time he must assert the right, not of France alone, but of every independent state in the world, and most emphatically of Great Britain, who stood more in need of indulgence on this subject than perhaps any other nation—the absolute and uncontrollable right, where no treaties exist to the contrary, to establish such exclusive laws for the protection of their commerce as they may think fit, and to put every prohibition they please upon the merchandize and shipping of other states. This was a right, which, whether well or ill understood, judiciously or indiscreetly made use of, it never could be disputed was inherent in every independent nation. Great Britain had always acted on these principles. Could it be pretended that any other power had carried them farther? Great Britain, it would be confessed, had an equal, if not a superior degree of interest in the general success of commerce, to any other nation in Europe, and yet we had passed many laws with regard to our own, the object of which was the total exclusion of all other states from a participation of its benefits. This was eminently the case in the act of navigation, which secured to us the monopoly of the West India trade: that act, which had been passed under the protectorate of Cromwell, was found to agree so well with all the principles of our commercial policy, that it was afterwards persevered in by the family who were restored to the throne; and to a steady perseverance in it, a great part of our commercial and naval ascendancy was owing. Of the general principle, therefore, of protection by exclusive regulations, we had no right to complain. If the injuries offered to individuals had arisen from the nature of the laws of France, they were out of the present consideration: but if those individuals had suffered injuries contrary to the laws of France, or inconsistent with the provisions of any subsisting treaty, it was the business of government to procure redress. Of all the grounds of remonstrance which could exist, an insult or injury offered to a British subject, was that, in which, above all others, they would be sure of support: this matter, therefore, ought to have been wholly left out of the king's declaration, for it was owing to the laches of the king's ministers if redress were not obtained; and if redress were obtained, the complaint ought not to have been mentioned.

Next came the subject of the commercial commissioners; and here Mr. Fox had no difficulty in saying, that as it appeared to him by the papers, that the persons who were sent hither under colour and pretence of being commercial commissioners, were military men, and in effect no better than spies, it was a shameful attempt to impose upon us for a most mischievous purpose; and therefore there was but one course to be pursued, namely, that of sending them out of this country immediately, and immediately also (for this was not a matter for delay) applying to France for explanation and satisfaction, for having sent them here under such false colours, and for such disguised objects. It might be asked why he, who appeared so strenuous upon this matter, and who had of late been so regular in his attendance in parliament, had never mentioned this circumstance before. His reason was, simply, that he did not know it before; and it appeared to him that ministers, by never naming it in parliament when all the facts were in their possession, did not think it a matter worthy of parliamentary investigation. He therefore could have no duty to perform upon the subject, because he knew nothing of the transaction; but if ministers knew of such an act of aggression, it was their duty instantly, not only to represent the matter, but to remonstrate upon it, and to demand satisfaction of France.

With regard to the manifesto which appeared in one of the Hamburg journals, Mr. Fox conceived that there was the less necessity for mentioning it as a cause for war, since there had been a promise to disavow it on the part of the French government. The negotiation had unfortunately broken off before that promise could be carried into effect; but the paper itself had been disavowed by Talleyrand distinctly; an assurance was given to our ambassador that the French government had not authorized the publication by their minister at Hamburg; that his conduct should be strictly inquired into, and that full reparation should be given us. With regard to the contents of that paper, undoubtedly they were highly offensive. But what he objected to chiefly was, the manner of its publication. If it were true (as it had been stated) that the French minister did actually insist on having it inserted by an order from the senate, it was impossible to conceive a more gross violation of the freedom of an independent state. We complain of this, and very properly. France says she will disavow it. In consequence of the rupture of the negotiation, that promise certainly was left unperformed; but from all that had passed on the subject before, there was no reason to think that it would not have been kept.

The language of the first consul in his interviews with our ambassador had been also the subject of much discussion. It seemed by many gentlemen to be considered as carrying with it such decisive proofs of a general spirit of hostility, as to completely justify the renewal of actual hostilities on our part. One public conversation at the Thuileries, in particular, was triumphantly held up in support of that opinion. This conversation had been variously related, and certainly the accounts of several persons, present at the time when it took place, represent the language used very differently from the manner in which it is stated in the papers on the table. He thought it, indeed, a great misfortune that lord Whitworth should have laid so much stress on the unfavourable nature of any verbal communication. He spoke this with reference to lord Whitworth's private interview with the first consul. For that noble lord, personally, Mr. Fox professed great esteem, and a high opinion both of his judgment and his probity; but all men knew how difficult it was to retain in the memory every minute particular of a conversation of two hours, when no part of it was reduced into writing at the time. But whatever might have been the turn of it, it was worth considering, whether the offence given by the terms of such a conversation might not be overbalanced by the advantage of discovering the intentions of an enemy from his own intemperate language.

Having thus gone through the various charges advanced against the government of France by his majesty's ministers, as motives to war under the head of insult, he would observe, that whatever expressions were used by the chief consul, whether they were more or less favourable to pacification, it must always be remembered that words are very fleeting, very liable to misconception, and to be imperfectly reported; that, in short, they are of little or no value, except when they are accompanied by acts; but whatever interpretation these words of the first consul might really bear, certainly those of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Addington), on opening the budget, gave to this country fair hopes that we were in a state of profound peace. The members of that House could not have forgotten the language he used, when, at the close of the last year, he laid before them a flattering picture of the commercial prosperity of the country. From no part of his language on that occasion was it possible to draw any other inference, than that he wished the House to believe that there "was not the least room to apprehend any interruption of the peace." So the right hon. gentleman's expressions had been generally understood by those who heard them. So they had been understood by the public. This opinion had been confirmed by facts infinitely stronger than the recollection of any member of that House; for, in addition to their speeches, ministers sent orders to give up the Cape of Good Hope a second time. They also manifested their disposition to surrender Malta according to the treaty. This was not only speaking but acting as if we were in a state of profound peace, for he would not suppose that ministers could be weak enough to give those orders when they had any real apprehension that the peace could not be maintained. Why did he insist so much upon this point? It was to anticipate an answer, and to guard against a species of reasoning, which he allowed to be fair in general, but which he denied to be applicable to the present subject, considered under the circumstances which had led to his majesty's message on the 8th of March. It had been argued, and in many cases it might be argued fairly, that a variety of subjects of complaint might exist between two nations, not one of which standing by itself would constitute a sufficient cause for war; but that these subjects of complaint, when accumulated together, might very justly become so. It was inferred from hence, that each article being, of itself, just ground of complaint, although not so great as to justify us in proceeding to extremities, might be borne separately, but that the accumulation of them was intolerable. He had not forgotten the old proverb, that "It is the last ounce which breaks the horse's back;"—and certainly a scale may be so nicely balanced that a feather more or less would turn it. "But if ministers were so enormously loaded with the injuries of their country, that another ounce would have broken their backs, and if at Christmas their difficulties were so nicely balanced that a feather would turn the scale, I tell them," said Mr. Fox, "that they ought not to have declared that 'they saw no ground for apprehending war;' for by saying so, they deluded their country. If the French had accumulated together such a mass of insults and outrages as to make ministers see that the period was coming at which they could no longer be endured, they are highly criminal in having flattered the nation so continually with the hopes of peace; and are guilty of the ruin and misery which has ensued from it to so many unfortunate individuals."

Mr. Fox came next to the great article on which the war rested, namely, Malta. Before, however, he considered any of the arguments which respected the immediate state of the question relative to Malta, he thought it necessary to advert to, and to express his dissent from, some general opinions on this subject which had been advanced during the discussion. He could manifest his own no better, perhaps, than by following the course and order of the expressions which had been used by a learned gentleman (Mr.

Dallas) who had spoken for the first time on that day, and on the acquisition of whose talents he congratulated the House; talents, the display of which was not unexpected to him, who had had an opportunity of admiring them on a great occasion in another place.* In giving his vote for the present address, the learned gentleman had vindicated the expediency of the war, as it was for Malta; as it was not for Malta alone, but for Egypt; as it was not for Egypt alone, but for India; as it was not for India alone, but for the vital interests of Great Britain. Every one of these four propositions Mr. Fox denied; he denied that Malta was worth a war by itself; he denied that Malta was worth it as essential to the security of Egypt; he denied that Egypt was essential to the security of India; he denied that our Indian possessions, with all their vast importance, which he knew and acknowledged as much as any man, were essential to the vital interests of Great Britain. All these points had been thoroughly discussed in the debates on the preliminary and definitive treaties. Not having himself much geographical knowledge applicable to the question of the importance of Malta to this country, he would rest his opinion upon authorities infinitely greater than his own on all such subjects, and most emphatically so on the present. He would not examine at that time the opinion given in great detail by a gallant friend of his (general Maitland), during that debate; nor wherein it differed from that which he had formerly delivered; but he remembered well that on the discussion of the definitive treaty, authorities no less than those of lord St. Vincent and lord Nelson were produced to prove that Malta was not a convenient station for the protection either of Egypt or the Levant, nor worth the continuance of war for the sake of obtaining a commanding influence in the Mediterranean; he also recollected one of the most able defenders of the peace of Amiens (Mr. Pitt), while he was arguing upon the necessity of making some cessions with a view to obtain peace, stating, that if it were put to him whether those cessions should be in the East Indies, in the West Indies, or the Mediterranean, he would answer—"in the Mediterranean." Mr. Fox confessed himself to have been of a different opinion, and that he should have preferred Malta, but still more Minorca, which he considered of infinitely more value than Malta, to Trinidad; but the opinions to which he had referred were sufficient to prove, that until the present moment no eminent man had attached that degree of importance to the possession of Malta, which it seemed to be now so much the fashion to attribute to it.

With regard to Egypt, Mr. Fox could not be persuaded that it was by any means the key to our East Indian territories; he could not help thinking, that from national sentiments of a most laudable kind, a degree of consequence had been attached to Egypt, which it did not in reality possess. The invasion of Egypt he had always considered as the most romantic and idle undertaking that ever was entered upon by France. Whether it was wise in us to undertake the recovery of it was another question. Great stress, however, had always been laid upon that expedition. The possession of Egypt had been the cause of continuing the war; its conquest from France had been the means of facilitating the peace. Egypt, likewise, was the theatre on which British valour became the most triumphant and British glory had been most signalized both by land and sea. The memory of our exploits in Egypt had impressed the minds of men in general with ideas of romance—with a sort of superstition which had given to that country an importance which had never before been discovered to belong to it; but surely it would not be gravely contended, that, because a British army had gained a splendid victory over the veteran troops of France, we ought ever after to insist on the possession of the spot on which that victory was obtained, in order to secure it from all harm, and protect it against any future invasion. What would have been thought of us if we had insisted on the plain of Blenheim after the battle, if we had regarded it as consecrated ground, never to be abandoned after that glorious event—an event not to be less highly valued than the achievements of a Nelson at Aboukir, or of an Abercrombie and a Hutchinson in Egypt? What seas should we ever quit or what territories should we ever surrender, if we were to retain all that had ever witnessed the triumphs of the British name?

"With regard to the East Indies," said Mr. Fox, "I conceive it to be a very

exaggerated statement of their value to call our possessions there the vital strength of the British empire. Surely the learned gentleman (Mr. Dallas) will not venture to describe our dominion in the East, or the fame which has attended our acquisition of it, in quite such enthusiastic language as that in which he has dwelt upon the classic glories of Egypt. That part of the world, undoubtedly, has contributed most of any to the vast increase of our dominion: it has not contributed in an equal degree to the honour of the British name;—it is not there that our character stands the most unblemished. And here I cannot help considering, while we are calling other nations to account, while we are crying out against the aggrandizement of France since the signature of the treaty of Amiens, whether others might not ask, which of the two nations has aggrandized itself the most, France in Europe, or Great Britain in India? Have you not added vast territories to your empire in India, just as France has done to hers in Europe, some by the effect of war, and some by direct annexation? I rather think, if you go back a little, and look at certain transactions, few countries would suffer more in character on the score of aggrandizement than Great Britain. We lay stress on aggrandizement, in Europe, and they may do so on aggrandizement in India; nor, do I know what defence we can set up against the accusation, unless we adopt a humorous one, which is said to have been made by a lady, who, on her return to Europe after a long residence in that part of the world, was charged with some irregularities of conduct, and who, having been questioned as to several specific instances, exclaimed, “No, never! never, upon my honour, on this side of the Cape of Good Hope?” But on the subject of Egypt—I wish to know whether I am to understand what has been advanced as an hyperbole of eloquence, or a grave determination. Are we to go to war the instant the French only think of Egypt. Is this the first time they have thought of it: Did not M. de Vergennes in 1786 entertain such a plan, and employ an agent to go to Egypt for a purpose similar to that which appears in the report of Sebastiani? The right hon. gentleman opposite to me (Mr. Pitt) was then minister. How did he act? Did he make war on France? Did he remonstrate? Did he ever offer a representation upon the subject? No, Sir; he entered into no dispute with M. de Vergennes, but he entered into a treaty of commerce with him.”

Mr. Fox then entered more at large into the discussion of the article concerning Malta, which formed, as he contended, the substance of our whole immediate dispute with France. It was clear and indisputable that we had bound ourselves to give up the possession of Malta when it should be in a certain state. The 10th article of the treaty was said to have been entirely and solely drawn up by the ministers of this country. That article he desired to be read. [It was read accordingly.] By this it appears, that ministers bound themselves to surrender the island to the order of St. John, within a given period, when the three contingencies following should have happened: 1. When a grand master should have been appointed; 2. When a garrison of Neapolitans should have arrived to take possession of the place; and, 3. When certain powers should have been invited to guarantee its independence. These conditions have been fulfilled. The grand master has been chosen; the Neapolitans have arrived; and Russia, Prussia, Spain, and Austria, have been invited according to the stipulation to become the guaranties. Ministers knew very well,—they could not pretend to assert the contrary,—that the completion of this last stipulation was not deemed essential to the two former, or a sine quâ non of the evacuation of the island. It is stated, however, that there were other important articles to be executed before ministers could be peremptorily called on to fulfil this part of the treaty. Certain revenues were to be appropriated to the maintenance of the order; and these revenues having been confiscated, and the priories abolished in Spain and Bavaria, ministers gave us to understand that these acts were done by the contrivance of the French government, in order the more easily to obtain repossession of the island; consequently, that we ought to continue the occupation of it ourselves. The reasoning of ministers on this point he was at a loss to comprehend. According to their argument, France, it seems, always wished to throw difficulties in the way of our executing that part of the treaty. What! to throw difficulties in the way of our giving up Malta? No—but difficulties in the way of our being enabled to do so with safety to ourselves, which amounted to the same thing. This would be a singular policy enough, considering the earnest representations made to us to evacuate the place, and the eagerness alleged to be shown by the first consul to get into it. But, of what nature were those difficulties? Certain priories had been abolished. Of what advantage could their abolition be to France? What! was it from the knights of Spain that the first consul apprehended such an opposition to his schemes, that he determined upon reducing them to beggary, by sequestrating the funds appropriated to their support? Was it from the sturdy knights of Bavaria that he feared such a resolute resistance, if they should once get a footing in the island, that he should never after be able to prevail over the independence of the order? What, he would ask, could France expect to gain by such a proceeding? What other effect could it have, except that of giving us a pretence for delaying the execution of the treaty, on the ground of the inability of the order to maintain itself, and to garrison the island? But even this case is provided for: If the knights should not be strong enough to take charge of the place at the period fixed for its evacuation, the Neapolitan troops were to stay so much the longer. If 2,000 Neapolitans should not be found sufficient to hold it until the definitive arrangements, provision is made for the sending of more. The native Maltese shall have half the garrison, and if the order should not be strong enough to supply the other half, they may recruit for the remainder from the natives of those countries, and it is limited to those countries only, that shall continue to possess langues, while the general independence of the island is provided for under the guarantee of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. All these powers, except Russia, had formally undertaken the guarantee; the only remaining difficulty, therefore, was, to procure her accession to it. Ministers seemed to be very angry that the French were not so much in earnest as themselves for Russia to become a guarantee of the arrangement. It would have been better, to be sure, if they had been equally so; it surely was natural, however, considering all things, that we should testify rather more anxiety than the French for the object in question. A requisition had been made by us, in which France afterwards joined, to the emperor of Russia to become a party to this article of the treaty, and we received in answer a proposal from Russia, accompanied by a note, which Mr. Fox was astonished had not been laid on the table of the House. In the note with which this proposal was accompanied, a most extraordinary circumstance first comes to light. It appears that the emperor of Russia had previously made known to us, that he could not consent to become a guarantee, unless that part of the article, which provided for the establishment of a Maltese langue, should be abrogated. It appears too, that at the very time we were pretending so much earnestness about this guarantee, and soliciting the emperor to accede to it, we knew it could not be complied with; we knew why it could not be complied with; we knew that a compliance with it would be "inconsistent with what had been agreed upon anterior to the treaty of Amiens between his imperial majesty and ourselves, with respect to the order of Malta, and the independence and neutrality of the island." It appears, nevertheless, that for the sake of obliging respectively Great Britain and France, and this not for Russian purposes, but for the most laudable of all purposes, namely, the preservation of the peace of Europe, his imperial majesty, is ready to become a guarantee on any other condition whatever which could be thought of as necessary, or best calculated to secure the independence of the island. This proposal is refused. Why? of what possible consequence is it to us whether a Maltese langue should exist or not? And what other steps do the ministers take to provide for the re-establishment of the order? They immediately propose to France that she should consent to our keeping Malta for ten years! Here, therefore, is the tenderness of ministers for the rights of the order of Malta! Let us but have the place for ten years, and the knights may go back to Rome if they please, and shift for themselves as they can! Ministers require what they call additional security and indemnity, and thus the British faith is violated, and a solemn treaty remains unfulfilled. As to any compensation, or any security to the Maltese themselves, against either France or England, there could have been no difficulty in procuring it, when so important an object as that of preserving the British character clear and unblemished, and of carrying into effect the spirit of the article of the treaty, was in view.

After all these difficulties, however,

respecting the langues and the sale of the priories, and so forth, had been got over;—after the question of the guarantee itself had been so settled as to induce government to take measures towards evacuating the island according to the treaty, appears the report of Sebastiani, and instantly the whole system of ministers is changed! That report contained the proof that an accredited military agent had been sent by the first consul to take a survey of the different parts of the Turkish empire, particularly Egypt, and also perhaps to hold out to the people of that country some ideas of a future connexion with France. That the mission of Sebastiani made a disclosure of the wishes and ulterior views of the first consul, Mr. Fox was ready to acknowledge; but was it any new discovery? Buonaparté had a desire (and here he adverted to the distinction drawn by Mr. T. Grenville, between a desire and a design), of recovering Egypt. It is said that, having that desire, the moment he sent a military person thither, he gave a proof of his design to attempt the re-conquest of it. This seemed to Mr. Fox an unwarrantable conclusion. What was published with regard to general Stewart, indeed, was grossly insolent; but the other part of it which regarded Egypt, was, in any view to its re-occupation, perfectly absurd. To find out that it was absurd was no great discovery, and required not the testimony afforded by the internal evidence of the paper itself; and as to the boasted refinements of French policy and prudence, surely they would have found out a better mode of insuring the success of an expedition to Egypt (if an expedition had been seriously their intention), than by publishing the letter which disclosed it. “If, however, the desire to obtain Egypt, such as it is proved by that letter, be a sufficient ground for war,” said Mr. Fox, “again I repeat it, you never can be at peace, and you never could have been at peace, while the house of Bourbon was on the throne of France. Name the year since the peace of Utrecht in which you could have been at peace, if such a proceeding as this would have induced you to go to war? I am not now speaking of any of the revolutionary governments, or of the anarchy of France, but of the government of France under the regular rule of the house of Bourbon. Look at the several treaties of peace of 1749, of 1763, and of 1783. After the conclusion of peace on each of these occasions, one year did not elapse before France showed some signs of hostility to this country, against the true spirit of those treaties. And what is there of novelty in the present proceeding? I wish to know of those in any degree conversant with modern history, whether they have never heard of the military embassies of the French governments? Of the surveys taken by those to whom the embassies were entrusted, and of the means adopted by them to sound the dispositions of the people through whose countries they passed? I have, Sir, in support of my assertion, a remarkable and a powerful authority in the noble lord opposite (Hawkesbury). That noble lord told the House in his speech upon the peace, that scarcely a twelvemonth had elapsed after the conclusion of the treaty of 1783, before the restless spirit of the court of France began to show itself in India, and to manifest views, in that quarter of the world, inconsistent with the treaty just concluded, and incompatible with our safety. Am I, then, to understand that, if the noble lord had been secretary of state at those different periods, he would have advised his majesty to declare war against France? If I am, then I say we should not have had peace for any one whole year from 1749 to 1803.”

Mr. Fox next proceeded to comment on that part of the conversation between lord Whitworth and the first consul, which avowed his general views relative to Egypt. The ministers had appeared greatly alarmed at their disclosure. He confessed that he could not see in that disclosure any fresh ground of apprehension, as it taught them nothing they might not have been fully aware of before; nothing, indeed, which they had not themselves proved that they were aware of before, by the very act of their stipulations on the subject of Malta. Some of the conversation had been misrepresented in a manner unworthy the importance of that debate. Whatever might be his opinion respecting other parts of the chief consul's conduct, on which he had not been backward in saying what he thought,—whatever he might think of many passages in that conversation, he would own that it appeared to him to carry with it a certain character of frankness which he could not find it in his mind to condemn. He tells us fairly, that, although he could have had Egypt, it was no object for him to have had it at the risk of a war; and war was not for his interest. It was not for his interest to risk a war for Egypt, which one day or other, he tells us, would probably fall into his hands either by negotiation, or the dissolution of the Turkish empire. Now, was not this reasoning, the reasoning namely of interest, the common and ordinary motive which influenced every transaction between man and man? Were we, therefore, to deny it all credit here? "Were I to argue with the learned gentleman whose propositions I have denied," said Mr. Fox, "I should maintain, affirmatively, that Buonaparté had no intention of going to Egypt—not because he has declared he has none—but because he has with reason declared it not to be his interest to do so. He says, 'I could have taken Egypt.'" Now, how is that expression represented? Is it to be fairly interpreted by saying, "I will endeavour to take Egypt?" "Could have taken it," is different even in the most obvious grammatical sense from "I will try to take it," or "I design to take it." The meaning in the present case is fixed by the very words of the conversation itself, which asserts the facility with which the first consul could have taken Egypt with the very troops he had sent to St. Domingo. It is the discovery of his designs, however, in the event of the dissolution of the Turkish empire, which determined the ministers to go to war with him immediately. Why? Is this singular in Buonaparté? Was the dissolution and partition of the Turkish empire an event never contemplated before? Does any body doubt that the empress of Russia had a "desire" for Egypt, and something more than a desire that her family should obtain the sovereignty of Constantinople? Nay, was not the circumstance of her christening her grandson by the name of Constantine, very generally attributed at the time to such views, and supposed to be done for the purpose of suiting the name to the intended station? But would it not have been thought monstrous that you should have gone to war with Russia on that account? But desire and design are the same thing—are they? Apply this to your own case. We had a desire, as it is manifest by Mr. Moore's mission, to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland. Did that desire ever ripen into a design? No, certainly: and the attempt was never made, nor even the design formed; for the best of reasons,—because it was found to be impracticable. It has been said, however, although no such design appears in the papers before us, that Buonaparté had proposed to some power of Europe to divide the Turkish empire. Now this of itself proves the distinction which we ought to keep constantly before our eyes, in considering the question of desire and design. To propose a project to another power is a proof of a desire, but when you abandon it on account of the impracticability of the execution, you cannot surely be then said to have any design. You may, indeed, still retain the desire, but the moment you find the execution impracticable, it would be madness to harbour the design, because rational design can never be entertained without some probability of success. But it is said that this design is sufficiently declared in the report of Sebastiani, for all the purposes of justifying the war. Now, what if Buonaparté had heard somewhere that you had a desire to occupy and to retain the Cape of Good Hope, and that you openly declared that as he was a man who kept no faith with others, no faith ought to be kept with him; what if he were to couple such a declaration with another, "that the minister ought to lose his head who gave up the Cape of Good Hope," and afterwards were to add to these presumptive evidences the fact of its being in your possession—I ask, whether Buonaparté might not call that the indication of a design on your part of retaining the Cape, with full as much justice as you infer from his declaration a design of occupying Egypt on his? But it is argued, that the mere act of sending Sebastiani is sufficient ground for war. Now this fact ministers must have known from general Stewart, by his dispatch of the 30th of November. The arrival of Sebastiani in Egypt, and his transactions there, were circumstances which general Stewart could not have failed communicating fully to our government. The publication of the report, also, is adduced as evidence of the intention, and it is asked, whether any man will publish what he does not intend to act? The value of Egypt, too, to Buonaparté is stated in addition. Now, if he really thought Egypt of that value, and if he wanted the key to it first, which is said to be Malta, for the surrender of which he was treating with us, can we suppose that he would have published his intention with regard to Egypt, as the means of prevailing on us to give him up Malta? No! the proposition is absurd and ridiculous on the face of it; nor would it be possible to account for such conduct at all, unless we at once believe Buonaparté to be a madman."

Mr. Fox next adverted to a part of the negotiation, which he professed to be, to him, utterly incomprehensible. "I am come to demand satisfaction," says lord Whitworth to the French minister. "What satisfaction?" asks M. Talleyrand. — "Why, really, as to that I cannot tell you, but I will send to England to inquire." Finding that they do not obtain satisfaction, for the best of all reasons, because they themselves do not know what to ask, the ministers change the point of satisfaction into one of security, "What security?" says the French minister. "Why that I can't tell," answers lord Whitworth, "but I will send to know." Well! it turns out that the security we want is the possession of Malta in perpetuity; next the possession of it for ten years, which, for all political purposes, amounts to a perpetuity; and then a number of other demands are thrown together, and the king of Sardinia, like the ghost in a tragedy, comes in at the last scene to unravel the plot, and bring about the catastrophe of the piece. He was dead and buried, it is true, long before the play began; no part was assigned him in the drama, but brought in at the stage-door towards the close of it, and coupled with Malta, ministers thought he would add greatly to the grandeur of the scene. At the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, the king of Sardinia, together with many other princes, had been set aside, one by one. Ministers said that they had difficulties enough of their own, and that therefore they would have nothing to do with any of them. But when they came to insist on keeping Malta, and discovered that a war for Malta alone would not be very palatable to the people of England, they produced the king of Sardinia. They had a double purpose in this. The abrupt demand of Malta might have been revolting to the feelings of the first consul. By bringing forward, therefore, the king of Sardinia in the quarrel, and abandoning him afterwards in the negotiations, they would appear to soften their demand of Malta; while, on the other hand, they appeared to stand forward as protectors of a prince, in whose fate the emperor of Russia took a warm interest, and whom, if they gained nothing for him, they would at least leave in no worse condition than he was before. In addition to this, they required that Switzerland should be evacuated, and, as a condition, offered to acknowledge the king of Etruria, and the Cisalpine and the Ligurian republics. Now what could ministers seriously expect from such an offer? Did they really suppose that the first consul would care one straw whether the establishment he had made in Italy, should, or should not, be recognized by this country? Did they doubt that Buonaparté, in answer to their proposal, would beg of them to follow their own fancy on this point, and recognize or not as they might think convenient? "I am not sure," added Mr. Fox, "whether many persons who hear me are acquainted with the fact, but I believe it to be certain, that the United States of America, whose independence, under that name, was acknowledged by France in 1778, and what was much more important, by Great Britain in 1782, never was acknowledged by the empress of Russia to the day of her death; yet I never heard that America was the worse from the want of the recognition of her independence by that imperial princess. Nor did I ever hear that France, which had so large a share in the establishment of that independence, was disposed to quarrel with Russia for declining to acknowledge it. Nor, indeed, could any such refusal affect America. For what is recognition? nothing but mere matter of course, except as it may be connected with a claim. We gave up a great deal to America, when we acknowledged the independence of the United States. Why? because we had a claim to the sovereignty of them. The United States were not injured by the refusal of the empress of Russia to acknowledge them. Why? because Russia had no claim upon America. The recognition of the king of Etruria by the emperor, indeed, is very different. From him it is a boon, and a great one too; for by so doing, he abandons all his claims upon those territories. But we, in offering to acknowledge the king of Etruria, or the other changes in Italy, grant no boon to any of them. We have no claim on Tuscany—we have no claim on Milan—we have no claim on the Cisalpine or Ligurian republics: whether we acknowledge them or not, therefore, is matter of no importance to them, and is only a consideration of convenience to ourselves. The importance to France of such a boon cannot, consequently, be contended for with any reason. What, then, is the result of all this? Why, that you suffered the opportunity to escape you, and, instead of interposing with a generous magnanimity for the protection of Holland; instead of looking to that country which stood in immediate need of being rescued from the most grievous oppression, in whose favour you might have roused all the indignant sympathies of Europe, and in whose cause you might have hoped for the co-operation, more or less, of the different great powers of the continent, you rest the whole quarrel with France on a point of sheer, naked, British interest, on your possession and occupation of Malta; a point in which no other European state can feel an interest, or entertain a wish in common with yourselves. You have reduced this whole question to such an issue, that, except possibly the Turks, the value of whose alliance is easily appreciated, no other power can be induced to come to your aid by the sense of a common interest. You have deprived yourselves of every advantage you would have had from the admiration and from the good will of mankind, and you have sent your cause into the world, stripped of every motive to union, derived either from their interests or their virtues.

But can peace yet be made? I think it may. It has been contended that the emperor of Russia still refuses to guarantee Malta. Is that quite so certain? But be the fact so, or not, are not the communications from that excellent prince of such a nature as to encourage the hope, that for the sake of preserving the peace of Europe, he is ready to interpose his mediation, in order to reconcile the present differences with France? Has he not actually offered that mediation? If you accept it, will it not appear to all Europe that you ask only for justice? And will not that be of more consequence to you than any other consideration? Justice, believe me, is a very powerful weapon for you, if you choose to use it, and if you accept the mediation of Russia, the justice of your object will be palpable to the world. But I ask you to do so for another purpose. I ask you whether it would not be better that Malta should be in the hands of the emperor of Russia, than ceded to Great Britain? Whether, with a view to the future peace of Europe, and of affording a fairer chance for its continuance, it would not be better that the emperor of Russia should be the occupier of Malta, as between Great Britain and France, than that it should be absolutely in the hands of Great Britain? I certainly should consider the guarantee, under the terms proposed by Russia, the best of all. Why? because it would secure the friendship of Russia; and because our having it even in full sovereignty cannot be put in competition with that friendship. In this war, in the course of any future war with France, which would you prefer, Malta, or the friendship of Russia? I can have no hesitation in answering—the friendship of Russia. And that you will secure it by accepting the proffered mediation, is a point on which I have no difficulty of belief; for if the accounts I have heard of him be true (although accounts of princes must be received, with many allowances), the emperor of Russia is a prince who places his glory in a true love of peace, who will naturally feel a still deeper interest in any peace which he might become the instrument of preserving, and whose wishes, therefore, must incline towards that party, the views of which should appear most congenial with his own. To obtain his good offices for the restoration of peace, is, in my opinion, of more real consequence to us, and to all Europe, than our possessing Malta under any circumstances. But is there not great probability of our being enabled, through these means, to preserve and consolidate the peace on a much broader basis than that of settling the present dispute concerning Malta? Suppose that illustrious prince were not only to guarantee Malta, but were to enter into guarantees upon a still more extensive principle—to guarantee Egypt to the Turks, for instance. Would not that be worth a thousand Maltras? I go still further. By what I have heard of the emperor of Russia, from a quarter on which I think I can rely, he is disposed also to look to the freedom of Switzerland and of Holland. I do firmly believe, that under his mediation and guarantee, undertaken upon a large scale, not only Switzerland and Holland, but perhaps even Spain, might recover their independence, and afford you thus an additional security for peace, or assistance in any renewal of the contest. On these large and liberal principles of policy, other powers might be brought to concur with you; whereas, if you are seen to pursue nothing but your own sordid, separate interests, you will obtain no cordial assistance, and you will conclude no solid pacification.

The invariable demand of France upon us, observed Mr. Fox, to evacuate Malta, has been confined simply to its evacuation according to the terms and stipulations of the treaty. Had we felt ourselves and the rest of Europe in such a state of insecurity as we seem to apprehend from the great power and ambition of France, better would it have been by far to have abrogated the whole treaty at once, and to have declared that, as it was incapable of execution in one of its material articles, it was unfit for execution in any. But, if France had done so! France is said to have no feeling of honour. Let us put the case fairly to ourselves, and suppose, that by an article in the treaty France had bound herself to give us the Mauritius. In what terms should we not exclaim against France, if, alleging our detention of the Cape of Good Hope as a proof of our malus animus towards her, she had refused to surrender that possession? What should we think and say of such an excuse, grounded on such a proof of our hostile disposition? France, however, had not made the demand of Malta for herself: it was only to the leaving it in our hands that the first consul had uniformly refused his consent; he had raised no difficulties to its occupation by other powers; it had been directly offered to Russia. Even with regard to its evacuation by the British troops, he had fixed no precise time, had insisted on no immediate step towards its performance. This conduct certainly bore no appearance of imperiousness or arrogance. It is answered, however, that it was but an assumed moderation in the first consul, put on for the sake of his immediate interests; and that his real design was war and aggression, whenever the moment should be more favourable. His merchant ships are now at sea; he waits their return into the French ports; and while his country is exposed to danger at so many different points, the present, it is argued, is not the precise moment at which he would begin a war with us; but for this he will choose his own time. Be it so. Supposing the advantage to be on the side of Great Britain now, would it not continue in nearly the same degree during the rest of this year, or the next year, or the year after? And what was the nature of this advantage as applicable to the question at issue? Should we not always retain it? Must not French commerce, during the continuance of our naval superiority, always remain to the same degree a pledge in our hands for the performance of the engagement which constituted the subject of the present dispute? That engagement was the independence of Malta. If Malta, indeed, were occupied by France, it might be right to make use of our immediate advantage, to oblige her to restore the island to its independence; but now what should we gain by threatening the first consul to block up his ports, to capture his ships, and ruin his commerce? Nothing but another promise; a promise that, during a certain time, he would not disturb us in the occupation of Malta. And, did the experience of mankind, did the evidence of history furnish a ground of reliance on promises of this sort? Did promises give any real security for the performance of stipulations? Granting the first consul to have entered into any engagement on this head that we might have required, if his ambition be of that nature which is ascribed to him, could we be simple enough to hope that he would really leave us in the unmolested possession of Malta, and that he would not insist on our evacuating it the very instant at which that opportunity should occur for which we now suppose him to be waiting? The futility of such promises, and the little scruple with which they were evaded, could be no better illustrated than by the conduct of Francis 1st, when a prisoner at Madrid, after the battle of Pavia. This monarch, it is well known, was obliged by Charles 5th, to subscribe, for the recovery of his liberty, to conditions of so harsh a nature, that it was foreseen great objections would be made to their ratification by the states of France. He was compelled, therefore, to engage to return to Madrid in the event of failure, and this engagement he conceived himself to have well and faithfully performed—by building and residing at a house in the Bois de Boulogne, which he called Madrid. On the other hand, while we were pursuing the light and frivolous advantages which a promise of this sort might hold forth to us, we lost the benefit of another, which, as far as it went, was much more valuable and solid. It cannot be denied, that he who makes a promise puts himself to a certain degree in the power of the party to whom he makes it. The independence of Malta was provided for by the treaty. The engagements of France on this head are solemn and positive. If, then, upon our evacuation of the island in consequence of that treaty, the first consul of France were to attempt any thing against its independence, we should derive, in any quarrel we might have to sustain with him on that account, all the benefit (and a considerable one it would be) arising from the disadvantage in point of general character and estimation, to which our adversary would expose himself by such a breach of promise. But all advantages arising from this state of things, such as it might be, we have totally foregone, by resting the dispute with France upon its present grounds.

The charges of arrogance, and of a superiority assumed by the first consul in his language towards this country, are further urged and supported on the testimony of his conversations with lord Whitworth, to which allusions had been so frequently made: those conversations are said to have been not only offensive in their tone, but in their substance. Mr. Fox could see no foundation for this species of charge in the long conversation with lord Whitworth, on which so much stress had been laid, and some expressions of which had been so triumphantly quoted. What was the report of those expressions, as given by lord Whitworth himself? Does the first consul say haughtily to him, "I will come and crush you—Je vous écraserai?" Just the reverse. He tells us plainly and directly indeed, that he shall attempt to invade us; but he says also, that he knows the chances are a hundred to one against his success; that it is a hundred to one that he and the greatest part of the expedition would go to the bottom of the sea. He talked much, and with great earnestness, on this subject, but never once affected to diminish the danger. Yet this declaration of the first consul, of the almost utter hopelessness of any enterprise he might attempt against us, is quoted as a proof of his arrogance and presumption! "Whatever else there may be in it," said Mr. Fox, "there certainly is in this conversation no tone of superiority; on the contrary, it is an acknowledgment of superiority on our side. To call it arrogant or presumptuous, or to say that it is offensive in its tone, or in its substance, appears to be a very whimsical imputation. It reminds me of the most extravagant passage that is, I believe, to be found in a great, and, with me, most favourite poet, and who, notwithstanding the frequent instances of the same sort which occur in his works, is one of the finest in our language, I mean Dryden, who, in the most extravagant, perhaps, of his pieces, and into the mouth of Almanzor, puts a sentiment which has always appeared to me to outsoar every flight allowable to the wildest fictions of the imagination. In the Conquest of Grenada, his hero, who is burlesqued in the Rehearsal, under the character of Drawcansir, says, in anger to his rival—

"Thou shalt not wish her thine: thou shalt not dare

"To be so impudent as to despair!"

Now, I confess, notwithstanding what I may have thought of the extravagance of my favourite poet, that I had over-rated it. I had thought that no case could happen to give common sense to those expressions, and make them applicable to real life. I thought them the daring efforts of a vivid genius, aiming at the summit of poetical hyperbole; but now I find that Dryden gave only a tame, prosaic account of a matter of fact, a few years before it happened! He says, "You shall not wish, you shall not dare, to be so impudent as to despair!" Buonaparté says, he despairs of success in his invasion of England, and for his pride and impudence in despairing as well as for his presumption in telling them so, ministers think no punishment too great. Now I profess myself to be one of those who agree in this respect with the first consul, and who think that in this despair there is infinitely more good sense than arrogance. I think it is full a hundred to one that he and the greater part of his expedition would go to the bottom of the sea, if he should attempt a descent on our coast. I certainly think this, and I am very glad to find that Buonaparté is of the same opinion.

Having closed the argument under these different heads, Mr. Fox proceeded to the summing up of his opinions on the whole of the question before the House. He said, that after the ministers had suffered the continent to be reduced to its present state, after they had submitted, without remonstrance, to every encroachment of French ambition, after they had left Holland and Switzerland to their fate, and all the smaller states of Europe under the dominion or the influence of France, he could not think the war they were now undertaking for Malta, plain Malta, either wise or justifiable. What, however, it might be asked of him, would he himself propose under the present circumstances? It was his opinion, that peace was not even then desperate, if proper means were resorted to — means which presented themselves at that very moment, and which were in every way consistent with strict honour, and with a large and liberal policy. He recommended to his majesty's ministers without delay, to avail themselves of the opportunity which then offered, and to co-operate with the wishes which he understood to have been expressed by the emperor of Russia, for the preservation of the peace of Europe. He recommended, and again enforced, the acceptance of the Russian mediation, not for the sake of procuring the guarantee of that power for Malta merely, but with a view of extending it upon a grand, comprehensive scheme of policy, and in concert with other great powers, to the protection of the weaker and more defenceless states, and thus ensuring, as far as stability could be expected in human affairs, the solid and permanent pacification of Europe. What, he asked, was the other side of the alternative?—War! And what would be the probable effect of resorting to it? He had already touched on the conduct of the first consul, and some of the reasons which had been assigned for it. He had touched also on the state of the inhabitants of other countries, none of whom, he feared, would be improved in their condition by war; but he must now come to that body of people whom he had often declared to be more emphatically his clients—the people of England. He would, for the moment, put out of his consideration all questions of danger to ourselves. He would suppose Buonaparté to feel the truth of what he himself had declared, namely, that he despaired of success in attempting a descent—he would suppose that all parts of our empire were at present secure, and that even in a protracted war, there would be no probability, no possibility (if gentlemen would take it so) of affecting us in any quarter by invasion. Even in this state of security, however, what was our situation? Had we forgotten the two last years of the last war? Had we forgotten the state and condition of the middle classes of society in this island; of every country gentleman of a limited income, of every tradesman, indeed of every man in it who did not possess a very large fortune; had we already forgotten how the late war had pressed upon them? Let us recollect these things; let us recollect the circumstances which occurred in the course of that war; what we all suffered by the immense loads that were laid upon us to support it—their grievous and most intolerable weight, and the cruel and grinding measures of every description, under which this country had groaned during so many years. Could ministers, with these recollections in their minds, bring themselves again to precipitate their country into miseries, so horrible in their nature, and so easily to be avoided? What had we now to expect? He had heard, indeed, some talk of an economical war. But even this economy (difficult as the word was at all times to understand when so applied) was now explained to consist in the adoption of measures leading to an immense and immediate enlargement of our expenses. We were told that we must make great exertions? And what exertions? Exertions beyond anything we have ever yet known; far beyond what were found necessary during the glorious war of queen Anne; far beyond those by which we obtained that preeminence which has immortalized the memory of the late earl of Chatham; far beyond even those of the late war itself. And by whom were we told all this? If by some gentlemen who had no experience in politics, and under whose guidance we had not already suffered; if by some orator, as a mere figure of speech without a meaning, and by way of a flourish in debate, for such a purpose it might do well; but we are told this, not by a novice in the art of extortion, but by an artist! “If a man without experience or reputation,” said Mr. Fox, “examines my case when I am ill, and tells me, ‘You must have a limb cut off to save your life,’ I might still hope for a cure, without having recourse to so dreadful a remedy; but, if the skilful practitioner, the regular doctor himself tells me so, after consultation, if the experienced operator, under whose prescriptions and directions I have already suffered, tells me so, I know what I must endure! If he tells me, ‘I must pull out all your teeth; I must cut off part of the extremities, or you will die,’ I have only to prepare for the operation. I know the alternative is death or torture. This great artist, this eminent doctor (Mr. Pitt), has told us that, much as we had already been distinguished for exertion, what we have hitherto done is nothing. We have hitherto been only fighting for morality and religion, for the law of nations, for the rights of civil society, and in the cause of God. Resources fully adequate to such minor objects, the right hon. gentleman assures us, we have already employed; but now we have a contest to sustain of a higher order—a contest which would compel us to strain every remaining nerve, and to call for sacrifices new and extraordinary, such as had never before been heard of in this country. We are told, that within a month, within a fortnight perhaps, a plan must be formed for raising many millions of money, in a mode different from any that has hitherto been attempted. It was not to be a pitiful expedient for a single year; it was not to be an expedient similar to those adopted by lord North during the American war, or by the right hon. gentleman himself for nearly the whole of the last war; but it was to be a plan which would last for ever, or at least until two or three hundred millions should be raised by it. Severe measures for general defence are also announced to us as necessary within a fortnight; plans of which no man can as yet form a conception, but which ministers are to reveal to us in due time, and when they shall have reached their full maturity of wisdom.

The income-tax was felt heavily by most of the members of this House, although many of them are in the superior ranks of fortune—heavily, indeed, by all descriptions of persons in the country, except the most opulent, or those in the lowest class of labourers, who were too poor to be made the objects of it. I believe there are now near the projectors of that tax, many persons who felt the gripe of it most keenly, although some of them were so situated that it was not prudent for them to complain. That tax did, indeed, affect every person of any condition in this country, but affected them very differently. The possessors of their thirty, their twenty, their ten, and even their one thousand a year, felt it as nothing, when compared to the possessors of only their two, their three, their four, or their five hundred. Ask that numerous and intelligent class of persons how they felt the income-tax? I am speaking of the poor old income-tax, not the tax now about to be imposed—I speak of that mild and gentle operation, which seized only upon one-tenth of a man's income, and not of a measure which may exact a fifth, and possibly a half; a measure, too, which must be improved in the mode of its execution, since the greater the sum to be raised by it, the more rigorous must be the inquisition. Let no man now look to his holding a pound without giving possibly fifteen shillings of it to government towards the support of the war; let no man be too confident that an inquisitor may not be empowered to break open his desk, in order to search for the other five. And all this for what? For Malta! Malta! plain, bare, naked Malta, unconnected with any other interest! What point of honour can the retention of Malta be to you? Something of that nature may be felt by France, but to you, I aver it is, as a point of honour, nothing. "But it may be prudent to keep it." Is the keeping it worth a contest? Does the noble lord think it so? On the contrary, is he not of opinion that it is not? "Oh! but we are to oppose the aggrandizement of France, the ambition of Buonaparté, which will destroy us like a liquid fire." We have, indeed, heard some splendid philippics on this subject; philippics which Demosthenes himself, were he among us, would hear with pleasure, and possibly with envy; philippics which would lead us directly to battle, without regard to what may follow; but then comes the question—What shall we have to pay for them? What is the amount of the bill? I remember an old French proverb, and I am not afraid of being deemed too much of a Frenchman if I should quote it: the proverb seems almost an answer to one in English, which says that "things are good because they are dear." The author of the French one, however, tells us that, let things be ever so good, yet if they are dear, he has no pleasure in eating them, "le cout en ôte le gout." Now so it is with me, when I hear the harangues of the right hon. gentleman in favour of war, I think the articles drest up are exquisite, but that the cost spoils the relish. However, these philippics are not new to us. I remember when lord Rosslyn (then Mr. Wedderburn), made a vehement and eloquent philippic before the privy council against Dr. Franklin, calling him "a hoary headed traitor," and so forth. I remember the prodigious effect produced by this splendid invective: so great was it, that when the privy council went away, they were almost ready to throw up their hats for joy, as if they had obtained a triumph. Why, Sir, we paid a pretty dear price for that triumph afterwards! In the beginning of the last war, we had abilities, which we now enjoy no longer, and which no one remembers with more regret than I do. There was no want of imagery, no want of figures of rhetoric, no want of the flowers of eloquence;—eloquence seldom equalled, and never surpassed by man, and all exerted to support the war. We know how that war ended, and the damp which was cast upon our ardour at the sight of the bill when it came to be paid. So now, when I hear all these fine and eloquent philippics, I cannot help recollecting what fruits such speeches have generally produced, and dreading the devastation and carnage which usually attend them. The right hon. gentleman, when he appears before us in all the gorgeous attire of his eloquence, reminds me of a story which is told of a barbarous prince of Morocco, a Muley Molock, or a Muley Ishmael, who never put on his gayest garments, or appeared in extraordinary pomp, but as a prelude to the murder of many of his subjects. Now, when I behold splendor much more bright, when I perceive the labours of an elegant and accomplished mind—when I listen to words so choice, and contemplate all the charms of his polished elocution,—it is well enough for me, sitting in this House, to enjoy the scene, but it gives me most gloomy tidings to convey to my constituents in the lobby. For these reasons, Sir, I should wish, previously to our entering into this war, to be told what event it is that will put an end to it. I would ask what are we to gain by this contest? I know I may be told, that it is an old and a foolish question. That it is old I know, but that it is foolish I do not. Switzerland and Holland are, in my opinion, the two great objects to be kept in view, as countries the liberation of which from the yoke of France would be most desirable. But have you any hopes of accomplishing such an object? Have you any chance of doing so by the course you are now about to take? No man thinks more highly than I do, of the ability and gallantry of your commanders; no man thinks more highly than I do, of the intrepidity and valour of your soldiers; no man thinks more highly than I do of the immense power, most incomparable skill and invincible spirit of your navy; no man has more earnest wishes than I have to see the power of France reduced by the efforts of Great Britain. Much certainly, in one way, may be done towards this object. You may seize her islands—you may take her colonies and destroy her trade; you have done it before, and, for aught I know, you may distress her even more. Even then, what will you ultimately gain? On the other hand, what may you not ultimately lose? You may be driven to the brink of bankruptcy yourselves. But France, we are told, will have been destroyed first. France, may, indeed, be made a beggar, but will that make her a better neighbour to you? Say even that a new revolution should happen to France, as many have happened to her within these ten years—What will you be the better for that? “France,” you may then exclaim, “is now more miserable than ever she was!” To be sure she will be so; and you—how will you be the better for her misery? It is argued, however, that if we are to go to war, it is wiser to commence it now, than to delay it; distinctions are drawn between internal strength and strength for the annoyance of an enemy; it is said that, as to France, another year may extend her commerce, increase her population, and thus give her additional means of annoying us; and that all these means will be diminished by the revolutions she may suffer in another war. If she should suffer in the next war ten revolutions, instead of the five or six through which she struggled in the last, putting all other considerations out of the question, are we justified by experience in expecting that her sufferings will render her a better neighbour to us, or less troublesome to the repose of the world? Was she so wasted by the losses of the late war, was she so enervated by the calamities of her revolutions, as to be rendered incapable of annoying others, or of defending herself? Were not her latest efforts, on the contrary, the most terrible and the most successful?”

From these grounds, which Mr. Fox recapitulated, he drew the conclusion, that we were in a situation, in which, if we were to proceed on our present narrow ground of mere local British interest, we had nothing to gain; absolutely nothing. We could not hope for an ally from any quarter of the world. But if the House should agree to the amendment moved on the address, it would open to us another and a better course. The amendment contained nothing, which, with the exception of a very few words indeed, they did not all believe to be true. That his majesty's ministers had not done the best that could have been done, in the whole of the negotiation, was certainly a very general opinion. That question was by common consent (as it appeared) to be the subject of debate at a future day; the address he thought would prejudge that question; whereas the amendment kept it entirely open for discussion and decision. To attain the greater objects of the amendment, Mr. Fox gave notice, that he should, at no very distant period, move the House to address his majesty to avail himself of the disposition manifested by the emperor of Russia to bring about a general peace. If that prince should either be unwilling to engage in the mediation, or unable, through the fault of our enemy, to accomplish its purpose, neither of which Mr. Fox could believe, the House would enjoy the satisfaction of reflecting that they had done every thing in their power, which prudence could dictate, to avoid the calamities of war. The alternative would then be inevitable, and they would adopt it without reproach. At present nothing could be said in favour of the policy of war, but that it may be better for us now than it would be four months hence. This advantage would be more than counterbalanced by proving to all Europe, that war was not our choice; that we had applied to one of its first powers to prevent it, and that we were ready to accept the proffered mediation. Mr. Fox concluded his speech with stating the strong sense of duty, and the deep anxiety of mind under which he had been impelled to deliver his opinions so much at length; and with exhorting the House, before they entered on this great contest, not only to pause, to deliberate, and to satisfy themselves, but to do every thing that depended on them to convince their constituents and all Europe that the avoiding it was impossible.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he had never heard with more admiration the talents of the hon. gentleman, nor had more occasion to lament that the powers of his great mind should have been employed for the purpose to which they were then applied; to give encouragement where encouragement ought not to be given, namely, to our enemies; not that it could be so intended, although it was likely to have such an effect. He would put it to the candour of that hon. gentleman whether he thought it fair to make such an appeal to the feelings of mankind, for the purpose of enlisting them, as it were, to fight against their public duty? Having been one of those who advised his majesty to send to parliament the message on which the address was moved, he was satisfied to rest with the House, the consideration of his motives, and those of his colleagues, and he hoped the House were satisfied that no reluctance had ever been shown on his part to enter into that discussion. He hoped it would be the opinion of the House, that his majesty's ministers had been sincere in their endeavours to preserve peace. He then proceeded to take notice of what had been stated by Mr. Fox, by way of comment on the various other topics stated in his majesty's declaration: upon all which topics the hon. gentleman seemed to insist that ministers had not performed their duty inasmuch as they had omitted to make specific remonstrances to France in each of these cases as they occurred. Upon this subject, however, the hon. gentleman had not done justice to ministers; for representations had been made upon almost every one of these topics. With regard to Switzerland, their object was, to maintain its independence, and they expressed that object by Mr. Moore, and intended to support the Swiss, until it became impracticable by their being overwhelmed. However, the interference of this country had not been totally useless; for our exertions had been the means of preventing the first consul from declaring himself their first magistrate. More would have been endeavoured by ministers in that case, but there was no corresponding disposition in the other great powers of Europe to make a common cause with the people of Switzerland. The course which he should take would be to show, that the animus of the government of France was manifestly to injure and insult this country, and it was under this conviction, that the question of peace or war was properly to be decided. An imputation had been cast on ministers, as if they had neglected to demand satisfaction upon points as they occurred; but he trusted it would appear to the House, that satisfaction had been demanded on each particular case which required it. He referred to the report of Sebastiani; and contended, that it was the determination of the French government to interfere with respect to Egypt, and to conduct itself contrary to the express provisions of the treaty of Amiens, which provided for the integrity of the Turkish empire. He referred to various parts of the correspondence, as well as to the conference between lord Whitworth and the chief consul himself, and also to what related to Malta; and maintained, that ministers had omitted no part of their duty. The French government availed itself of every opportunity, to show its hostile temper, and to manifest a determination of rendering war inevitable. They had made preparations for that purpose, by an augmentation of their forces. The war could not be avoided, because it was already begun; but if the emperor of Russia, or any other considerable power, should make any proposition of a practical nature, by which peace might be restored he should feel great satisfaction in being the instrument of laying it before his majesty; but he saw nothing in the disposition of the French government which warranted such an expectation. We ought therefore to prepare for an arduous contest. We must provide effectually for our domestic security. Many persons, he was aware, must suffer great deprivations, for the purpose of having the country secured against the danger with which it was menaced. He wished to impress upon the House, that the present war was founded on unavoidable necessity, and that there was in his majesty's ministers a sincere disposition to terminate it, whenever it could be terminated with honour. He would therefore indulge a hope, that the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, would sacrifice private opinion, in this case, to the advantages of unanimity. The difference between the sentiments contained in the address and those in the amendment was literally nothing.

The Attorney General said, that the arguments of Mr. Fox were calculated to do much mischief, as they were ingenious. The hon. gentleman had laid down principles, which would furnish Buonaparté with arguments for the justification of his conduct. He had observed that the war was unnecessary; but if ever a war was commenced on an honourable principle, it was the present.

Mr. Windham said, that the arguments offered by Mr. Fox appeared to him fallacious. The question before the House was of considerable moment; but his mind was diverted from the subjects on which he had intended to address the House by the strange language which he had lately heard. He could now only point out the mischief of this speech, and he must say its wickedness. The topics touched upon by the hon. gentleman were the very poisoned arrows of debate, which, by general consent, were proscribed. They might be used on any occasion, and were quite unconnected with the point at issue. That war produces much public inconvenience and private misery, might be urged against all wars, however just or unavoidable. The question was not, whether the income tax was a bad thing; but whether it was not a better thing than an income tax imposed by a French prefect? The hon. gentleman had shown himself the pander to all the base and illiberal passions of the people, by thus supporting selfishness against patriotism, and opposing private considerations to the grand view of national policy. If he stooped so low, he was not to be envied in the triumph of his eloquence, or the number of his admirers. It was lamentable, however, to see the contrast between the hon. gentleman and the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) whose return to the House was so warmly welcomed. That right hon. gentleman had not displayed his great talents in damping the zeal and depressing the spirit of the people, by an appeal to the sordid passions of our nature; but in kindling the flame of patriotism, and calling forth the energies of the country, to meet with firmness the difficulties which surrounded it. The conduct of Mr. Fox resembled that of a surgeon who should dissuade his patient from submitting to a necessary operation by talking of the pain that he would suffer from it, while this was the only thing that could stop the progress of a mortal distemper.

Mr. W. Smith condemned the severe epithets which had been applied, by Mr. Windham, to the speech of Mr. Fox. He thought when the heat of the moment had subsided, he must feel remorse, for the expressions he had used.

Mr. Windham, in explanation, allowed that he did not wish the words that had fallen from him, in the heat of debate, to be understood in the strict literal meaning.

Mr. Fox said, he excused the warmth of the right hon. gentleman; and, as for himself, he had a foible, of not easily and slightly quarrelling with an old acquaintance.

The question being put, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question, the House divided :

May 25. The Address was reported; and, on the question that it be read a second time,

Sir R. Peel said, he had a decided objection to war in any shape; but with respect to this war, it did appear from the papers, that it was unavoidable. It did not appear to be so much the desire of the French government to obtain the rock of Malta; the rock of the English constitution was what they really aimed at. It was our liberty, protected by our constitution, that gave them the most uneasiness; a constitution which reflected so strong a light to the people of France, that it gave them a perfect insight into the rotten state of their own society. He could not conceive that the French people, who had so long been struggling for liberty, and who now ought to set some value on freedom, would long continue under tyranny.

Mr. H. Lascelles said, that this war was brought upon us by no act of our own, and therefore he would support such measures as might lay burthens on his constituents. The conduct of France, ever since the peace was concluded, had been atrocious. Every means had been employed by us to avert the calamities of war. France had put it to us, whether we would sacrifice every thing to support ourselves in an insecure peace. He could not see, from the papers any disposition, on the part of France, to improve the friendship between the two countries. He did not pretend to define with accuracy when a nation should go to war, but he knew there was a point beyond which we should not allow another nation to go.

Sir W. Pulteney was fully convinced that ministers had not adopted the alternative of war so long as there remained any chance of securing the blessings of peace. The great object of the French, in the possession of Malta, was to cripple our commerce, and reduce our navy. Would any man contend for the propriety of our surrendering so important a situation, seeing the unequivocal designs of France upon Egypt, as a road to the subjugation of our Indian possessions? He hoped that ministers would be supported in the conduct of a war which they had used every honourable exertion to avoid.

Mr. Bankes said, his principal objection to the address was, that he could not approve those words which gave to ministers full credit for earnestly having endeavoured, by every means in their power, to avoid the war; for it appeared to him from the papers on the table, that they were not anxious to preserve the peace, but that they, on the contrary, wished to renew the war.

Mr. Hobhouse said, he was prepared to support every tittle of the address, and still further the cause of ministers. They had laid down to themselves a line of moderation and firmness which they had uniformly maintained: they had vindicated the honour of this country in resisting a systematic attempt to destroy the liberties and the morals of Europe: they had steered the middle line; neither abjectly submitting to the foe, nor sedulously seeking pretences for war; and their conduct entitled them to the thanks of the whole country.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre gloried in supporting the Address, as it afforded him an opportunity of expressing his indignation at the overbearing conduct of France. The case was fully and fairly before the country. It would now judge for itself, and when once satisfied, that its cause was good, no doubt could be entertained of its readiness to stake every thing for the preservation of its rights and its existence. He had wished for entire unanimity; because the times required that good old practice, a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether—but complete unanimity was denied. He was convinced, that war was the only safe road to peace, and under the positive assurances of ministers, that they were still ready to receive overtures for negotiation, such was his confidence in their moderation, that he was persuaded they would not refuse such terms, as were consistent with our safety, honour, and happiness.

Mr. Wilberforce deprecated war, if it could be averted by the amicable mediation of Russia, which he still thought practicable.

The Address was agreed to.

Debate in the Lords on the King's Message relative to the Discussions with France. May 23. The order of the day for taking his majesty's Message into consideration being read,

Lord Pelham rose to move an Address. From the papers on the table, he was confident their lordships must see that ministers had no wish to conceal any part of their conduct. He would not contend, that their conduct might not, on a future occasion, be made the subject of inquiry; but he must express a hope, that the discussion on the present occasion would be conducted with as little reference as possible to the conduct and merits of ministers. The great, and, indeed, the only question was, whether legitimate ground of war had been established. After having maturely considered the papers, he had no difficulty in declaring the grounds of war contained therein, to be most strong, clear, and distinct. The conclusion left on the minds of all unprejudiced men must be, that war was rendered inevitable. He then adverted briefly to the principal points of dispute between the two governments. With respect to Malta, the conduct pursued on the part of this country proved the sincerest desire of peace. A very short period had elapsed before (with the view of facilitating the evacuation of the island) an accredited officer was appointed to arrange the mode in which it was to take place. Sir A. Ball received instructions to concert with an agent on the part of the French government the means of executing the article of the treaty with the least possible difficulty. Previous to the evacuation, the election of a grand master was an object of important consideration, and to this his majesty had given every possible facility. The grand master then chosen had seen reasons for not acceding to the election, and a new election became indispensable. Again, his majesty, actuated by the same desire of peace, acceded to an arrangement for a subsequent election, with the view of removing every obstacle to the evacuation of the island. A body of Neapolitan troops were in the first instance to be admitted into the island; and to their admission, on the part of his majesty, not the smallest obstacle was opposed. It was about the 27th of January that the French government began to press the evacuation of Malta; and that demanded some satisfactory explanation of the pretensions advanced, and the ministers views disclosed. Circumstances then existed, which rendered it necessary to refer back to what had been the conduct of the first consul from the period when the treaty was concluded. In the course of this review, the irresistible inference was, that the conduct of the French government had been one constant series of acts totally inconsistent with a sincere desire of preserving peace. At an early period after the treaty was signed, representations were made about the freedom of the press in this country, and the necessity of subjecting not only it, but the deliberative assemblies of the country; to a degree of restraint inconsistent with the genius of our constitution. The stay of the princes of the house of Bourbon, of certain bishops particularly named, and a number of emigrants who continued to wear the badges of extinguished royalty, were made the subjects of complaint. What the answer of ministers to these complaints was, was explained in the papers; and he entertained a confident expectation, that it was of a nature to meet with universal approbation. With regard to the complaint about the freedom of discussion in different publications, it was hardly necessary for him to say that he was a decided friend to a free press. He did not deny that this freedom was sometimes carried to an unjustifiable length. Ministers had shown their disposition to give no countenance to publications of this kind, by referring the French government to the tribunals of the country. This answer was not held satisfactory by the French government, and a spirit of distrust and animosity continued to be cherished. At the period when the first consul began to be so extremely clamorous about the evacuation of Malta, an official document of an extraordinary nature made its appearance in France. He meant the report of Sebastiani. The publication of this report unfolded projects which could not fail to attract the peculiar notice of ministers. In every page one most important lesson was to be collected, that the views of the first consul relative to Egypt had not been abandoned. It was clearly seen, that the possession of that colony was the constant object of his ambition. In a formal conference, the first consul had not hesitated to declare that Egypt must sooner or later be in the possession of France. He would put it to the candour of their lordships, whether ministers were not entitled to demand from the French government some security for its future views relative to Egypt, beyond what the treaty of Amiens provided. In the continued possession of Malta, ministers conceived that this security would be found; and hence originated the importance which the possession of the island afterwards assumed. Malta, in the hands of this country, could only be viewed as a security. It could afford to France, or any other power, no reasonable ground of jealousy. But, independent of these considerations, there were others which justified ministers in retaining the island. When the treaty of Amiens was formed, and the island was to be restored to the order of Saint John of Jerusalem, certain revenues were understood to be appropriated to their support, in a way consistent with the objects which the treaty proposed to establish. Without this support it was absurd to talk of that independence which the treaty guaranteed. But in Spain the revenues of the order had been confiscated. The same thing had taken place in Italy and in Bavaria. The French government, so far from opposing this sequestration, appeared to have encouraged it, in a way which showed a disinclination to the execution of the treaty. After pursuing this line of conduct, it was with a bad grace that the first consul came forward to insist on the peremptory execution of the treaty.—As long as the hope of peace could be entertained, ministers had shown the utmost reluctance to resort to a renewal of hostilities. When, however, the conduct of the French government had become such as could no longer be tolerated, it became parliament and the country to speak in terms of suitable indignation of these repeated acts of aggression. If the conduct of ministers was in any respect to be blamed, it was, that they had not much earlier shown a determination no longer to suffer the insults or the injuries of the French government to pass with impunity. Under all these circumstances, he thought there could be no difficulty in agreeing to the address with which he should conclude.—The noble lord then moved an Address couched in the same words as the one moved in the Commons [see p. 1386.]

The Duke of Cumberland said:—My Lords; the question which arises out of the papers appears to me to be nothing less than a question, whether this country, which has so long held a distinguished rank among the nations, shall or shall not cease to be an independent country? for if we were patiently to submit to that accumulation of aggression, injustice, and insult which has been the continued system of the French government with respect to this country, we must descend from that rank, and take our place among the vanquished and feeble nations which have become the prey of French ambition and plunder. My lords, notwithstanding the clear statement of the noble secretary, I must go over in detail the wrongs and insults which this country has endured, and which now call for the address, which has been moved: I must trace those wrongs to the first consul of France; and speaking only of him as consul, I must ask, which of the nations of Europe is it that he has not subdued or endeavoured to subdue, and place in the rank of obsequious vassal nations? Where is Holland, which for a century maintained, by its industry, a most respectable rank among the European nations? That nation is now trampled down by his legions, who, to add insult to their injuries, call themselves allies? Where is the free, the virtuous, and the gallant Swiss nation? For centuries they, too, in the bosom of peace, had cultivated the virtues, the sciences, and the useful arts. They had not meddled in the strife of nations; they always preserved the most honourable neutrality; but the destroyer came, and swept away the produce of the industry of ages, and what was dearer to them than their wealth, their independence and ancient liberties. Where is Italy now? Italy, which for ages has not lifted its head among contending empires, but whose ambition has been to call back into civilized Europe the monuments of antient arts, the sciences, and the taste of the early ages of Greece, refined by every improvement of modern times? Where now are those unoffending countries? They all lie at the proud feet of France, to endure either the anger or the clemency of their conquerors. How is France herself situated? After the millions of lives that she has lost in the late sanguinary war, after that waste of treasure which has ruined her subjects and exhausted her finances, what is it she has gained? We were told this was a war for liberty! what liberty has she gained? Personal liberty has been violated in France without limits; exile, deportation, and Guiana, are the consequences of giving any offence to the consular government. It is there in vain to appeal to laws against high authority; and as for the liberty of the press, it is there unknown. My lords, I will now recite a few of the various indignities which have been offered to this nation by the French government. Among their first acquisitions since the peace, was Lombardy; then followed Elba, Piedmont, Parma, and Switzerland. Holland was overrun with French troops; and as to this country, if it could submit to the unjust pretensions of France, it would soon be in as degraded a situation as any of those small nations which were obliged to bow to the mandates of a French minister. The French government had ventured to say, "England is no longer able, single-handed, to contend with France." Insolent as this declaration was, they had formed so erroneous an opinion of the spirit and resources of this country, as to believe it true. Towards our commerce, they had, in time of peace, acted with the most inveterate hostility. By force and injustice, they not only prohibited the entrance of our manufactures into their country, but excluded them from every country which was under their influence. The report of Sebastiani boldly avowed the ambitious projects of France with respect to Egypt and India. This country has also been told that it has nothing to do with the affairs of Europe, or with the oppressions and vexations that France may please to exercise on other nations, and that all our rights are derived from the treaty of Amiens. When did Great Britain forfeit the rank that she has hitherto held among nations? But the French government were not content with endeavouring to regulate the affairs of other countries; they wished to introduce their impracticable systems, and destructive innovations, into the constitution and laws of this country. Of all the institutions which have been dear to our ancestors and ourselves, there was none that displeased them more than the liberty of the press. This was peculiarly galling to a government whose measures could not bear free discussion; but his majesty's government were too sensible of the blessings of the constitution to surrender them at the bidding of any foreign power; and least of all to a power which, when nominally at peace with us, acted with all the rancour and hostility of an ancient and inveterate enemy." His royal highness concluded by expressing his firm persuasion, that if this war was prosecuted with vigour, it would be crowned with success, and that we should be able to convince the world, that we had not degenerated from the spirit of our ancestors, and that there is still in Europe, a powerful and unconquered nation, always ready to defend its own dignity, and to oppose lawless ambition.

Earl Stanhope said, he should attempt to state what the real differences betwixt the two countries were. A proposition was brought forward by ministers, that Malta should remain in the hands of this country for ten years, whereas, by the treaty of peace, it was to be given up by this country in three months after the ratification. He would not say, that no circumstances might have taken place, which rendered the non-execution of the stipulation expedient. Whether such circumstances did occur was the subject for examination. Now with reference to the possession of Malta, had ministers always represented it as the grand object of dispute? In p. 83 of the correspondence he found, that the acceptance of a projet relative to Malta, would, according to the representation of lord Hawkesbury, remove one of the most material difficulties existing betwixt the two governments. For himself, he was ready to confess, that there was an object much dearer to his heart than the possession of Malta—the maintenance of the constitution and liberties of the country. He did not think that, in the principle on which the retention of Malta was required, ministers were justified. Their argument was, that because, since the signature of the definitive treaty, France had received a considerable accession of power, therefore England was required to hold Malta by way of additional security. To such a principle he never could give his approbation. Supposing Cuba had, during the intermediate period, been ceded to this country by Spain, or Sicily by the king of Naples, what would any of their lordships think if Buonaparté had come to this country with a demand for additional security? Was there a single individual who would not have spurned at such a requisition? How, then, were ministers justified in the principle they had laid down for the retention of Malta? But he was ready to admit, for the sake of argument, the principle which ministers seemed so anxious to establish, and all that he had to require on his part was, that, if their proposition was true in principle, they would have no objection to his contending that it ought to be equally true in point of fact. With this understanding he should contend, that instead of the power of France being augmented since the peace, it had been materially decreased. In Europe it might be said, that it had been increased; but this was a necessary consequence of antecedent events. But, what was the decrease of influence and power, which the French government had sustained in other parts of the world? Since the signature of the definitive treaty, the important colony of St. Domingo had been lost to France. But how had she it? Previous to the first consul's sending troops to that island, there were a set of persons at Paris, called "Amis des Noirs." These persons had established such a system of goodwill towards the blacks as would at any time have commanded 500,000 fighting men in the West Indies. Now, with such an army, headed by French officers, what might not be expected! Had that system been pursued, Jamaica, and the whole of our islands must have fallen beneath the irresistible power of France. Here then was a source of power at that time within the reach, if not in the actual possession of France. This not only extended to us, it also reached Spain. France, through the same means, might have possessed herself of Cuba, Porto Rico, Mexico, and Peru. The existence of our whole West India possessions might have been exposed to the most imminent peril; but now all this danger had disappeared. By the unwise conduct of the first consul; for whatever was contrary to the rights of man, he must always consider unwise; a system of extermination had been pursued, by which the blacks were exasperated to madness, and France was deprived of one of the richest colonies of the world. But ministers, after all this, still reverted to the views of Buonaparté respecting Egypt. Putting this question fairly, was it meant to be insinuated, that the predilection of Buonaparté for Egypt was any thing novel? Did he not, for the accomplishment of this object, sacrifice one of the bravest armies that ever followed the fortunes of a favourite general? The first consul having at one time expressed a strong inclination to obtain Egypt, was not a sufficient ground for the retention of it, in the way in which it was by ministers proposed to be retained. There appeared something laughable in the whole arrangements relative to the retention of Malta. The ultimatum of ministers was, that Malta should remain in our possession for ten years. Now, what was the object of such an arrangement? Was there any thing mysterious in having Malta in our possession by a bond for ten years? After the ten years were expired, were the ambitious views of Buonaparté to be moderated? He differed from ministers on the simple principle, that Malta ought to be kept in perpetuity by this country. But they did not rest their case with Malta. They had a long string of complaints against the French government, respecting the curtailment of the liberty of the press, the dismissal of emigrants, and the seditious publications of bishops. The insolence of Buonaparté, in requiring these concessions to his haughty demands, had been made a subject of general complaint. But, after having perused the papers with the utmost attention, he saw no proof of his insolence. If the French government really required that the liberty of the press should be curtailed, that the freedom of discussion in both Houses of parliament should be limited, then ministers ought to have insisted on an immediate explanation. If the answer of the French government was not satisfactory, they ought to have recalled our minister that day, and on the succeeding day our cannon ought to have roared to avenge the insult offered to the national honour. He allowed that he had seen some late publications of a most mischievous tendency. Some of them were indeed of a nature which could not be justified on any principle of regard to the rights of independent states. It was of great importance that the liberty of the press, as it ought to be exercised, should be accurately defined. He wished to state the views which he entertained on the subject. The criterion as to what was false, scandalous, and scurrilous, was what would be tolerated with respect to the ministers of the crown. What could not be applied to their conduct, it was criminal to apply to the conduct of the first magistrates of other countries. On this point he thought the first consul had a right to complain; because it does not appear that any specific case of insolence on the part of the government of France was established. The plain objection against ministers was this, that they did not make a specific remonstrance. They suffered past injuries to pass over unnoticed. They continued to negotiate about Malta; and they have no right now to hold up these as real grounds of war. The noble lord concluded by saying that he should vote against the address, as it was now formed, whatever his sentiments of indignation were against French ambition. Before he sat down, he paid some high compliments to Mr. Addington, whose uprightness of conduct demanded the highest approbation. He was confident of his sincere desire of peace, and thought that even still an effort might be made to maintain the continuance of tranquillity betwixt the two governments.

The Duke of Clarence said, that he was one of those who had voted for peace, and supported ministers in executing the treaty of Amiens, because he had perceived the general wish for peace: on that account, he accorded with it, though he never thought it could be lasting; and he would add, that he was considerably disappointed when he heard it was signed. But, under existing circumstances, he had no doubt that ministers had done the best for the country.

After having read over many of the papers, and commented on them with great perspicuity, he called their lordships attention to Malta, which he impressively stated would be a place of defence, and not of offence, in the hands of Great Britain; but in the possession of France, it would necessarily lead to the most dangerous consequences: from Toulon a squadron might sail to Malta, from Malta to Egypt, and from Egypt to our Eastern possessions. The noble earl had said, that, by the conduct of the first consul himself, St. Domingo was lost to France. He thought differently; and was of opinion that France lost St. Domingo through this country, which had lately opened its eyes to the designs of a few desperate men. It was in consequence of his majesty's message of the 9th of March, that it might be said to the French government, "You shall not have St. Domingo, you shall not have Louisiana; to Spain, you shall not have the Floridas;" and to her ally the Batavian republic I would say, "You shall not have the Cape of Good Hope, you shall not have any thing but what Great Britain pleases to give you." I wish to see this country exert her vast resources, to convince this mighty hero that we are able to contend single handed against France and all her accessions. I wish to see Great Britain chastise France. It is not the first time that we have done so: and if the war be conducted with vigour and wisdom, I think it cannot last long.

Lord Mulgrave thought the oppressions exercised by France over other powers, to aggrandize her empire, was a sufficient reason for us to refuse to surrender Malta; but by the letter of the treaty, we were bound to surrender Malta to the order, who were to be restored to their ancient privileges; instead of that, the order had been stripped by France, both of its property and privileges. A grand master had been chosen, by the pope, who was himself a vassal of France, and therefore to restore it now, would be only giving it into the hands of France, as a key to the possession of Egypt. If ministers were to bear longer the insolence of the French government, they might have Napper Tandy sent over to them, as a commercial agent; or Arthur O'Connor, as proconsul of Britain. He therefore approved of the conduct of ministers on this occasion.

concurrence to the address, and in pledging himself to support his majesty in the maintenance of the just rights and interests of the country, he begged leave to explain the sentiments he entertained upon this important subject. In alluding to Malta, he observed, that this question was now freed from much of the perplexity in which it had been involved. He rejoiced that the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens was incapable of being carried into execution. He thought it matter of congratulation that the French, by their obstinacy, had prevented any new and adequate arrangement for the independence of Malta from being substituted in the room of that which circumstances had so completely rendered impracticable. What, indeed, would have been the situation of Malta with all its guarantees? Was the guarantee of Spain, of Prussia, of France, to be relied upon? It would not be pretended that such securities were of any avail. The only guarantee of importance, was that of Russia, in conjunction with Great Britain. He spoke of the importance of Russia in such an arrangement with the greatest satisfaction, for he considered it mutually for the interest of the two countries to cherish the strictest union and alliance. Nevertheless, he was happy that the guarantee of Russia was not to be attached to an arrangement in every way so inadequate to the object it had in view. It was, in fact, most advantageous for Russia that Malta should be under the protection of Great Britain. It was Great Britain alone which, by its naval superiority, by its capacity to avail itself of the harbours and naval station of Malta, was calculated to be the custodier of Malta. Every other plan for its protection and independence was futile and inadequate. Now indeed he was at liberty to contemplate the possibility of realising an object of so much importance as the settlement of Malta under British protection. Well did he remember the melancholy moments he had passed, when, after reading the definitive treaty, he found Malta exposed to the danger of falling into the hands of a power that would employ it for our destruction. The importance of that island had long appeared to him to be very great, and Europe had in the most decisive instances witnessed it. By means of Malta it was that the French had attacked and made themselves masters of Egypt. By Malta

it was that we had been enabled to recover that possession. If Malta remained in our hands, it was impossible that all the efforts of France, that all the armaments she could send forth, could obtain possession of Egypt, while we, with a superior navy, had the opportunity of availing ourselves of the harbours of Malta. Malta, therefore, was to be considered as of infinite importance to the strengthening and security of our empire in India. He considered it as a rock or great tower erected in the Mediterranean, on which the flag of Great Britain, displayed and floating, would hold forth an invitation to the people of the Mediterranean, of the Adriatic, and of the Levant seas, to rally round it, and to avail themselves of the protection of this country. It therefore was subject of congratulation that, without any charge upon our good faith, an opportunity had occurred in which the 10th article of the treaty could not be executed. As we were now going to war, and as Malta formed one of the main objects of the war, he wished that its value should be fully understood, and that we should likewise keep in view the necessity of availing ourselves of its advantages to the utmost. He hoped to hear no more of the order being restored; or of the independence of the island being in any manner guaranteed. While Great Britain was able to keep a superior fleet in the harbours of Malta, in the protection of Great Britain it would be secure. It was evident what great interests depended upon the retention of Malta; were we then to give up that possession which was so essential to those interests? If, then, we were going to war for Malta, it was an object to animate the courage and reward the achievements of our fleets and armies. We should go to war, therefore, upon this ground, as a broad question both of right and of general policy. In this view it was matter of congratulation that Malta was to be considered as a British object. We had now got rid of any consideration of the knights of St. John. What was the situation of those knights when we obtained possession of the island? They had degraded and overthrown their order by an act of perfidy; nor could they be restored without the severest injury to the people of the island. The order had become odious to the Maltese by the act of treachery by which they had put them under the government of France, and it was doubtful whether the Maltese would not have deemed themselves less unfortunate in being transferred to France, than in being again placed under the command of an order which they had so much reason to hate and to distrust. Besides, it was to be considered, that we went to the aid of the Maltese, previously engaged in the reduction of the French; and it was greatly against the wishes of the people that the order was to be reinstated upon any terms. We ought, therefore, to secure to the Maltese a wise and suitable form of civil government, to be enjoyed by them under the protection of the British power. He considered the retention of Malta for ever to be a most essential object, and one to which, in the relative circumstances of France and this country, we were fully entitled to prosecute by a war. In voting for the address, we therefore voted our concurrence in the war, of which that was the principal object. The attainment of it would be of the utmost benefit to all the states of the Levant, and under our protection alone Malta could be rendered independent and happy.

The Duke of Richmond was of opinion that there were not, and particularly with respect to Malta, sufficient grounds for the renewal of hostilities. It appeared that ministers would have been satisfied with the possession of Lampedosa before the late explosion, and the ultimatum proposed to the French government, that at the end of ten years Malta should be given up to the inhabitants for that very island. He did not, therefore, like to hear them talk of going to war for an island which, they admitted themselves, they would relinquish at the expiration of a given time. On an impartial consideration of the papers, he did not hesitate to say that the treaty of Amiens ought to be maintained.

The Marquis of Lansdown said, it was from the consideration of all the papers submitted to their lordships, that they were called upon to decide whether war was just and necessary. He had heard a great deal about the liberty of the press, but he never could bring himself to think it stood in need of protection, while the trial by jury was enjoyed by British subjects. The different points in dispute required a most minute consideration, to enable the House to come to a decision. He should not take them upon rumour, but reason upon facts. All that had been said of Holland, of its distresses and sufferings, and of its intimate connexion with Great Britain as to common interest, had been very much exaggerated and twisted to serve particular ends. There was nothing, at all events, of such necessity as to press this country into hostilities on account of Holland. With respect to Switzerland, notwithstanding its boasted independence, it was undeniable that it belonged to other powers, and not to us to interfere for its deliverance. Austria had clearly a more powerful cause to interpose than us, yet she was deaf to those complaints in which her own interests were allowed to be most materially implicated. It was stated, that France had acted in the most arbitrary manner with regard to the seizure of Parma and Placentia. He could not find any apology for an act so tyrannical; but was there no other power interested in the repression of that despotism than Great Britain? Were we upon all occasions to volunteer our resources and exertions when those more immediately interested did not think proper to interfere? Why did not Russia think proper to interfere, which openly avowed the deep concern she felt in the preservation of these countries? But then, said his lordship, another ground for going to war is discovered in the mission of Sebastiani to Egypt. I beg leave to state, that in this very instance, which is made a strong cause for the renewal of hostilities, there is nothing that can justify us in our appealing to arms, though it contains much that is offensive, in the manner of it. The governments of all countries are in the habit of sending persons abroad in order to collect information, sometimes of a commercial, and sometimes of a military nature. But it is maintained, as another cause of war, that the first consul has views upon Egypt. I have no doubt he has, and any one in his situation would be actuated by the same views. I am, however, far from thinking his designs are of a nature so alarming as they are described. Was it to be expected that all views of ambition should be extinguished in the breast of the first consul. He was far from supporting the whole of that person's character. No honest man, he believed, could approve of his conduct. Yet it was not because the first consul had developed views of ambition that we ought to conclude he intended to go to war with us. Our business it was, not to allow ourselves to be hurried away by disapprobation of the first consul's measures, or by an exaggerated alarm at his ambition, but to follow a steady course of national policy. When I hear the importance of Malta so much cried up, your lordships will pardon me if I do not lay such stress upon the acquisition of that island. How comes it that the great importance of Malta has all at once started into notice? Five years ago it was not thought of so much value, when it was offered to this country by the grand master. Besides, as it is in our possession, where is the necessity that compels us to go to war for it? Is it to secure that which might have been done by negotiation? I fervently hope that means may be devised for keeping the door open to negotiation. Let us first try every possible way to obtain by conciliation the objects we are desirous of possessing; and if our efforts fail, let us then have recourse to arms. Let us profit by the example of the American war, and take care that our discretion and prudence be not sacrificed to false glory.

The Duke of Norfolk could not think of calling on ministers to give up Malta to France; but he hoped that the benefits of peace would not be lightly thrown away on the provocation of the moment. He hoped that the guarantee of Russia might still be obtained, upon this head. He wished that it should be the recommendation of this House to his majesty, that no mediation should be refused, that would hold out a hope of securing the peace of Europe, but if the independence of Europe, and the honour of the country could no otherwise be obtained, then he would agree to meet again the miseries and difficulties of war.

Lord King said, that though the situation of Europe was alarming, he did not see the present moment favourable for attempting to redress what was wrong. Single handed, we could make no great impression on France; nor could the capture of her colonies seriously reduce her power. France was not made up of various, separate and detached settlements; nor did her resources depend on distant colonies, or foreign commerce. She was a great territorial, military, and condensed power; and not to be greatly repressed by a power of a different description, like that of England. He doubted greatly the prudence of going to war at this juncture. Malta was an important object, but not worth purchasing at the expense of war. He proposed an amendment, the object of which was to leave out part of the address, and to substitute a new paragraph, the purport of which was, that the House would see with satisfaction, that his majesty would listen to any farther offer of amicable settlement, consistent with the honour and interests of the country.

Lord Ellenborough expressed his surprise at the amendment moved by the noble lord, at a period when unanimity was so peremptorily called for. Was it to be asked, after the accumulation of insults and injuries heaped upon this country by France what we went to war for? He would answer, that we went to war for the reparation of our wrongs. It had been said by a noble duke, that we went to war for the island of Lampedosa; he denied it: we went to war for our constitutional liberties, our independence, and our commerce. The question was, whether we were to enjoy our civil liberty and our right of legislating for ourselves, or whether, for the first time, we were to be dictated to by any foreign power, whether a legitimate sovereign or an usurper, whether we would surrender the island to a foreign foe, and with it our dearest rights and most valuable privileges. He agreed that they were deeply responsible for the vote which they should that night give: but there were considerations abundantly sufficient to justify their vote in favour of hostilities. The article of the treaty of Amiens, which related to Malta, was rendered, by the acts of France, entirely incapable of execution. Not only the revenues were subtracted which were appropriated to the support of the order, but the guarantees were denied, except in the case of Austria. Some new arrangements became absolutely necessary, and this of course became a principal subject of negotiation. He would not go the length of saying, that Malta should remain to us in perpetuity, and that therefore the article ought not to be fulfilled in any respect. He thought, on the contrary, that, according to the acknowledged law of nations, where an article of a treaty could not, in consequence of subsequent circumstances, be executed, an arrangement should be made to bring the object as nearly as possible back to the original intention. We never had been in a case where the surrender of Malta could be justly demanded of us: and no one could contend that we ought, under the circumstances of the case in which we were placed, to have given it up. If they looked to the papers, they found matter which involved the nerve and the feelings of the whole country, which involved that palladium of our liberty, the freedom of the press, and which involved the consideration of our dearest rights and constitutional liberties. He trusted, that while the licentiousness of the press was restrained, this country would never surrender its just liberty of the press; that that press would never be subject to a foreign imprimatur; that our constitutional liberty would never be violated, nor the stream of justice diverted from its course, at the instance of a foreign foe. When they examined the paper dated the 9th of February, they found the views of the French government sufficiently developed in the act of a man, who, it was evident, was clothed in the garb of authority. Was it prudent to give up Malta at that period when they saw the spear in the hands of the enemy? When they saw that an army of 25,000 men, destined for one purpose, was easily convertible to another? In Switzerland had there not been, on the part of France, a direct violation of the treaty of Luneville? When all the hostile acts committed by France stared them in the face, was it to be asked, why go to war? As to the proposition made on our part for the retention of Malta for ten years, such an arrangement was sufficient evidence of our sincere desire of peace. In the course of that time, many circumstances might have occurred to render the face of affairs upon the continent wholly different. The present war was the result of injuries accumulated upon this country by France. It might, in its consequences, oppress private families; and therefore nothing but a deep sense of the justice of our cause would have induced him to assent to the address. Though the present was a crisis of peril, yet there was no cause for despondency. Though we had not among us the heroes of Cressy or of Agincourt, yet we had living among us, the heroes of Acre, of the Nile, of St. Vincent, and of Camperdown, who were fully equal to the task of directing the energies of the country, and pursuing to a successful termination the contest in which we were engaged. He trusted, that congenial spirit would produce congenial effect, both in our naval and military service; and that all petty considerations would be merged in the essential interests of the British empire.

The Earl of Moira regretted that an amendment had been proposed which could produce the least diversity of sentiment upon an occasion when unanimity was so desirable. Passing from this amendment, which he hoped would not be pressed, he took notice of the manner in which a learned judge had treated the complaints of the French government, with respect to the publications in this country, referring to its administration; and upon this point he was ready to admit the candour of the noble secretary of state as to the offensive tendency of the general tenor of those publications. Among those, however, he did not mean so much to dwell upon the sentiments of the English newspapers as upon those which appeared in French newspapers published in London, particularly the Courier de Londres, a paper understood to be in a great degree under the peculiar patronage of his majesty's ministers. If so, the French government had just reason to complain. It was reviled in the grossest terms in this publication, and why, he would ask, should a paper be suffered to pursue that system of conduct which must operate to disturb the amity subsisting between the two governments, more particularly when government had power, under the Alien act, to send the editor out of the country? We were not in that state in which we were to consider merely the justice or expediency of the war, but whether this country should continue to enjoy that independence which belonged to her, or should submit to the absolute dictation of a French ambassador; but he could not accede to the proposition, that Malta alone would have been a rational ground for war; because, if that island had been completely ceded to us, it would have afforded a degree of security infinitely short of what we had a right to expect, and what it became necessary for us now to seek. The objects for which we had to contend were of a wider and more important nature. Our jealousy and alarm was excited by that incorrigible spirit of encroachment and ambition which the government of France had manifested. Were not Holland, Piedmont, and Switzerland, just subjects of our solicitude? The main object of the war must be to restrain the arrogance, to reduce the preponderance of the French government; and until that object be attained, the war should not be abandoned. It was quite competent to Great Britain to bring this overgrown authority within reasonable bounds; but it must be done by vigorous efforts, by a short and decisive war, not by petty attempts with respect to Malta, or any comparatively inferior object, or by any colonial expeditions, calculated to cramp the energy and waste the strength of the country.

Earl Spencer said, he had no hesitation in giving it as his decided opinion, that upon the face of the whole negotiation, this country had not only a just, but an indispensable cause of war against France. He should therefore give his hearty support to the address, rather than to the amendment, which, by prolonging a temporizing system, would lead to no possible advantage, but rather exhaust the means of our security, and allow the French government time to gain new advantages. He trusted, now that war was rendered inevitable, the House and the country would be unanimous in enabling his majesty to prosecute it with energy. He trusted that our resources would be wisely and energetically administered; and this done, no doubt could remain of success.

The Earl of Rosslyn, although he agreed with lord Melville, that Malta alone would be a sufficient ground of war, yet thought it evident, that the whole system of France, since the peace, and her many breaches of good faith, amounted to an abundant cause of war, on our part. He considered the menacing language, held forth by Buonaparté to lord Whitworth, as a sufficient cause of war. His whole conduct, since he signed the treaty, was an uniform system of arrogance, insult, and injury. His views against the Turkish empire, which he did not take the trouble to conceal, were contrary to the letter of the treaty of Amiens, and therefore a ground of war. He wished that this should not be considered as a war likely to be short, but as one so absolutely necessary, that our only wish should be, to carry it on with vigour and success.

Lord Grenville said, that the address was drawn up in terms with which he heartily concurred, because they were congenial with those sentiments of national honour which formed the best security for the country. No man felt more strongly than he did the calamities which must attend a state of war, and the activity which ought of course to be employed to preserve mankind from such an evil; but the best way of warding it off was, not by appearing to feel too much afraid of it, for that might serve only to postpone the danger, and when it again approached, its advances might become irresistible, and its evils aggravated. It was in order to guard against such a war, that he had for some time back recommended a line of policy to ministers which he was convinced would have been much more effectual towards avoiding war than the course they had pursued. He condemned their system; and he had before stated distinctly the reasons of his opinion. In considering the subject which his majesty's declaration involved, two questions arose; the one related to the policy of concurring with his majesty to maintain the honour of his crown and the interests of his people; the other as to the conduct of ministers since the termination of the last war. The latter point he would exclude from the question before the House, as it was meant to form the subject of consideration on a future day. In offering his majesty the solemn assurance of his support, he was not induced to do so in order to rectify the errors of the treaty of Amiens, or to sustain any deviation from it. For it was his wish that that treaty should be adhered to strictly: the public faith stood pledged for it; but it seemed impossible to conform to that treaty. The article with respect to Malta was evidently impracticable; but it is now stated that it would have been practicable if new circumstances had not arisen. What were they, he would ask, which did not actually exist, or were on the brink of existing, at the time when the treaty was signed? Yet he never did say that those errors would be a fair ground for war; he strongly recommended that they should be removed, not by war, but by amicable negotiation. A noble earl had said, that as Malta was so valuable, a proposition ought to be made to the French government, to give in exchange for Malta the islands of Guernsey and Jersey. This was an idea not to be endured. What! would the noble earl, who professed himself an advocate for liberty, recommend to have so many thousand British subjects transferred to the most degrading slavery that existed in the world? The act was beyond the power of the House to attempt, because their lordships were incapable of injustice. Returning to the question before the House, he observed that he was happy to see such a spirit reviving in that

House and in the country, as would enable us to meet a war with dignity, from which we could not recede without meanness—a war which was not a matter of choice on our part, but of necessity. It was unnecessary to eke out arguments to prove a case of aggression; the facts were glaring. There were acts and proofs enough to urge the House and the country to prepare for determined, effective, energetic war. Whatever inconveniences they may endure—whatever burthens they may incur—it is better to begin the contest now, than wait until we should be obliged to engage in it, with perhaps diminished means, and against increased forces. The French government had given such direct evidence of an intention to violate the treaty of Amiens, that even on the grounds of prevention war was justifiable. The designs of Buonaparté on the Turkish empire were notorious. Though he had in the treaty of Amiens guaranteed the integrity of that empire, yet the French government had actually proposed to other governments the partition of the Turkish territories, and her share would no doubt comprehend Egypt. Without taking Sebastiani's report at all into account, the circumstance alluded to in the declaration is quite sufficient to warrant the inference, that the first consul meditated a breach of the treaty of Amiens. Under all these circumstances, peace or war was not a matter of choice; and he would suggest to the noble lord who proposed the amendment, that as temporising had already produced no other effect than to torture the people of this country by suspense, and embolden the pretensions of the first consul, it would not be advisable to make any farther experiments in that way. The man who now governed France was not to be conciliated into the practice of justice by the appearance of submission. Being convinced that war alone was the remedy left for the country, he would strongly exhort to every possible exertion; and he thought that no expectation should be held out that the struggle would be short. The people should be fully apprized, that the contest is not of a light or trifling kind, to be encountered by ordinary exertions, but by a spirit exalted and equal to the magnitude of the occasion.

The House divided; for the Amendment, 10; Against it, 142. The original address was then agreed to.

The King's Message relative to calling out the Supplementary Militia.] May 25. The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought down the following message:

"GEORGE R.: His majesty thinks it proper to acquaint the House of Commons, that he has judged it necessary to adopt, without delay, all the means within his power, which may contribute to defeat the avowed designs of the enemy, and to afford the most effectual protection and security to his faithful people.

"In pursuance, therefore, of the act of parliament, enabling his majesty to increase the number of his militia forces, his majesty makes this communication to the House of Commons, to the end that his majesty may cause the supplementary militia to be forthwith raised and enrolled, and thereafter to be drawn out and embodied, and marched as occasion may require.
G. R."

Spiritual Persons Relief Bill.] April 6. Sir W. Scott said, that ever since the establishment of religion in this country, there were existing laws which regulated the national church, and these laws enforced the clergy to give the strictest attention to the duties of the church, as well as allowing a certain provision to render her members comfortable. But these ancient laws had for centuries lain dormant. There were also several acts of a more recent date: in lord Bacon's time, laws were framed for the regulation of the clergy; the letter and spirit of them were nearly the same as those of an anterior date, but which had also lain dormant till within these five years, since which time they had been brought into use, and, he was sorry to say, to the injury of many worthy men. Among the members of the church of England, were many characters who were the highest honour to the nation; men of simple habits, amiable dispositions, and laborious life, who were liable to feel the effect of one of these old statutes, and who would rather redeem themselves with money, than suffer the exposure which an information, founded on the act of Henry 8th would enforce. Notwithstanding, it was his wish that some measure should be adopted to make the clergy attentive to the duties of the church. As the laws stood at present, relative to the duty of clergymen, they doubtless contained many defects, and it was high time to do what my lord Coke had recommended above 150 years ago, that was, to revise the statutes applicable to the regulation of the church. By the advice of his friends, he had undertaken to give this subject serious consideration. On a former occasion, he had expressed his wish that time should be given to deliberate on the bill then before the House; but every member must recollect what a mob of bills rushed through the House in the last agony of that parliament; yet he did not expect that the former bill would have been one of them. With respect to the present bill, it was fundamentally the same as the former one. It contained an exemption to several persons; whether this was right he would leave the House to decide. He had not made any provision for the parochial clergy; that he thought ought to come from another quarter. It was his wish that the parsonage houses should be put in proper repair for the reception of their proper inhabitants; from the decay these dwellings had been suffered to go into, many clergymen were under the necessity of residing at a great distance from their duty. As to those benefices to which there was no house attached, some provision ought to be made to render the clergy more comfortable. With respect to the small benefices, something had been done by Mr. Gilbert's act, but it had not gone far enough to be of real service to this order of the clergy. The method he should propose would be, that government should advance a sum of money, as a fund, to mend the stipends of curates; this he thought necessary for the better support of those numerous, worthy, laborious men, on whom the religion and morality of the country so much depended. He hoped the measure would be found calculated to answer every purpose for which it was designed; and moved for leave to bring in a bill, "to amend and render more effectual the laws relating to spiritual persons holding of farms, and for enforcing the residence of spiritual persons on their benefices."—Leave was given, and the bill was afterwards brought in, and repeatedly committed.

May 26. On the order of the day for the third reading,

Sir Francis Burdett said, that of all the objectionable proceedings that ever occupied his attention, he conceived this to be the most unjust. It might be entitled "A bill for enslaving and degrading the clergy of the established church;" for, by this bill the clergy were left at the mercy of the bishops, and also of the minister of the day. He would rather submit to the operation of the very worst laws that could be framed, than to the will of any individual. This bill also affected the property of those concerned in a material degree; for if a parent had laid out, under the sanction of the old laws, a sum of money as a provision for his son, either in point of education or, in any other way in which the church was concerned, he might be dismissed, by not immediately attending to the admonition of the bishop, though it might be a point in which his whole fortune was engaged. This was a state of degradation to which the members of the established church should not be reduced. This House had already adopted the principle, that when a man was once a clergyman, he should always remain so; so that if a clergyman were inclined, in consequence of the operation of this bill, to change his profession, he had no power of doing so. He objected to the bill, on the grounds of the discretionary power which it lodged in the bishops. If one bishop gave a clergyman a licence to go abroad for two or three years as tutor to a nobleman or gentleman's son, that bishop might in the mean time be translated, and his successor be actuated by different sentiments: so that when this clergyman came home, he would probably find another person in possession of his benefice, which in some degree might be considered as his freehold estate. He also objected to this dispensing power of the bishops on other grounds. The clergy in general possessed a right of voting for members of parliament; now this bill left so many voters at the mercy of ministers, through the medium of the bishops, that he considered it extremely dangerous in that point of view. It was a violation of every principle of justice, to place men, by an ex post facto law in such a situation. It was well known, that the bishop of St. David's previous to an election, had sent a circular letter to the clergymen of his diocese, to influence them on that occasion; but even that step would not be necessary in future; for this bill gave the bishops such an absolute control over the clergy, that no one would dare to vote in opposition to them. He thought, for his part, that, instead of giving such control, there should be an injunction on the bishops to set the example in point of discharge of duty. The bishop of Landaff held the situation of regius professor at Cambridge; he also held a living in Huntingdonshire, and an archdeaconry in another place; and yet he lived in Cumberland. He objected to the committing of persons to the discretion of men, not to be trusted any more than themselves. It was doing away all ideas of liberty and independence; and upon grounds of constitutional jealousy, he felt himself called upon to oppose the bill.

The bill was read a third time. On the motion, that it do pass, the House divided:

Debate on Mr. Fox's Motion respecting the Mediation of Russia.] May 27. Mr. Fox rose, for the purpose of making his promised motion respecting the mediation of the emperor of Russia to adjust the existing differences between this country and France. He observed, that although, from the time and circumstances under which he brought it forward, it might be considered as one of the most important ever submitted to parliament, it was one which led to no great length of discussion, nor would require him to take any very comprehensive view of the topics naturally connected with it. Into the general question of the propriety of the war, he was not disposed to enter. He had stated his opinions very fully on a former day: a great majority had differed from him; and to the judgment of that majority it was his duty to bow. The country was then actually at war, and being so, he should give the war the best support in his power. But although we were at war, and although many differences prevailed as to the grounds of it, no one would deny the propriety of bringing it as soon as possible to an honourable termination. The proposition which it was his intention to submit to the House had this object in view. It was understood, that an offer had recently been made by the emperor of Russia to interpose his mediation, or good offices, for the settlement of the differences between Great Britain and France. He wished to induce the House of Commons to advise his majesty immediately to avail himself of those friendly dispositions. On the advantages of mediation in general, it was not necessary for him to descant; still less on the advantages which must result from the mediation of that powerful, respected, and universally esteemed sovereign, the emperor of Russia. It was Mr. Fox's opinion, that even where mediation was wholly inactive, where the mediating powers lent only their names to a negotiation, the offer of it ought, under almost any circumstances, to be accepted. Even this, which was the lowest species of mediation, was useful for the sake of public opinion. What was now proposed, however, he understood to be of the higher species, and to amount to an offer, by the emperor of Russia, of an effectual interposition of his good offices; which, among other advantages, included this,—that if it should fail, through our enemy's advancing unjust claims and pretensions, and if we should be compelled by such failure to prosecute the war for objects which, in that case, must be approved by the mediating sovereign, we should secure his support, and the sanction of his great and powerful name. And what was equally material, we should have in our favour the public opinion of Europe and the world. This, let gentlemen be assured, was no trifling matter; it was a consideration of sufficient importance by itself, even if there existed no other motive, to determine in favour of the propriety of the step he was about to recommend.

It was not, however, merely for the sake of adjusting present differences that he thought the acceptance of this mediation so desirable. To that power to which ministers looked as the principal and only fit guarantee for Malta, they might naturally look for mediation on other matters; they might look for an extension of his guarantee to all the points now at issue between the governments of Great Britain and France. Thoroughly impressed with the feasibility of this plan, Mr. Fox most anxiously conjured ministers, as they valued the interests of their country and the permanent peace of Europe, not to suffer the present opportunity to escape them; not to overlook means so obvious and so practicable for the accomplishment of all their objects, whether of security, honour, or satisfaction.

In his hopes of benefit from this measure, Mr. Fox said, that he carried his views very far. The power, the character, and the rank of the emperor of Russia, rendered him, of all sovereigns, not only the very fittest mediator on the points in dispute between Great Britain and France, but the fittest protector and guarantee of the rights of independent nations, and of the general interest of Europe. The personal character of this prince stood on the highest ground; nor could his own praise of him, Mr. Fox said, add any thing to the estimation in which he was every where held. He spoke not of his private character alone, but of his princely qualities, of his justice to the people committed to his care, of his love of peace, and of his ardent desire for its maintenance in Europe; and particularly of his wish to see peace restored between Great Britain and France, although he was not likely to be a loser by their quarrels.

The leading feature of his character, therefore, was that which most fitted him for a mediator. There was another part in it which peculiarly pointed him out as the mediator to whom we should most choose to refer our differences. This prince was understood to be very sensibly affected by many changes which had taken place in Europe since the peace of Amiens; and to have highly disapproved, and in many instances to have been disgusted with the conduct of France towards other powers since that period. It was impossible, therefore, to imagine a sovereign, whose interposition could be more consonant to what ought to be our wishes. In looking for a mediator, the two points concerning which it would most import us to be satisfied, were, his character and his opinions. The first qualification, as he had already stated, was a love of peace; the second, a dislike and disapprobation of those acts which either directly or remotely constituted the cause of the dispute on which he was to mediate. Both these were eminently conspicuous in the illustrious sovereign of whom he was then speaking.

With respect to the beneficial consequences which would attend the acceptance of his mediation on a more extended scale, Mr. Fox was very sanguine. He would state no certainty, indeed, of its producing peace, but a strong and reasonable hope. At all events, he looked forward through it to the most advantageous connection which this country could form under the present circumstances of Europe. In the actual state of affairs, what was more probable than that France, taking advantage of her condition of preparation and power, would abuse it, for the purpose of further acquisitions at the expense of the smaller and more defenceless states? This was the great evil to be apprehended from the present war: and against this evil a connection with Russia would be the surest guard, as well as afford the best hope of settling at last some solid system of peace for Europe. What other means, he would ask, had we of preventing the oppression of the smaller states, by France, if she should be disposed to attempt it? What means had we of our own? And after France had testified a disposition to accept the mediation, how would it appear to Europe were we to decline the offer?

No expression implying the superiority of any other power was fit to be used in speaking of Great Britain and its interests; but he would ask, was there ever a sovereign who, from his situation, was so fit to prescribe peace as the emperor of Russia? What was the language which he was enabled to hold both to this country and to France? We had a dispute with the late emperor, which, although settled, was settled upon conditions to which the court of St. Petersburg might still continue to except, as being in a great degree harsh and disadvantageous. On the other hand, that court objected to part of an article in the treaty of Amiens, to the general conditions of which, however, she was still ready to accede upon the removal of her objection. The point was, to us, a mere trifle; no more than whether a Maltese langue should be admitted into the order. The emperor, therefore, might say fairly to us, "There were some points in my treaty with you, to which, however disadvantageous, I submitted, for my love of peace. Do you, in return, act in the same manner. You complain of an article in the treaty of Amiens, so do I of the terms of the northern convention. To these several treaties we each of us agreed for the sake of peace. Imitate, therefore, on your parts, the moderation I showed on mine, and make a sacrifice to the peace of Amiens of any trifling objection, in the same manner as I sacrificed all mine to the northern convention." But if this sovereign could speak in such terms to us, he could speak in much stronger terms to France. It was reported (with what truth Mr. Fox did not pretend to know), that some time since a proposition had been made from France to Russia for the dismemberment and partition of the Turkish empire. This report was alluded to in his majesty's declaration, in which paper the proposition itself was also stated to have been rejected. The emperor, therefore, stands towards the French government on the very best ground for enforcing upon it the counsels of moderation. That power, which has been so long and so justly suspected of entertaining designs hostile to the Turkish empire; that sovereign who would gain most territory, although perhaps it may not be quite so certain that he would acquire any great addition of solid strength, by the partition of its provinces, decidedly refused to lend his countenance to so iniquitous a project. The emperor of Russia, therefore, is the sovereign who is entitled to speak in the firmest language to any other European power that might be supposed to entertain similar designs against its defenceless neighbours. "You propose to me," he might say, "the dismemberment of Turkey. If I, who had the fairest hopes of advantage from that dismemberment, the standing policy of whose ancestors it has been to achieve the enterprize, and who might be supposed to be actuated by an hereditary partiality towards that object—if I refused to accede to it from a sense of what was due to justice and the rights of others, I am entitled to make the same claim upon you. I preferred peace to the gratification of my ambition. Do you the same. I abstained from attacking my neighbours. Abstain you also."

Such was the language which the emperor of Russia could hold towards France, and which most probably he would be induced to hold, if his offer of mediation were accepted upon the large scale he had ventured to recommend. This sovereign, too, was peculiarly situated with regard to France, so situated as both to be inclined and enabled to succour with effect those states which might be supposed the first and most immediate objects of French aggression. Mr. Fox, therefore, again most earnestly advised the ministers to attach themselves cordially to that power, from which alone they could derive any material assistance in the prosecution of their views; whether those views were for a solid peace, or for a vigorous war. With that power alone for an ally, if they could contrive to form an alliance with it, we might be enabled to protect, and to secure from attack, all the weaker states in the European system.

If it were objected that France only agreed to the offer of mediation with a view to procrastinate, against her gaining such an advantage, Mr. Fox said it would be the duty of ministers most vigilantly to guard; but he cautioned the House against the rejection of treaties, and against repelling all approaches to negotiation, merely on account of our not being perfectly satisfied as to the good faith and general dispositions of an adverse power. If the government of France had expressed a willingness to accept the mediation, and if the people of that country in general, as every common traveller could not have failed to observe, were anxious for peace, would not our rejection of such a measure tend immediately to render the war popular among them, by throwing upon us all the odium of its commencement? Is it not for our interest to deprive the government of France of this advantage? Is it not for our interest to enter into a mediation, which, if France should render ineffectual, will lay her under the necessity of contending, not only with us, but with Russia? To submit our claims to the arbitrary decision of that court, or of any other power on earth, no man disdained more than himself; but to explain the justice of them to a friendly state, was to be considered in a very different light, especially when such a proceeding opened the way to a union with that state, upon principles of common security and defence.

Of continental connections, as they were entered into and managed by our ancestors, Mr. Fox professed himself the warm and constant friend. These connexions were either wise, or otherwise, according to circumstances; and he considered a connexion with Russia, in the present state of affairs, to be most wise and most expedient. He would not undervalue our resources, but for any practicable object in the war, except that of mere self-defence, what were our means? If our views really tended towards abridging in any degree the continental power of France, what chance had we of bringing our resources to bear upon this object, except through the connection to which he pointed? a connection, to the forming of which the opportunity now presented to us was most happy—and might never return!

Every consideration of policy pointed this way. In looking to the rest of the continent, no other power seemed in a situation likely to afford us any assistance. On the other hand, what would Great Britain and Russia have to fear from a junction of either Prussia or the house of Austria with France? That these powers should jointly assist France against Great Britain and Russia, there never could be much reason to apprehend; that either of them should separately assist her, under the present circumstances, he saw little reason to believe. Peace was known to be the general settled system of the Prussian monarchy at present, and Austria, independent of the obvious doubts respecting her cordiality in any co-operation with France, was too much exhausted by the pressure of the late war, not to make peace absolutely necessary to her recovery. That peace is become her policy, was also to be presumed from the change in her councils, and from the elevation to power of the archduke Charles—a prince most universally respected and beloved—a prince, who after the immortal glories he has acquired in war—glories not to be diminished by defeat, since in adverse circumstances he had done all that could be expected from the greatest talents—now, happily for mankind, seems to consider it his truest glory to discharge his debt to the people who supported him throughout an arduous contest, by securing to them the enjoyment, and by cultivating for their sakes, the advantages of peace. Such was the employment of the archduke Charles, which, with the considerations he had mentioned before, led him to believe that a pacific spirit prevailed equally in the cabinets of Vienna, of Berlin, and of St. Petersburg; offering to us the fairest opportunity that perhaps had ever occurred, of forming the union for which he was so earnest, upon the broad principles he had been endeavouring to establish.

Mr. Fox then enlarged upon the satisfaction to ourselves, and even the political advantages which would attend our conducting ourselves in such a manner as to conciliate the public opinion of Europe. Although Holland or Switzerland, or the smaller states of Italy, might not be able possibly to give us any immediate assistance, even their good wishes were not to be despised. Under the powerful protection of a Russian alliance, growing out of the mediation such as he viewed it, those good wishes might, in time, bring us allies. The measure was equally desirable, whether war or peace should be the ultimate result. From the refusal of Russia to accept the guarantee of Malta as we had originally proposed it, some persons might think she was ill-inclined towards our cause, and might be actuated by partiality towards that of France; and under this persuasion might be disposed to think that our dignity was concerned in rejecting the present overtures for mediation. No man was further than Mr. Fox from wishing this country to humble itself before Russia, and no man would advise the rejection of her interference sooner than himself, if he could entertain the slightest suspicion of her partiality to France; but so far was he from believing in any such partiality, that he was persuaded her sentiments ran in an opposite direction. Others might suspect the offer to have been made in collusion with France; if it were so, no doubt it ought to be instantly rejected; and here Mr. Fox desired to be distinctly understood, as not recommending by his motion any suspension of hostilities, whatever might be his opinion as to the rashness with which they had been begun.

Upon the whole, he felt very sanguine, and possibly this eagerness might warp his judgment, as to the beneficial effects, in a general view, which must result from the measure he was about to propose to the House. He believed that ministers would gladly have accepted this mediation, had it been proposed at an earlier period. Why, then, should not that proposal be eligible to terminate a war, which would have had a welcome reception before its commencement? Russia was the chief power on which we relied for the security of Malta against France. Her guarantee of it was to have consolidated the peace. An opportunity now was presented to us, by which we might extend that guarantee to the peace and security of Europe; to the protection and happiness of the smaller states; to the setting up, under wise management, of a bulwark and a safeguard for the world; and to the effecting a settlement, such as the events of the late war gave but little reason ever again to hope for. He did not despair of combining together, in some great public act, all the powers without exception who were named in the guarantee of the independence of Malta. The rights of all nations, and the territories of all states, would by these means be secured against disturbance or invasion; the spirit of aggrandizement would be repressed; the mischievous practice of secret cession would be put an end to, and the world might at length enjoy some prospect of peace, by seeing the different great powers of which it was composed, act upon a principle of content with what they had gained, and of acquiescence in what they had lost. At the moment at which we seemed on the brink of eternal war, ministers had it in their power to lay the foundation of this great work; and in order to enable them to do it, he would move, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that his majesty would be graciously pleased to avail himself of the disposition expressed by the Emperor of Russia to interpose his good offices for the termination of the present war between his majesty and the French republic; an interposition which would, probably, be attended with the best advantages in support of the dignity of his majesty's crown, and for the general and permanent tranquillity of Europe."

Lord Hawkesbury objected to the motion upon two grounds: first, that there was no fair parliamentary ground laid for its adoption; and secondly, that, as no such ground was laid, the House should not, under the present circumstances, accede to a motion which could not be productive of any good, and might do harm, by betraying indecision. For the constitutional right of the House to interpose its advice upon the exercise of any branch of the royal prerogative, and particularly as to peace or war, he felt as much respect and regard as the hon. gentleman; but before such interference was attempted, a good case ought to be made out. As the constitution vested certain powers in the executive government, the inference naturally was, that those powers were not to be restrained or dictated to by any other branch of the legislature, but where they appeared to be abused. There were only two cases in which it was the province of any hon. member to recommend a measure to the executive government: the one where his majesty's ministers neglected to do that to which it was their duty to have attended; and the other, where the measure recommended was wholly different from the system which those ministers pursued. Now, upon neither of those grounds did he think the proposition of the hon. gentleman could be supported; for however some gentlemen might be disposed to censure ministers, he believed there were scarcely any who would charge them with neglecting any means that could be resorted to to preserve peace with honour; and in proof of that disposition, he had only to refer to his majesty's declaration. Here all Europe might see that his majesty was even now ready to enter into any arrangement consistent with the dignity of his crown, and the essential interests of his people. He would ask, what could be the motive of such an appeal, but to show the sincerity of his majesty's wishes for the restoration of peace? And after such an appeal, he would ask also, was it possible that any minister would advise his majesty to refuse any mediation that was likely to produce acceptable terms of peace? With respect to the hon. gentleman's observations on the general state of Europe, he was not at all disposed to differ with him; but as to the practicability of the coalition he had described, he could not by any means agree with him, and the experience of the last ten years forbade any hope of such a league acting long and steadily in concert for such an object. Though such a concert, he would readily admit, was in the highest degree desirable — a concert not to be fettered or damped by little confined views, or by separate interests, but proceeding on fair, broad, and liberal grounds — yet he was not sanguine in his hope of witnessing it. He was aware that Russia was the power which it was most for the interest of this country to conciliate, with a view to avert the evils and to produce the good to which the hon. gentleman had alluded; and one of the reasons he had for acceding to the last peace was, that during peace there might be an opportunity of procuring some continental alliance, of which there could be no hope during war, and which would serve to fix a barrier to the career of aggrandizement to which the French government was manifestly disposed; but notwithstanding this wish, he never omitted any endeavour that could tend to preserve the peace inviolate; his endeavours with regard to an alliance were merely for a concert of a defensive nature, such as the hon. gentleman had referred to. However little might be the disposition of some parties to do justice to ministers, he hoped this at least, they would acknowledge that nothing was omitted to preserve that peace; and he saw no change in the state of things that could induce him at all to calculate upon the probability of its restoration from the adoption of the motion.—The hon. gentleman had stated the advantages to be derived from the mediation of Russia, not only with reference to the particular case of the points in dispute, but with a view to the establishment of a general guarantee for the protection of all the weaker states of Europe. With this opinion he most distinctly coincided. Of the importance of the mediation of Russia, no man, possessing enlarged views of national policy, could for a moment entertain a doubt. An allusion had been made to the system of naval neutrality which had been set up by the Northern powers. He had much satisfaction in stating to the House, that with the great majority of reflecting individuals in Russia, and particularly with the individuals composing the government, a more wise system of policy was now pursued. Views of an enlarged and comprehensive nature were indulged. It was allowed that the interests of this country and of Russia were in every point of view compatible: a decided opinion was formed, that no useful purpose could be promoted by pressing the neutral question. The fact was, indeed, that this question was brought forward under the reign of the late empress, in whose character the pride and the vanity of being at the head of a coalition, operated more powerfully than any considerations of real and permanent utility to her empire. It could not be forgotten that Russia possessed no mercantile marine, and that if the present relations of the Turkish empire continued, a mercantile marine never could, to any great extent, be formed. The only consequence of the establishment of the neutrality to be contended for, would therefore be to introduce into the Baltic, powers whose influence it was the obvious interest of Russia to counteract. He could not too strongly press on the House his conviction of the extreme importance of the co-operation of Russia in any plan to counteract the progress of French ambition; and any measure calculated to promote this object would meet with the warmest concurrence from ministers. His objection to the motion was, simply, that it had been supported on no parliamentary ground. It had not been proved that ministers had shown any indisposition to accept of this mediation; and till this was proved, he must contend that the motion was unnecessary and inexpedient. In the conclusion of his majesty's declaration, on the contrary, a disposition to accept of any arrangement by which an amicable adjustment could be obtained, was clearly laid down; and after such a declaration, he could not see what beneficial consequence could arise from pressing the motion. On the other hand, it might have a very unfavourable effect on the state of the public mind; it might unhinge the exertions of the country, and lead to expectations which could not be realized. He would not say that the hope of mediation was altogether romantic, but he would contend that hopes ought not to be held out to the country which might be disappointed. To the principles of the hon. gentleman's speech he had no possible objection—they were principles in which all were agreed. As it now stood, however, the motion could be productive of no good, and might be attended with considerable evil. He should therefore, as the most convenient way of disposing of it, move the previous question.

Mr. Pitt said:—Sir; in the present important crisis of affairs, I am sure there must be a common wish and a general feeling that it is not desirable to press into view any differences, or to press the House to any division upon topics of minor importance. Whatever I may think of the hon. gentleman's proposal as a motion of advice in the actual circumstances, with all of the general principles of the speech on which it was grounded, I most heartily concur. I heard, indeed, the speech of the hon. gentleman with infinite satisfaction; and that satisfaction was heightened by observing, that my noble friend received the sentiments with that approbation which left no doubt on my mind, that, if any effect can be given to those principles, no favourable opportunity will be lost. It would be strange, however, if I had not heard with approbation the principles laid down by the hon. gentleman. They are the principles which, in the best times of this country, induced and enabled this House to contribute to the general liberty and independence of Europe; to support the rights and redress the wrongs of minor powers, and to oppose a successful resistance to the encroachments of ambition. They are the principles which (more than any passionate and national opposition to France, proved, as France has been by so many facts, to be the rival and almost the national enemy of this country) led us not to consider the name of any particular state, or the prejudices of local situation, or the dictates of separate interest, but prompted us to set ourselves in opposition to any power, both as, in the first instance, it threatened the repose and the rights of other states; and, in the second, as it affected the independence and security of Great Britain. I rejoice to be able, on this occasion, to agree with the hon. gentleman in his general principles, though I cannot but remember there have been times when the hon. gentleman differed from me, on the application of those principles, with a vehemence that looked very like an entire condemnation of them. If, however, he does admit the principles, I rejoice, for the sake of the country, that he has stated them in a manner so clear, so just, and so satisfactory. They are the principles on which the greatness, the glory, and the prosperity of this nation have been reared; and never were they struggled for more gloriously than they were during the last war: and it was only when I saw myself compelled, by adverse circumstances, to despair of the effect of their application, that I looked to any separate arrangements for this country. They are the principles upon which I found myself justified in proposing to this House large subsidies to continental powers; they are the principles on which I have thought that it was justifiable to sacrifice our private and separate interests to procure greater advantages for our allies, and to promote and consolidate the security of the general system of Europe; they are the principles that supported me when I found myself obliged to differ from several friends, for whose talents and opinions I entertain the highest respect, about the manner in which the war was terminated. It was those principles which, after there was no longer any hope of improving the situation of the continent, and promoting the security of the general system of Europe, by any separate efforts of our own, led me to think, that in making terms for ourselves, we were more at liberty to yield considerable sacrifices, with a view to put an end to the evils of war, than we should have been had we sought peace by the desertion of our allies, and an abandonment of the cause of Europe.—But, far be it from me to enter upon those topics in order to call forth difference of opinion. I allude to them to show that the principles I now applaud are not new to me. My approbation of them is recorded in my past conduct. I am glad the hon. gentleman has proclaimed them with so much precision and force: I hope they will have the benefit of his great authority, and the recommendation of his great talents (and greater authority they cannot have), to remove objections which have sheltered themselves, perhaps more than there was ground for, under his name, against all common cause with the rest of Europe, and against sacrificing, in any circumstances, the least portion of British interests, for the balance and preservation of the continent. But, while I approve the principle of keeping a watchful eye upon the state of the continent, I do not mean that, upon every movement, we ought to interfere with continental affairs. All I say is, that no great convulsion, which shall unhinge the established interests, and dissolve former relations, can take place without involving consequences highly important to Great Britain. We are not bound, however, to take upon ourselves to interfere, even when interference would be desirable, unless we are joined by those whose co-operation would be necessary to give effect to that interference. But, whether for a season of war or of peace—whether in the view of giving energy to our arms, or security to our repose—whether with a view of preventing war by negotiation, or restoring peace after war has broken out, it is the duty of the ministers of this country to avail themselves of the good offices of powers with whom it must be the interest of this country to be united in alliance.—The hon. gentleman very properly avoided detailing any mode in which the principles he laid down might be applied to the mediation of Russia. Indeed, it is impossible to point out the mode of application, without knowing exactly the circumstances in which it would be exerted. I shall therefore, upon the whole, follow the hon. gentleman's example. It will appear whimsical, however, if I now seem to narrow the principle of continental policy, which the hon. gentleman has sanctioned. This, nevertheless, I venture to state—that if there can arise out of the mediation of Russia, any chance of producing a general system on which peace could be restored, and confirmed by respectable guarantees—a peace by which not only the objects in dispute between Great Britain and France, but other points relative to the state of Europe, could be adjusted—it would be a consummation so important, that, to obtain it, some arrangement, even less advantageous to this country, in a separate view, would be admissible. What that arrangement should be, either as to the general system or our particular interest, it is impossible beforehand to determine: it will depend upon all the circumstances of the case. On the other hand, if that system were not attainable, our interest would prescribe other views and other precautions. Though unwilling to separate ourselves from the continent; though willing to make some deduction from the sum of our own demands, and from the means of separate security to augment the strength of the general system, it might happen that we should be left, without any fault of our own, to maintain a separate struggle. If we know that France entertains views of hostility towards us—if we know that we have in our hands strong and impregnable means of resistance—powerful and effectual means to defeat that hostility with which we have been particularly threatened—then would it be especially incumbent on us to provide, that any substitute for our security, which a general arrangement would afford, should be solid and efficient. If our security is to depend upon our own single efforts, and to be maintained by our own separate arrangements, we have in our power the means; nor shall we put to hazard by a feeble policy what British valour has gained. To consolidate our security by the general security of Europe, is undoubtedly desirable; as well as to provide for it by particular and separate arrangements. To unite both in their respective degrees, must be that which is most desirable; but how far each will be carried must be regulated by circumstances.—So much I thought it necessary to hint, that we may not be turned into the opposite extremes of, on the one hand, neglecting the state of the continent altogether, as conducive to our security; and, on the other, that we may not look to any continental arrangements with such confidence as to slacken our efforts, and to abandon our separate means of vindicating our rights, and preserving by war that security to which we are entitled; unless, like most of the states of the continent, we are ready to sink into subjection to the power of the aggressions and outrages of which we complain.—So much upon the general principles laid down by the hon. gentleman the justice of which I so strongly feel. Nevertheless, unless some practicable benefit is to be derived from pressing the motion, I hope the hon. gentleman will be inclined to withdraw it. To press it to a division at the present moment, would be attended with one of two inconveniences: either the previous question would be carried, by which there might be room for the misconstruction that one part of the House was hostile to the principles on which the hon. gentleman argued; or, on the other hand, if the motion were carried, it would imply a doubt that the House entertained a suspicion that ministers did not concur in the principles so well laid down in the hon. gentleman's speech, and were unwilling to give them effect; a suspicion for which, after what has been said by my noble friend, there appears no foundation.

Mr. Fox said, that his opposition to the late war, as far as the question of continental alliances was concerned, rested precisely on the same principles as those upon which he had that day grounded his motion. It was singular, that after the many occasions he had had to debate this subject, he should still be misunderstood. He had opposed the late war, among other reasons, from an opinion which he had formed, and stated at its very commencement, of its tendency to effect the total destruction of the influence of this country on the continent. Subsequent events had proved the correctness of that opinion. The right hon. gentleman himself had acknowledged that he had consented to make peace, as soon as he perceived that the prolongation of the war was not likely to procure any better security for the continent. Mr. Fox was against referring to any topics which might revive past animosities; but he begged to know in what consisted the difference between the right hon. gentleman and himself, except that he had foreseen some years earlier, what the right hon. gentleman had been obliged to admit some years later? It was on a similar principle that he had approved the peace—he had approved it, not as good in itself, but as preferable, under all the circumstances, to a continuance of the war. In answer to the application which had been addressed to him to withdraw his motion, Mr. Fox expressed his regret, that, as matters then stood, he could not comply with it. Further explanation was necessary from the noble secretary of state. Whether Russia had offered her mediation in the large, or in the limited sense of the word, it was important to have an assurance from ministers that they would accept it. No such assurance had been given, and with less he could not be content. If ministers, however, would state fairly that there existed among them, at that moment, a disposition to avail themselves of the offers of Russia, whatever those offers might be, or of a mediation when regularly proposed to them, he would make no difficulty of withdrawing his motion.

Lord Hawkesbury assured the House, that the British government was ready to accept the mediation of Russia; upon which, Mr. Fox consented to withdraw his motion.

Debate on Mr. Patten's Motion relative to the Conduct of Ministers.] June 3. Mr. Patten rose to make his long promised motion, and said:—Sir; a short time before the recess, I gave notice of a motion, the object of which was, an inquiry into the state of the nation. At that time I was convinced, from the conduct of ministers, in withholding all communication since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, to the period when his majesty's gracious message was delivered, that they had given strong grounds for an inquiry. I thought that parliament was entitled to every kind of communication which could be afforded, consistent with circumstances. It may be asked, why I undertook a task, to the execution of which I am incompetent? It was upon this ground, that gentlemen of great talents and rank have been accused of aiming, by their difference of sentiment from ministers, at places and emoluments; and in order to prevent an accusation of so unworthy a nature from being countenanced, I proposed the inquiry. I have nothing to hope or to fear from the event of my motion; I belong to no party, and cannot be accused of having for my object the gratification of personal or selfish feelings.

Upon the subject of the attacks that have been made against the conduct of the first lord of the Admiralty, I have very little to offer. It has, indeed, been said, that fifty ships of the line would be ready for actual service in the course of a very short time. It has been the cause of considerable alarm to the country to hear that formidable naval armaments were carrying on in the ports of France; yet I have heard, that when lord Whitworth received his majesty's message to parliament, communicating that intelligence, he did not know of any such armaments. That this was the fact, is confirmed by the statement of the first consul, and by the positive assurances of M. Talleyrand. An officer of eminence in France also declared that the naval force preparing in the ports of the republic, was not sufficient for the exigencies of the colonial service.—I now come to the documents upon your table. Every man must be satisfied that the first consul ultimately aimed a fatal blow at our power and independence: but although this is a position which cannot be controverted, it does not go to extenuate the measures pursued by his majesty's ministers; who have been kept in a continual state of aggression, insult, and degradation, by the first consul. I contend, that the first aggression ought not to have been suffered; and that such an opportunity to contest the pretensions of France, and to enforce our own just claims, ought not to have been passed by. Whereas, they have suffered patiently a long series of aggression, injuries, and degradations. It is to so unaccountable a line of conduct, that I this day object. Have they, or have they not, complained of the unjust views, the unbounded ambition, the extravagant spirit of aggrandizement and encroachment manifested by the government of France? We know from their own ambition, that they have not done so when they ought to have been most active in their remonstrances and complaints. But at the same time I readily grant, that all these injuries and causes of complaint, when taken in the aggregate, form an irresistible ground for the vigorous prosecution of hostilities. We have indeed something like a new proof of the hostile views of the French government, in the appointment of commercial commissioners; but in that case I most decidedly contend, that no remonstrance on our part was necessary. A remonstrance was, on the contrary, a proof of our weakness and fears. Ministers ought to have sent them away at once, and followed it up by a demand of satisfaction. In adverting to the melancholy situation of Switzerland and Holland, I cannot be ignorant that they have contended for their independence and liberties, and cannot but lament that their struggle has proved ineffectual. They have even less to hope for than the most servile province dependent upon France. France can never forgive the boldness, and the desire to rescue themselves from the yoke, manifested by Switzerland and Holland. In the feelings and wrongs of these countries we are deeply implicated, because we have the same tyranny to oppose which enslaved them. At the time when orders were issued for the surrender of the Cape of Good Hope, were not ministers as fully acquainted with every act of aggression as they are now, with the single exception of Sebastiani's mission to Egypt? There are many other strong grounds, on the justice of which I could rest my charges against ministers; but I shall content myself with accusing them of withholding all communication from parliament; of suspending the functions of this House; of having issued such orders as they were not warranted to do from their own knowledge and conviction; of compromising the honour and dignity of his majesty's crown; and of essentially injuring the interests of his people. I beg, Sir, I may be clearly understood when I state, that at this moment gentlemen are called upon to direct their attention solely to external objects; that this is not a time for them to enter into disputes and contests with respect to internal regulations; and that questions of a more important nature, involving as they do the very existence of the country, demand their consideration and decision. We are now in a crisis which calls for all the talent, all the mental ability the country can afford; and as we require of the people every aid which their resources can supply, we should, in our turn contribute to their security, by the exertion and combination of those mental powers which are best calculated to promote their dearest interests. I shall now read the resolutions which I intend to submit to the consideration of the House:—1. "That it appears to this House, from the declaration issued by his majesty on the 18th day of May last, and laid before this House by his majesty's command, that the conduct of the French republic, during the whole period which has elapsed since the conclusion of the definitive treaty of peace, is considered by his majesty's ministers as having been altogether inconsistent with every principle of good faith, moderation, and justice; as having exhibited one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult; and as necessarily creating a thorough conviction of a system deliberately adopted by France for the purpose of degrading, villifying, and insulting his majesty and his government.—2. That his majesty's ministers having, throughout the whole period, from the conclusion of the definitive treaty of peace, to the issuing of his majesty's declaration of the 18th day of May last, neither communicated to parliament any knowledge of the sense which they now appear to have entertained respecting the conduct and system of France, nor any regular information of the particulars on which the same was founded, or of the steps taken by his majesty's government thereupon, have thereby withheld from this House the necessary materials for a due and full discharge of its constitutional functions; and that, by encouraging throughout the country an unfounded security and confidence in the permanence of peace, they have embarrassed and perplexed our commerce, have deceived the expectations, and unnecessarily harassed the spirit of the people, and have materially increased and aggravated the difficulties of our actual situation.—3. That it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to make timely and adequate representations against such acts, as have, in their judgment, constituted a series of aggression, violence, and insult, on the part of France: that, by dignified and temperate remonstrances, followed up with consistency, and sustained with firmness, either the course and progress of such acts would have been arrested, without the necessity of recurring to arms, or the determination of the French government to persist therein would have been distinctly ascertained, before his majesty had, by the reduction of his forces, and the surrender of his conquests put out of his hands the most effectual means of obtaining redress and reparation: that this essential duty appears to have been, in a very great degree, neglected by his majesty's ministers; and that such their neglect and omission have been highly injurious to the public interest.—4. That it appears to this House, that on the 17th of October last, counter orders were dispatched by his majesty's government, revoking the orders before given for the surrender of the Cape of Good Hope, and of the other conquests then held by his majesty; and that the final order, by virtue of which his majesty's forces actually evacuated the Cape, was sent on the 16th of November. That on the said 16th of November, the hostile spirit of France had (in the judgment of his majesty's ministers, as now avowed by them) already been manifested, for more than six months, by one continued series of aggression, violence and insult, for which neither reparation nor redress had, down to that moment, been obtained: that the offensive principle had already been distinctly advanced, of excluding his majesty from all concern in the affairs of the continent; that the Spanish and other priories had already been withdrawn from the order of Malta; Piedmont, Parma, Placentia, and Elba, had been annexed to France; Switzerland had been attacked and subjugated, and the remonstrance of his majesty's government upon that subject had been treated with indignity and contempt; the territory of the Batavian republic was at that very moment still occupied by the armies of the chief consul of France, and its internal administration still controlled by his interference; and the French government was then actually engaged in the pursuit of those plans and measures for the subversion of the Turkish empire, to which his majesty's declaration refers, as a violation of the treaty of peace: that in directing, under such circumstances, the final surrender of the Cape, without having previously explained or arranged the numerous points of difference and complaint which then actually subsisted between the two governments, his majesty's ministers acted in contradiction to the sense which they had themselves manifested of their own duty, and have improvidently exposed to danger some of the most important interests of his majesty's dominions. 5. That by all these instances of misconduct in the present ministers of his majesty's government, they have proved themselves unworthy of the confidence reposed in them, in such an important crisis as the present."

The first resolution being put,

Colonel Bastard thought that if the state of the nation was fairly laid before parliament, it would be the best justification of the conduct of ministers. The situation of the country was one of great anxiety; but was it to be attributed to the late or present administration? The present administration had come into power at a most critical period, and had acted under difficulties unparalleled. They found the whole chain of connexion with which this country had acted, broken, and the country discontented in a very high degree; the circumstances in which they were placed compelled the treaty of Amiens, and made it prudent not to push every point of aggression. When he heard two opposite parties, the one accusing ministers of being too rash, and the other of being too timid, he concluded that ministers had acted just as they ought to have done. It required more fortitude to bear an insult than to resent one. A man worn out ought not to attempt to combat with another in full health and vigour; and we required time to renew our strength.

Mr. I. H. Browne did not think it right at this critical moment, when all agreed in the propriety of supporting the country against the dangers which threatened it, to interrupt the unanimity of the House by any vote of censure on his majesty's government. With respect to the discussions with France, he thought they were better terminated by the cabinet, than by making partial communications to parliament. The true spirit of the treaty of Amiens had been violated before ministers had made the communication to the House. If they were to blame, they had erred on the right side; for he conceived it better that an alarm should be given soon, than for the nation to be lulled in perfect security in the moment of danger.

Lord Kensington could not agree that the conduct of his majesty's late ministers had placed the country in its present state. Their administration had been high and honourable, and at the very conclusion was glorious to the British name. The conduct of the present ministers had been deceitful, and unwise, and submissive. The treaty of Amiens was discussed on the 14th of May; after that, the sequestration of the property belonging to the Spanish langué, the annexation of the island of Elba, &c. took place; but all prior to the 23rd of November, the day on which the chancellor of the exchequer assured that House, there was no probability of the treaty being broken. The views of France were obvious to the whole world, and every one was acquainted with the insults she had heaped upon us, and yet ministers took no measures to counteract her designs.

Earl Temple said:—With regard to the first resolution, little remains to be said. His majesty's declaration speaks for itself, and is to be considered as the language of his ministers. They observe, "that the system of aggression, violence, and aggrandizement, which characterize the different governments of France, during the war, has been continued, with as little disguise, since its termination." At length, then, we have a bold avowal of the opinion of ministers respecting the conduct of the French government, during the peace. How they can justify this tardy avowal remains to be explained. A reference to their parliamentary conduct ever since the treaty of Amiens, will show, that instead of putting us upon our guard against dangers they knew existed, they have universally tried to lull the country into a security, which they now tell us was not warranted by the fact, and inspire us with hopes, which they now declare, they knew to be fallacious. November 23rd, 1802 the chancellor of the exchequer declared, "that there was nothing that indicated the renewal of hostilities with France." Look to the events of that period, as collected in the papers upon your table, and then say whether ministers were justified in what they asserted. At that very moment, there is scarce a circumstance which is now declared to be a cause of war, which did not exist in its full force. With the exception of one only, every instance of aggression, complained of as being committed by France against the commerce of this country, had occurred long before the 23rd November. The declaration very justly states, that the treaty of Amiens, was founded on the assumption of the state of possession, and engagements actually subsisting at the moment of the signature of the treaty. The practice of ministers forms a singular contrast with their theory. On that very principle, they knew that the articles respecting Malta could not be executed. The revenues of that order, the independence of which, it was the professed object of the treaty to secure; and on the existence of which revenues, that independence existed; were known to be confiscated, before the conclusion of the peace, or immediately after. In the Madrid Gazette, of the 27th April, 1802, it is stated, that the king of Spain had annexed to the royal domain the langues and possessions of the order of Malta, within his dominions; and yet, with this fact known, we see ministers, from the May following, down to the breaking off the negotiation, pestering every power on the continent with applications to guarantee the execution of an article, which they knew could not be executed. As to Switzerland, the ambitious projects of France were well known before November; nay, at the very time ministers were assuring the country, that they saw no prospect whatever of a renewal of hostilities, Mr. Moore was engaged at Constance in negotiations, which, if the situation of Europe had allowed of their being carried to the extent his instructions authorized, must have ended in a renewal of hostilities, prior to the time to which I have so often alluded; and every complaint which we now urge as a cause of war against France, for its insolent and hostile interference in the administration of our laws, and its audacious attack on the liberty of our press, existed in its full force. On the 7th of August M. Otto writes that insulting letter to lord Hawkesbury, in which, in the name of the first consul, he insists upon a stop being put to publications hostile to France; the removal of the emigrant noblesse and clergy out of the country; and the deportation of other emigrants to Canada. All this, and much more on the same subject, happened long before the 23rd of November. In August it was, that captain D'Auvergne was seized contrary to every principle of justice, and in violation of the treaty of Amiens. Long before November, it was well known, that France did not mean to indemnify the stadtholder, according to the spirit of the treaty of Amiens. In short, almost every insult of which we so justly complain had occurred before the 23rd of November: and yet, on that day, the minister comes down to this House, and states, "that he sees no prospect of a renewal of hostilities!" We are now confirmed in our researches, to this period; for the same declaration, more strongly marked, was made on the 23rd of February following, in the reason assigned for increasing the establishment of his royal highness the Prince of Wales, which was, that it was a moment of "profound peace." Dates and facts are the witnesses I call to the veracity of the king's ministers. On the 9th of February lord Hawkesbury directs lord Whitworth to remonstrate against the publication of Sebastiani's report. On the 17th that remonstrance is made. On the 21st of February lord Whitworth had the famous audience of Buonaparté, which ministers declare was a decisive proof of the hostile views of the first consul; the measure of the insult was full; aggressions had followed aggressions; the views of France upon Egypt, upon the Turkish empire, upon Switzerland, upon Holland, and upon this country, were known and avowed. Every feeling which animates us as Englishmen, had been insulted; we were told by our insolent enemy, "Your press must be made subservient to my views, you must transport the nobles and the priesthood who have sought refuge in your hospitality; you must import commercial agents; you must stand aloof whilst I seize, with a giant's grasp, the whole of Europe; you must give up all connexion with the continent; the treaty of Amiens provides for every thing, and settles every thing." On the 23rd of February we had been told all this; on the 23rd of February the minister comes here and tells us that we are in "profound peace;" and on the 8th of March, the same minister comes and tells us to prepare for war!—We are prepared for war. I trust there is not a man whose breast does not glow with indignation, at the insults we have suffered, and with a determination to support the honour, and avenge the injured cause of his country. Ministers lulled the country into an unreal belief of security; they cherished her by false hopes; they asked unlimited confidence, and have reposed none in return; they deluded the people with glittering visions of peace, knowing that when they awoke, they would awake to the reality of a war.—The next point is, have ministers done all that it became them to do, to avert the calamity which has come upon us? Now, whether they have submitted enough, God knows the country has seen enough of submission! It is not therefore whether they have sufficiently given way to the views of France. The question is, whether they remonstrated in such a manner as became the ministers of a great and powerful nation; whether they interfered in such a manner as to make their interference effective; whether they mediated in such a manner as to aid those in whose favour they mediated; whether they repelled aggressions with firmness, and opposed dignified moderation to violent and presuming demands? I do not hesitate to say, that in all these points they have completely failed: when they have conceded most, they have conceded with least dignity; when they resisted most, they resisted with least effect. They have urged in their declaration, as one of these causes, which in the aggregate, made the great cause of the war, that France has enforced ever since the peace, with inexcusable severity, the prohibitions which had been placed upon the subjects of his majesty; that violence has been offered to their vessels and their property. How stands the fact? In the first collection of papers not one word is mentioned of what constitutes this part of their declaration; in one solitary instance only, is the subject alluded to.—In the 2nd collection of papers, we see notification after notification from Mr. Merry, of insult upon insult offered to our flags and commerce, but in no one instance does any remonstrance appear from his majesty's government; no instruction to Mr. Merry to remonstrate; and in the case of the ship George, no answer of any kind appears to have been given to Mr. Merry. The second cause of war is, the introduction by France, into this country, of her privileged spies, the commercial agents. To this insulting act of aggression, no remonstrance is made by ministers, and, except in the one case, no steps appear to have been taken for sending them out of the country. Once, indeed, lord Hawkesbury informed the French minister, that the agents would not be acknowledged as such, and that if any attempts were made to send them to their place of destination, they would receive orders to quit the country. In London, however, the whole corps d'espionage were permitted to remain unmolested.—The next cause of war is, the occupation of Holland by the French troops. To this breach of the letter of three solemn treaties, not only no remonstrance appears to have been made, but we have the assurance of the noble secretary of state, that no written remonstrance was made by the ministers; and though, in consequence of Mr. Liston's dispatch of the 13th of October, orders were sent out on the 17th to retain the Cape and the West India islands, on the receipt of his dispatch of the 29th, stating the seizure by the French troops of the frontier towns of Holland, orders are sent out on the 16th of November to evacuate the Cape and the West India islands, which we had before ordered to be retained, notwithstanding the cause of that order remained the same.—The fourth cause of war is the seizure of Switzerland by France. I will not inquire, whether it was fitting that this country should have interfered in its fate. We have interfered; but was that interference made in the manner most likely to answer the purpose for which it was intended? As early as the 13th of July 1802, the deputies of almost all the Swiss cantons remonstrated publicly against the constitution forced upon them by Buonaparté. From that time it was evident, that the Swiss only waited for the moment most propitious to make another struggle for their liberties. France saw the blow that was impending, and during the whole summer made preparations for maintaining the seizure of Switzerland. At length, on the 21st of September, the flame burst forth; all Switzerland appeared in arms against her task-masters. During this interval, did this country stir one step to aid the rising spirit of the Swiss, or assist their daring efforts? Of our interference, we hear nothing till the 3rd of October. On that day, Mr. Merry writes word, that the Swiss had an agent in Paris, who was directed to apply to the foreign ministers there, to interfere with the first consul in their favour. After having in vain tried to interest the feelings of all Europe in his behalf; on England he places his last, his firm reliance; to England his country looks for protection and assistance. Mr. Merry writes for instructions; he receives none; no answer is ever given to the Swiss agent, and he is left to cool his heels in the anti-chamber of Mr. Merry. In this instance, however, an English minister ventures to make a written remonstrance, and no answer is given to it. On the 10th of October the remonstrance is sent to M. Otto; but it appears that no answer was made to it. Rumour indeed, says, that one was made, but in such offensive terms, so broadly declaring that we had no right to interfere in the affairs of the continent, and referring us with such insolent pedantry to the treaty of Amiens, as to the book in which alone we were to read our destinies; that it would have justified immediate war, instead of being followed by the pusillanimous surrender of the Cape and our West India conquests.—The next cause of war is the non-execution on the part of France, of that part of the treaty of Amiens, respecting Malta; and upon this point the negotiation appears to have been conducted with the same firmness and dignity which so strongly characterised its whole course. In May, the Spanish revenues of the order were confiscated. In October, by the annexation of Parma more were confiscated; still the literal execution of the 10th article is insisted upon by England. During the whole time no new arrangement is heard of. The 10th article is constantly rung in our ears, the whole 10th article, nothing but the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens, till at last the farce can be carried on no longer, and the necessity of a new arrangement begins to be talked of. How is that negotiation supported by our ministers? On the 21st of July, Buonaparté tells lord Whitworth, that on Malta depends the question of peace or war, that on no terms shall England be permitted to retain Malta; that he had rather she should have the Fauxbourg St. Antoine than Malta. On the 11th of March, Talleyrand tells lord Whitworth that the first consul will look upon the non-evacuation of Malta, as the commencement of hostilities; not as a cause of war, but as an act of war. Here all discussion about Malta should have ended. Lord Whitworth had said, the occupation of Malta by England, in some shape or other, was necessary; and Talleyrand had said such occupation would be deemed the commencement of hostilities. Ultimatum is sent after ultimatum; and at last you give up the idea of retaining Malta for ever, on the dignified and honourable condition, that France agreed to your reserving it for ten years only, and secured your possession in full sovereignty of the island of Lampedosa. Your last ultimatum proposed, that in consideration of the immense accessions of strength obtained by France upon the continent, she should give up Malta for ten years, and steal Lampedosa for you for ever! You therefore gravely state, that at the end of ten years, the vast accession of force to France, confirmed by ten years possession; the immense increase of her resources, ripened to ten years maturity; her possession of Italy, her influence in Germany, in Spain, and in Portugal, and her command of Holland, will be counterbalanced by the enormous acquisition of a barren rock, of an island without an inhabitant, of that nursery of gulls, Lampedosa!—The next cause of war is the attack upon the liberty of the press, and the requisition to transport the emigrants to Canada or elsewhere. I call upon ministers to point out to me, in any part of the correspondence, one remonstrance against the insolent attack upon the liberty of the press. Lord Hawkesbury writes very prettily on the subject, and lord Whitworth assures M. Talleyrand that it is impossible for lord Hawkesbury to control the licence of the press here, because he could not influence a single newspaper for his own objects. He trusts, therefore, that the first consul will not be so unreasonable as to insist upon his controlling the language of the newswriters and pamphleteers in this country. But have we one word of remonstrance against the insolent language, or the insulting tone of the French government? No; in proportion as France increased in insolence, we multiplied concession. When we look to the subject relating to the French emigrants, disgraceful indeed is the tale we have to tell. The first attack made by the French government is a remonstrance from Talleyrand to Mr. Merry, against the conduct of the French princes, in publicly wearing the insignia of their orders, which Talleyrand describes as insulting to his government. The tame and disgraceful answer which ministers make to this childish and impertinent complaint is, that “it would be more proper if they (the French princes and nobles) abstained from it. But how could ministers prevent it?” Was that the language for his majesty’s ministers to hold in reply to such a remonstrance? I ask them, if ever the chastising hand of Providence were to plunge this country into the same misfortunes which have overwhelmed France, if ever our nobles were sent to seek refuge in a foreign land, how they would brook the idea of our nobility surrendering the badges of their rank, and the insignia of their honours, because they no longer dared to wear them? Yet this is the conduct which ministers think it would have been more proper if the French nobles had followed.—The next demand the French government makes, is, that the French superior clergy and noblesse who were emigrants in England, should be removed from the kingdom, to Canada! These august, these venerable characters, who, true to their religion, and faithful to their sovereign, gave up even the means of subsistence, and left their friends, relatives, and dearest connexions, rather than remain in the land where that sovereign had been murdered, and that religion prophaned; who, encouraged by the general voice of England, sought that refuge here, which almost every other country refused them. We are called upon by the authors of their miseries, who are at this moment, revelling in their spoils, and exulting in their misfortunes, to remove them from the refuge we gave them, and thus to violate that hospitality, on the faith of which they came. Those gallant men, who so sacrificing every consideration of personal risk, made an unavailing, but glorious attempt, to restore the throne of their kings, and to establish the altars of their faith, whose exertions we animated, and whose arms we assisted; who engaged in this memorable struggle on the faith of British promises, and in the confidence of British assistance; we are called upon by the very men against whom they fought, and against whom we once made common cause with them, to ‘deporter’ to Canada. Let gentlemen recollect the meaning attached to that word by the present rulers of France, let them recollect the horrors of the former deportation to Cayenne, as described by the miserable survivors of it; let them recollect, that to a deportation of this kind, the French government wished to doom the loyal and persecuted emigrants of France, and then let them turn to the answer which his majesty’s ministers chose to give to this cruel, this infernal proposal: ‘His majesty is very desirous to obviate any cause of complaint or uneasiness with respect to their persons, and measures are in contemplation, and will be taken, for the purpose of removing them out of his majesty’s European dominions.’ I shut the book in disgust, in horror, and in shame. In disgust and in horror at the barbarity which could dictate this sentence, and in shame and in confusion at the eternal stain which it will fix upon this page of our history.—I have thus gone through the different points which appear to me to bear upon the subject before you, and to justify the resolutions which are submitted to the House. From these extracts, which I have made from the papers on your table, from the facts which they avow, and from the dates which confirm these facts, three deductions are to be made. The first is, that from the moment the treaty of Amiens was signed, ministers were aware of the hostility avowed and expressed by the government of France towards this country; secondly, that being so aware of them, they concealed that conviction from the country, and encouraged the people with hopes of permanent peace and tranquillity, knowing at the moment they held out these hopes, that they were false and illusory; and thirdly, that on many points, which they now make, either distinctively or collectively, causes of war, they made no remonstrance, or such remonstrances only, as were degrading to the dignity of the nation; and that when they interfered or mediated, they interfered without firmness, they mediated without honour.

Mr. Hobhouse, in answer to the charge that ministers had not made such communications to the House as the state of public affairs required, declared that, in his judgment they ought not to have laid the case before parliament at an earlier moment. Having concluded a peace, they were anxious to preserve it; and though they might see many instances of conduct in the French government which they deplored, yet these did not appear to their minds a sufficient ground of war; but when they found such an act as to authorize hostilities, then they came forward to the public. Had they come down to parliament, day after day, and communicated every circumstance of dispute and discussion, the consequence would have been to excite irritation between the two countries, and to propel those very hostilities which it was the object of negotiation to avert. The second charge against ministers, was no better founded than the first. Where was the proof that they had deceived parliament by illusory hopes of peace? He was present in the House on the 23rd of November, and was confident that the chancellor of the exchequer had not said on that day, that the country was likely to continue at peace. Did not the speech on the 23rd of November last avow, that "his majesty could not be indifferent to events passing on the continent, and that he should watch with jealousy the conduct of other powers." Was it probable that a minister who had abstained from the use of pacific language, in drawing up his majesty's speech, should in discussing the answer to the same speech, adopt language of a contrary tendency?

As to the third charge of pusillanimity, in quietly submitting to various indignities from the French government. No man more valued the liberty of the press than himself; but, what more could ministers do than they had done? Buonaparté insisted that no animadversions upon the proceedings of the French government should be published, or even commented upon, by the members of the two Houses of Parliament. The demand was rejected. If this were a cause for affront, it was for France to show its resentment. Was this country, which sustained no injury, which uninterruptedly pursued its own course, to re-plunge itself into the calamities of war? With respect to the application of the first consul, for the removal of the French princes from the British dominions, ministers refused to violate the laws of hospitality, by complying with the insolent proposal. What more effectual measure could be adopted? If this were to be a cause of war, it should have been taken up by France, not by this country. But the noble lord had said, that ministers had assured the French government they would take into their contemplation the removal of French persons from this country; and this he considered as the very acmé of national disgrace: but whom did they contemplate to remove?—not the French princes, but persons who, protected and treated hospitably by this country, should publish libels upon other governments, with whom we are at peace, and should engage in plots tending to destroy the harmony between this nation and France. But when ground for war did really occur in the conduct of France, when the report of Sebastiani manifested the ambitious designs of Buonaparté against Egypt, was any want of energy discoverable in ministers? Far from it. They refused to evacuate Malta until France had afforded additional means of security against her vast projects of aggrandizement. This refusal Buonaparté declared to be "a commencement of hostilities." Thus France had given the challenge, and the chancellor of the exchequer had, with proper spirit, accepted it. He had no doubt that ministers, whose justice and moderation had so eminently marked their earnestness to preserve peace, would evince their ability to conduct war with honour and advantage to the nation, and gain a fresh title to the public confidence.

Sir W. Young expressed his doubts

whether ministers had shown sufficient firmness and resolution. France had discovered a continued system of depressing the British commerce in every part of their empire. This had particularly shown itself since the treaty of Amiens. But he did not think ministers had taken sufficient energetic steps to counteract the French system. With respect to Malta, he trusted it would never be made a subject of debate in any future treaty. This country should look on France as a great military republic, and Buonaparté as a great military and aspiring genius. We should prepare for a most arduous contest, and that not merely during his life; for whoever might succeed him in military power, would make it necessary that similar strenuous exertions should be made by this country.

Mr. Fonblanque could not agree to the resolutions moved against ministers, notwithstanding he might differ with them on particular points. He thought the war was entered on for the support of British independence; and though ministers might have acted remissly on particular points, yet, on the whole, they had shown an unalterable spirit of firmness and perseverance. The resolutions were at variance with facts; and he thought the grounds advanced were not sufficient to withdraw the confidence of the House from ministers.

Mr. Williams Wynn confirmed lord Temple's statement of the chancellor of the exchequer's declaration, "that the country was in a state of profound peace." He congratulated the House that the treaty of Amiens was no longer asserted to be "a treaty as likely to last as any which had been concluded during the last hundred years;" a treaty, "the time, tone, terms, and temper of which held out the best promise of security," but that it was now described by ministers themselves, as "a peace of experiment," (an experiment upon the strength, the wealth and existence of the country), which was called for by the clamours of the people. This he positively denied. At no time, during the course of a nine years war, had the people been less clamorous for peace than at the time of the signature of the preliminaries. Not a single petition against the prosecution of the war, had been presented, not even a single meeting had been called to consider of such a petition. A gallant colonel had praised the moderation of the conduct of ministers in the late discussions, and had asserted, "that there was more true fortitude in submitting to injuries than in resenting them." Of this species of fortitude ministers certainly possessed a most eminent degree. After some of the most insulting acts of aggression which the enemy could offer, they had contented themselves with presenting memorial after memorial, which might, indeed, in the language of an honourable member, be denominated a series of "polite suggestions," to moulder unnoticed in M. Talleyrand's bureau. Of the propriety of submitting to insults in order to preserve peace, he very much doubted; first, because desirable as peace was, it would be too dearly purchased at such a price; secondly, because peace never could be preserved by such a line of conduct. A nation, or an individual, who tamely submitted to an insult, invited a repetition of it. If such was the case, with respect to our conduct towards regular governments, how much more was it when applied to an usurpation, such as we now saw in France, with such a ruler at the head of it, swollen with successful rapine, and elevated by a series of good fortune into the belief that nothing can withstand him. To such a person, more than any other, would a wise minister have thought it necessary to oppose a prompt and strong barrier, and to have adopted, upon the very first inspection of the treaty, a firm, manly, and unyielding tone of remonstrance, accompanied with a peremptory demand of satisfaction. By an opposite line of conduct, by encouraging him in the belief that we would make any sacrifices for the preservation of peace, ministers had in fact invited from a person, already but too willing, insult after insult, and aggression after aggression, until it was too late for him to draw back, and till their over anxious desire of peace had defeated its own object. He concluded with reprobating the unconstitutional system of concealment and deceit which had been adopted towards parliament since the opening of the session.

Mr. T. Grenville said, he would not pretend to deny that the object of the resolutions was to call in question the conduct of ministers throughout the whole of the discussions between the two governments, from the time that the definitive treaty of peace was concluded. To have a full and fair view of this subject it would, however, be necessary, briefly to advert to the situation of the country at the time when the treaty was concluded. By the second of the resolutions it was declared, that ministers had not made to parliament such ample communications as could lead to any estimate of the real situation of the country, and therefore the House was debarred the constitutional right of giving any opinion on the state of public affairs. A disposition had been manifested to lay a great deal of stress on particular expressions. He was not disposed to question the words which gentlemen themselves were disinclined to disavow, but he would contend that it was perfectly parliamentary to draw an inference from the general spirit and complexion of the language employed by those in official situations, which gave to that language a degree of weight and consequence which it did not otherwise possess; which was the foundation of important conclusions, and which was consequently in all cases more narrowly canvassed. He was desirous, therefore, of distinctly stating to the House the views and expectations which had been held out at the time of the signature of the definitive treaty. When the merits of the definitive treaty were discussed, the chancellor of the exchequer had said, "that the peace would, in all probability, be of as long duration as any of the pacifications concluded during the last century." No information of any kind was communicated to the last parliament after the signature of the treaty, except through his majesty's speech at the conclusion of the session. In that speech an expectation was certainly held out that there was a prospect of the continuance of peace, and a recommendation was given to cultivate the advantage which a state of peace presented. In this state the matter continued till the opening of the new parliament on the 23rd of November, and then, as before, all communication was withheld. Here, however, it became necessary to direct the attention of the House to a few of the principal grounds of complaint which the Declaration contained. The first to which he would advert, was the complaints of the molestation to which our commerce was exposed. From documents on the table, it appeared, that from Dec. 1801, to Dec. 1802, a series of these complaints had been preferred to ministers, and no spirited remonstrance had taken place on the subject. The visit of the military consuls was known before his majesty's speech was delivered. That the designs of the first consul with respect to Switzerland were known, was a matter of notoriety. Ministers themselves had presented a remonstrance long before that period. With the annexation of Piedmont to France, ministers were not unacquainted. The confiscation of the revenue of the Spanish priories of the order of Malta, ministers were also acquainted with. The mission of Sebastiani, ministers were fully apprized of. The point to which he should next allude, was the arrangement of the German indemnities, which, to a considerable degree, involved British interests. He alluded to the insult which had been offered to his majesty, by multiplying a part of his Hanoverian dominions to satisfy the avarice of the greater powers. Complete mystery had covered the indemnities to the House of Orange. For this arrangement an article had been introduced into the treaty; but till the papers were laid on the table the House had been totally ignorant in what train the negotiation on this subject had been left by ministers. The whole business about the order for the evacuation of the Cape, and its subsequent retention, was entirely passed over in silence. By papers subsequently called for, it appeared, that on the 16th Oct. ministers had dispatched orders to retain the Cape, though, by a solemn treaty, it was to be given up within a limited period. At what time was this extraordinary step taken by ministers? It was just about one month from the time that parliament assembled! Did ministers, when parliament assembled, inform the House of the extraordinary measure to which they had resorted? They had not said a single word on the subject. In a very few weeks after it had appeared proper to them to evacuate the Cape, and then a war virtually intervened, still ministers continued to observe the same silence. Some hon. members had commended ministers for the silence they had so long observed. He could not accede to this doctrine. The system pursued by ministers would, under the cloak of responsibility, destroy every constitutional principle of parliamentary right, of discussion and inquiry. He sincerely believed, for himself, that if the negotiation, which had lately terminated, had taken a favourable turn, we should have heard nothing of the whole of the orders and counter orders of ministers. From the two first resolutions, the third appeared to flow as a necessary inference. It involved a variety of serious and weighty observations. First, in the attacks which had been made on our ships by the officers of the French government. One hon. gentleman seemed to consider, that on this point there was no reasonable ground of complaint. If injuries had been received, British subjects had only to appeal to the national courts of justice. But, what were these national courts of justice? The principal ground of complaint was, that these courts of appeal decide only by taking immediate possession of the prizes submitted to their decision. But what does the first consul say to the complaints of British subjects? Why, he tells them they must appeal to the very tribunals from which all the injustice complained of had been received. In failing to remonstrate against a species of aggression, so contrary to every principle of intercourse between civilized nations, ministers had incurred a very grave responsibility. The mission of the French military consul did not appear to him to be described in his majesty's declaration, in terms at all correspondent to the nature of the insult. It was an outrage in all respects so gross, that ministers ought with much greater spirit to have resented the attempt to violate the usages of independent nations. If the French government had refused to give satisfaction, there could be no doubt that war, to avenge this national insult, would have been justifiable. Ministers had chosen to pursue a course totally different. No memorial could be laid before the House, not because they had not remonstrated, but because the remonstrance had taken place merely in a verbal conference with the French ambassador. The next point on which he wished to touch, was the situation of Holland. For his own part, he considered the conduct of the French government to the Batavian republic, to be a full, fair, and unanswerable ground of war. What he had to complain of in the conduct of ministers was, that they had not shown that zeal and activity with regard to the necessity of remonstrating against the violence and injustice of the French government to the Dutch, which their duty imperiously called on them to display. It was, to his infinite astonishment, that he found that no memorial had been presented to the French government on the subject; not that no memorial or remonstrance had been drawn up with the view of being presented not that it had been transmitted to Paris, with the view of being laid before the first consul; but that, after being in the hands of our ambassador, ministers had at length discovered that it would be more wise, prudent, and proper, that it should not be delivered. And they declined interfering, on the dishonourable principle, that their interference might have excited the jealousy of the French government. Now, as to their conduct to Switzerland, here too ministers seemed to be highly reprehensible. He had good reason for believing, that as early as the spring of last year, several persons of eminent character, and invested with considerable situations, had come from Switzerland to London, with a view of consulting about the best means of providing against that interference of the French government in their internal affairs they had even then begun to dread. He had heard that, so far from being received with kindness, it was not till after a solicitation of near two months that those individuals could gain admission to ministers; who consequently must have known, long before October, when their remonstrance in behalf of Switzerland was presented, what was the real situation of that country. But, there was another circumstance attending this remonstrance to which he wished to call the attention of the House. The memorial had been presented to the French government on the 10th of October, and nothing more is heard of it till the 27th of February, when lord Whitworth is instructed to demand an answer to the remonstrance. Was no inquiry made during the intermediate space, in what light the memorial was regarded by the French government? Ministers on every consideration of wisdom and policy, ought much earlier to have demanded explanation. As to Piedmont, he had to offer a few observations. On a former occasion the situation of the king of Sardinia had given rise to a good deal of discussion. On the debates upon the definitive treaty, when it was objected that no provision was obtained for that sovereign, a noble secretary of state had said, that he had not only lost all right to interference on his behalf on the part of this country, but had, from his conduct, placed himself in the situation of being considered as an enemy. Against such a view of the subject he did protest at the time. Because a prince, who fighting in our cause, had been stripped of his dominions, was for a while obliged to assume the nominal appearance of a foe, he could never admit the doctrines which the noble lord had laid down. But on a sudden a most important change is introduced in the situation of this sovereign. From being something little short of an avowed enemy, he is at once converted into a favoured ally, for whom ample security is to be obtained for all his losses. And how is this new indemnity to be procured? Why, by the rare scheme of the cession of Lampedosa, and by tacking the poor king of Sardinia to the end of the projet, which contains two articles which may be either admitted or not, as the French minister for foreign affairs chooses to receive them. Whether, however, the menace of war or the proffer of peace was considered, the whole conduct of ministers to that unfortunate prince appeared equally disgusting. Now, as to Malta. He could not but think that a total want of policy with regard to Russia had been discovered by ministers while negotiations were going forward on this subject. Russia is allowed on all hands to have been the principal power on which ministers relied for the guarantee of Malta at the time the tenth article of the treaty was formed. Now, what happened while such was the avowed wish and design of ministers? Ministers signed a treaty, by one article of which Russia is to be invited to be one of the guarantees of the independence of the island; and this ministers do, while, at the very moment they were making this requisition, they were conscious that such a guarantee would be directly contrary to a previous arrangement between this country and Russia. Of a piece with this was the manner in which they had acted with respect to the sale of the priories of the order of Malta in Spain. They knew that without revenues the restoration of the order was utterly impracticable, but, at the very time when the definitive treaty was signed, they had every reason for thinking that in Italy, in Bavaria, and in Spain, the revenues of the order were either confiscated, or on the eve of being confiscated. After all this knowledge, they come forward and call for the guarantees, to pave the way for the restoration of the order. Of the importance of the Cape as a naval station, no diversity of opinion prevailed. It was merely with the view of an absolute necessity of its surrender at the conclusion of peace, that the cession was ever attempted to be justified. With this impression on his mind, it was with no small degree of surprise he found, on referring to the French official papers, that the proposition for ceding the Cape, originated with the ministers of this country; that it was brought forward even so early as the second conference. The right hon. gentleman sat down by giving his cordial vote for the resolutions.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said:—I should not, Sir, have risen, were it not that several of the observations that have been so forcibly insisted upon by the right hon. gentleman, seemed to be directed against myself. Much has been remarked upon the treaty of Amiens. I shall now only repeat what I always have said respecting it,—that conscientiously and deliberately I entertain the same opinion of it as I did at the time it was under discussion, namely, that it was a measure not only wise, prudent, and necessary, but that it has been productive of the most beneficial consequences; nor will I hesitate to affirm, that I should not now have to congratulate you, Sir, the House, and the country, on the spirit and the unanimity, which the present emergency has called forth, were it not for that very treaty which is so severely stigmatized. Of the wisdom and beneficial consequences of that treaty, not only do I continue to retain a hardened sense, but I am ready to go further, and to affirm that it was wise and desirable to endeavour to maintain it; and until the causes occurred which produced the present rupture, it was the first wish of my heart, and likewise the first wish of my colleagues, that the peace should be maintained, if it could be maintained consistently with the honour, the dignity, and the interests of the country. But since our anxious wishes in that respect have been frustrated, I trust, Sir, I am prepared to meet the crisis with the feelings of an Englishman; and, anxious as I was to sheath the sword, I shall now be found no less determined to unsheath it, until it appears that the honour of the country remains untouched, and that its safety and independence are effectually secured.—Let me now, Sir, advert to what has been rather harshly observed, respecting the temper with which ministers are said to have borne with the conduct of the French government. Their desire of peace induced them to manifest no inconsiderable share of patience and forbearance ; but they felt that the situation of France itself, and the circumstances in which was placed the person who held the chief rule in that country, called for some allowances. His mind was so pampered with victories ; it was so dazzled with the splendor that was shed upon his name, that it might not be fair to expect he would immediately sit down quiet, and soberly examine what might best belong to his new situation. Under that impression, it was judged wise to observe a certain degree of forbearance with respect to what would be noticed in the French government under other circumstances. That forbearance which gentlemen are so prone to censure, ministers, I think, have reason to boast of. It has produced no bad consequences, if we are to have war ; it has neither delayed it too long, nor has it brought it on one hour too soon. I have been charged with holding out expectations of the continuance of peace, which have since been proved not to be justified by circumstances. Ministers have also been charged with withholding from parliament those communications which it had a right to expect. We stated that we had no reliance at any time on the continuance of peace, but such as arose from a view of the situation of the enemy, and the consciousness of our own strength. France may have discovered the same restless spirit of ambition that has ever marked her character. Yet, on the occasion to which the right hon. gentleman seems to refer, I did say, that the peace might last as long as any other ; and I added, that the only chance of its continuance arose from our energy, and the impregnable security of our resources. I was of the same opinion when the preliminaries were discussed. The same language I held last session. But the right hon. gentleman observes, that the conduct of the French government should have inspired different apprehensions. I am not very much disposed to flatter the person who is now at the head of the French government ; but I must say, that I could see nothing in his conduct which led me to believe that it was his policy to renew hostilities. In this, Sir, I may have been deceived ; but his sending at the time the remaining navy of France to St. Domingo, his exposing so large a portion both of his naval and military force, were surely reasonable indications of a pacific system ; nor can it well be accounted for, but on a principle of peace. It has also been asserted, that in the discussion on his majesty's speech, on the 23rd of November, an assurance was expressed by me, that there was no probability of an immediate rupture. Similar language is said to have been used by me when the question respecting the income of the prince of Wales was under discussion. I am supposed then to have observed that we were in profound peace. That I mentioned our being at peace, I readily agree ; but I do not think that I made use of the word "profound." If I added the word "profound," it was probably only from the usual combination of the two words. Let the House consult the speech of his majesty at the beginning of the session, the address, and even the amendment to the address, which were moved on that occasion. Do they imply any thing like the opinion which I am asserted to have uttered ? On the contrary, did not the sentiments there expressed create great anxiety in the minds of some gentlemen ? Is it likely that I should have expressed a conviction that no renewal of hostilities would take place, at a time when I was agreeing to a large naval and military establishment ?—Ministers were also accused of not making formal communications to parliament of the matters that gave rise to the discussions. But, such communications might be attended with the worst effects, and therefore it was prudent to withhold them until the time came for making them with safety. As to the application from Switzerland, it is true, that it took place before the meeting of parliament, but it was then earnestly wished that no resistance should be made on their part. Nor was there then any combination that could give effect to a remonstrance in their behalf. With regard to Holland, the right hon. gentleman complained that vigorous remonstrances had not been made for the removal of the French troops from that country. The contrary would appear from the instructions given to lord Whitworth. Hopes were given by Mr. Liston, on the 5th Nov., that the French troops would evacuate Holland ; but on the 12th, that expectation was discouraged. The French government expressed a wish that the troops destined for Louisiana might continue some time longer in the Batavian territories ; with which wish the Batavian government seemed disposed to comply ; for they hinted a desire that we should forbear to interpose in their behalf. On the subject of the Cape of Good Hope, much had been said, and more value has been attached to that possession than, perhaps, it deserves. In my opinion it is of much less value than other possessions which his majesty's ministers were anxious to retain; and in this opinion I have been confirmed by the concurrence of those who are best qualified to decide upon that question. Besides, the retaining of it would involve a large expense; for during the time we were in possession of it, that expense amounted to two millions. Whatever its value might be estimated at by others, I could never bring myself to imagine that we should forego for its sake the chance of retaining more valuable possessions. The right hon. gentleman, in speaking of Malta, seemed to suppose that an engagement respecting it had been entered into with Russia: no such engagement had taken place. Previous to the conclusion of the preliminaries, a communication had been made to the Russian government of the heads of the arrangement respecting Malta: and then no objection was made to the arrangement, except to that part which related to a Maltese langue. We afterwards, indeed, agreed to adopt the Russian mode of electing the grand master, and hopes were given by lord St. Helen's that Russia would grant her guarantee, but these hopes were disappointed. With regard to the commercial commissioners, my noble friend remonstrated in the most spirited terms, and received a disavowal of the purpose for which they were supposed to be intended. As soon as all hopes had vanished of concluding a commercial treaty, government refused to recognize them, and they were all instructed to remove from the country. Will it now be contended that no remonstrances have been made against the insults and injuries offered by the French government? While there remained a hope of peace no communication was made to parliament, because it was thought that such communication would frustrate the attainment of the desirable object. In whatever light the House may be induced to behold their conduct, ministers are ready to meet its decision. We only call for a decision; we do not venture to ask for approbation: we are anxious, however, to escape censure. If it be merited, we submissively acquiesce in the sentence of the House: but if it be unmerited, let our minds be relieved from the charges which the resolutions now proposed hang over us. Mr. Pitt said:—If I possessed a full and clear opinion, on the merits of the case, to the extent of either directly negating or adopting the resolutions, I should follow the unbiassed dictates of my conscience, give my vote on that side to which my judgment inclined. If I agreed with my right hon. friend (Mr. Grenville), in thinking that the first steps we ought to take, in duty to the public, were, by a retrospective survey of the conduct of ministers, to judge of their fitness to exercise the functions to which they are called; and if, upon that result, I were forced to conclude, that the papers, on the table, afford evidence of criminality, of incapacity, of misconduct; then, however painful the sacrifice of private feelings might be, in taking such a part in the case of individuals, whom I respect, I should feel myself bound to concur in an address to his majesty, for the removal of his ministers. On the other hand, if I were one of those, who considered the explanation afforded by ministers upon general points, so clear as to justify a decided negative of the propositions which have been moved; a negative which would imply approbation—for in such a matter, to avoid ground of censure, may be considered the same as to have deserved applause—I should feel myself happy in joining in a decisive negative to the motion; but to this extent, either of approbation or of censure, I am unable to go. I cannot concur in the latter, nor in the extent of charges involved in the propositions, which have been moved. Besides, I am aware of the inconvenience that would result, from supporting any measure which has the tendency of the present motion, unless the clearest necessity exists for it. Though I do not dispute the right of this House, to address the king for the removal of ministers, yet, nothing is more mischievous than a parliamentary interference, by declared censure, rendering the continuance of ministers in office impossible, unless that interference is justified by extraordinary exigency of affairs. Not disputing the right of the House, I contend that the right is to be governed by a sound discretion, and by the public interest: we must look to considerations of public expediency, of public safety. There are some questions, in the discussion of which gentlemen must feel more than they can well express; and this, with regard to the interference of parliament for removing ministers, is one of them. Admitting even, that there were considerable grounds of dissatisfaction at the conduct of ministers, would it tend to promote those exertions, to encourage those sacrifices, which the difficulty and danger of our situation require? Would our means of sustaining the struggle, in which we are engaged, and of calling forth those resources necessary for our defence, be improved by cutting short the date of administration, and unsettling the whole system of government? To displace one administration, and to introduce a new one, is not the work of a day. With all the functions of executive power suspended; with the regular means of communication between parliament and the throne interrupted; weeks, nay months, wasted in doubt, uncertainty, and inaction, how could the public safety consist, with a state of things so violent and unnatural, as would result from parliament rendering one administration incapable of exercising any public functions, without any other efficient government being obtained in its stead? I will venture to hint also, that after such a step, any administration that should succeed, be it what it might and what it would be, must still depend upon the crown would feel itself placed in a most delicate situation. To put the matter as conscientiously and delicately as possible; would any set of men feel their introduction to power, in these circumstances, to be such as to enable them to discharge, in a manner satisfactory to themselves, the duties which so eventful a period must impose? These are considerations for the crown and the public; and they outweigh all those which present themselves, on a partial view of the advantages which could be hoped, from a prosecution of that censure and dissolution of administration, to which the propositions tend. I am aware that the right hon. the chancellor of the exchequer, and my friends on the same bench with him, must feel their situation irksome, under the weight of a question so important, in which they are personally involved, remaining undecided. Nevertheless, when other sacrifices are demanded for the public interest, personal feelings must be overlooked. Those who, with me, have not made up their minds to the extent of censuring ministers by the adoption of the propositions; or of approving their conduct, by agreeing to a direct negative, must pursue some middle course. They cannot do that which implies approbation, when they do not find, from the case made out, that approbation, has been deserved; neither can they vote severe censure, leading to an address for removal, when they do not consider the charges made, as completely sustained. Having stated the opposite lines of conduct, which present themselves in deciding upon the propositions, I do not intend to enter into any detailed discussion of the papers. I wish, if good cannot be obtained by continuing to discuss them, comparable to the evil of interrupting the course of our parliamentary duty, to suspend them altogether. Since things more urgent, and more important demand our care, let us make good the parliamentary pledge we have given. I shall behold, with much greater satisfaction, as first proofs of our determination to support his majesty, with our lives and fortunes, you, Sir, presenting a strong bill of supply, providing resources, not merely for every demand of public service, but adequate to every scale of execution; a measure that will display and call forth the means of sustaining the struggle, not merely for one year, but till we shall have brought it to a successful issue; some measure, by which we shall be enabled to complete our army and to call into action the national strength and give activity to all the military skill, discipline, and experience we possess. Impressed, as I am, with these feelings, and unprepared for the decisive vote which is offered in the direct negative or affirmative to the propositions before the House, I move, "that the other orders of the day be now read."

Lord Hawkesbury said, that never before, had he risen with such feelings as those that now oppressed him. With every wish to do justice to the motives of his right hon. friend, in making the motion with which he had concluded his speech, he and his colleagues should be shrinking from their duty to themselves, if they could accept the compromise offered between a direct censure and a total acquittal. A charge of crimination, founded upon papers laid upon the table, had been brought forward. He asked, if there was an instance in which propositions, founded on such documents, and involving the conduct of ministers, had not been met with a direct negative or affirmative? A motion of inquiry might be got rid of, by a previous question; but when a direct charge was made, grounded on facts, rising out of public documents, a previous question was not the fit way of disposing of the subject. No man was more ready than he was, to acknowledge the prerogative of the crown to choose its own ministers; but, on the other hand, ministers were responsible to parliament for the exercise of their functions; and, when parliament saw sufficient grounds of censure, they ought to state it; and then ministers, no longer able usefully to serve the public, ought to retire. Independently of private considerations, he must contend, that the credit of the government ought to be maintained, particularly at such a crisis as the present. But he had no difficulty in saying, that those who wished to destroy the administration, ought to vote for the resolutions, because that was their obvious tendency, while the vote which his right hon. friend had proposed, would have the effect to discredit government, to leave them discredited, in possession of functions, which they could not exercise, with honour to themselves, or advantage to the public. His right hon. friend had declined going into details. He wished, however, that he had pointed out those parts of the conduct of ministers which he could not approve, that they might have had an opportunity of meeting any charge, or explaining what was deemed exceptionable. It was possible, that in a long and arduous course of conduct, some points might be liable to objection. In a country like this, however, he always considered it to be the fair principle, both of support and of opposition to ministers, that those who agreed or disagreed with them, should do so on a general system. It was not to be expected, that all should approve every particular point. They were to overlook minor differences, for the sake of giving effect to the general scheme of measures and conduct which they approved. These, he had always understood, were the general principles, and he regretted that his right hon. friend had not made up his mind to act upon them. He asked, whether, after surveying the conduct of ministers, during a period of unexampled difficulty, he was not now prepared to say yes or no, directly to a motion of censure? On the Russian armament, he well remembered, that his right hon. friend, and himself, had not thought it sufficient to get rid of a motion of censure, by a previous question; but, in circumstances, when the government in one point had given up, yet the charges were met boldly, and directly negatived. He wished, that on the present occasion, ministers might either be acquitted or condemned. He was sure, from what he knew of his right hon. friend, that his motives in bringing forward the previous question, were pure and upright; but ministers could not acquiesce in the discredit of a suspended censure. If it were the desire of ministers to retain their places, at all hazards, they might accept the compromise which had been offered; but he could say for himself and his colleagues, that they had no desire to remain in office, any longer than they could be useful to their country. If he felt himself reduced to that situation, in which he could not serve it with advantage, he would carry the seals to the feet of his gracious sovereign, and intreat him to appoint a successor more worthy. It was that they might not remain in office discredited and useless, that he must oppose the previous question; for he could not think of remaining an hour in office, after having forfeited the confidence of the House, and the good opinion of the country.

Mr. Canning said:—I rise, Sir, under the impression of feelings scarcely less painful than those which have been manifested by my noble friend, to state the reasons which govern the vote that I am about to give. And in giving this vote, whether I look at my noble friend, or at my right hon. friend who has moved the order of the day, I feel a degree of pain and reluctance, which nothing less than a conscientious sense of duty could enable me to subdue. By this overruling sense of duty I find myself compelled to differ, for the first time in my life, from my right hon. friend. But let it not therefore be imagined, that in following a different course for myself, I presume to insinuate the smallest blame, to hint a doubt of the propriety of that which, with his view of the subject, he has chosen for himself, and for those who may come, like him, with unpledged opinions to this discussion. Far from it. I admit, on the contrary, that whoever has either not completely made up his mind to the extent of that charge against ministers which is contained in the resolutions, or whoever, agreeing even in opinion as to the justice of that charge, up to its full extent, is persuaded (like my right hon. friend) that greater mischief may be to be apprehended from pushing such an opinion to a parliamentary declaration, than from suffering it to pass by undecided, and to be (if possible) buried in oblivion; whatever gentleman there may be, who joins with my right hon. friend, entertaining these opinions, that man is bound, as I think, to adopt the line of conduct which he has suggested, and to avail himself of the opportunity which is afforded to him of escaping from a decision which he could not negative with truth, and which he thinks cannot be affirmed without public mischief. For myself, I have no such refuge open to me. I entertain a full conviction of the truth of every one of the charges which these resolutions contain; and have no hesitation in avowing, that I think the continuance of a blundering and incapable administration, at a crisis like the present, a more certain mischief to the country than any that can arise from a public declaration by parliament of its opinion of their incapacity and misconduct. I therefore am perfectly prepared for a decisive vote upon this question. The papers which ministers have laid before parliament, exhibit, to my mind, abundant proofs that our affairs have been grossly mismanaged. The production of these papers appears to me not only to afford the natural opportunity, but to throw down a challenge to all those who have, like myself, expressed a strong presumptive opinion against the conduct of ministers, to repeat or retract that expression now that their conduct is fully before us. And it is, as I think, a challenge which, so situated, we have hardly the option to decline. I consider myself bound, therefore, to comply with the demand of my noble friend, and, much as I lament that one for whom I feel so much personal regard, is involved in the issue of the decision, I will at least do him the justice which he requires, by voting in the first instance against a proposition which (however justifiable on the grounds on which it is offered) would prevent that decision, which ministers are entitled to expect on the part of those who are prepared and pledged to come to it.—Mr. Canning then proceeded to take a rapid survey of the resolutions. The first was a mere truism, stating in the words of the declaration itself, the sense which ministers appear, by that declaration, to have entertained of the conduct of France. To this he apprehended no objection could be urged. The second contrasted the conduct which ministers had thought proper to hold, and the language which they had used, and the impressions which they had studiously created throughout the country, with what now appeared to have been all along their own real opinions—a contrast and contradiction not more disgraceful to ministers themselves, than mischievous to the country which had been duped by it. Could any man reflect without indignation on the deception and delusion so long practised upon parliament and upon the people? Could any man recall to his mind, without disgust, the canting professions of belief in the continuance of peace and amity, and goodwill between this country and France, uttered in that House almost daily, before Christmas, nay, even up to within ten days of the declaration of war, or, what was nearly the same thing, of the king's message—uttered at moments (as it now appeared) when the secret thoughts and internal convictions of ministers were directly at variance with the assertions which they made? Could any man consider the consequences of this system of deceit, and not think some marked censure upon those who had dared to employ it, absolutely necessary? Should it be borne that parliament should have been called upon to vote under false pretences? that members should have been sent down among their constituents (as had happened at the Christmas recess) to spread falsehood and error throughout the country; and that the confiding country should have been misled into incorrect and groundless views, and deluded into visionary hopes, only that it might feel more seriously the blow of disappointment? For what purpose could it be that ministers had thought this system of deception, this trick upon the nation, adviseable? Was it design? What possible good could arise from it? Are men better prepared for action when they are roused out of a sleep, and, as they fancy, secure slumber? or was it in sport only that ministers spread these gay delusions? Was it matter of amusement to them to engage the commerce of the country in wide speculations and hazardous enterprises, that they might see how men would look, when a sudden and unexpected check wrested their progress, or prevented their expected returns? or was it sheer ignorance? Did they not know what they were about? Is it their excuse for having duped England, that they were themselves the dupes of France? Had they in their possession, had they before their eyes, and in their minds, those documents which they have now at length put into the hands of parliament, those records of insult, injury, and aggression, sufficient, one should think, to awaken the most sluggish suspicion; and did they suspect nothing of the insecurity of their peace?

There was but this alternative, either they must have been deceived themselves, or they must wilfully and wantonly, and most audaciously have imposed upon the public; in representing as solid, substantial, and durable, that peace, whose baseless fabric was at that very moment crumbling under their feet.—He would not refer to the instances which had been particularly quoted, to those expressions of the chancellor of the exchequer so rashly hazarded, and now so ingeniously explained. He did not say, “profound peace.” Did he not? The many who thought they heard him must have been wonderfully mistaken; or if he did say, “profound,” (he might have said it then, it appeared) it was only because “profound” and “peace” were so apt to come together. Happy, dignified, and satisfactory explanation! He would not dwell upon this point. He would content himself with expressing his hearty adoption of every word of a resolution, which went to mark with censure, reprobation, and contempt, a system so unworthy of the government of a country like this.—The third resolution no man could compare with the papers, and with the avowals extorted from ministers, without feeling a painful conviction of its truth. Not only did it appear, beyond contradiction, that opportunities had been lost, for checking the aggressions of France by timely representation and dignified remonstrance—not only had the grossest insults been passed by without any attempt to obtain reparation, the most flagrant violations of treaty suffered to continue without observation; but it appeared now, from the avowal of the chancellor of the exchequer, that these omissions, on the part of his majesty's government, had been omissions, not of negligence, but of design. They had, it seems, been remiss upon system: they had studiously suffered their wrongs to accumulate; they had diligently noted them, to be sure, as they occurred; and why?—because they thought, in their profound wisdom, the government of Buonaparté entitled to peculiar indulgence! With other governments they would have been all courage, and vigilance, all high point of honour and quick resentment of injury. But Buonaparté was not to be bound to common rules! His green and raw usurpation was entitled to privileges and indulgences which would have been denied to hereditary monarchy, and ancient, recognized, legitimate sway! I am glad that the right hon. gentleman has fairly avowed his system. It is exactly what I have all along suspected it to be. I say, Sir, that this is the very error, the fundamental fault, of the system upon which the conduct of our government towards France has been regulated; and in my conscience I believe it is to this that we are in a great measure to attribute the struggle in which we are now involved. Our stand ought to have been made not on the last insult, but on the first; be it what it might. Unusual indulgence to Buonaparté! He ought to have been watched; and to have known that he was watched with unusual jealousy. The first moment that he outstepped, with regard to this country, the line of respect, of decency, of honourable consideration to which we feel ourselves intitled, he should have been met with firmness, and plainly given to understand that it was not so that Great Britain was accustomed to be treated; that she would herself respect a power with whom she had made peace, but that she expected, and would demand, urge, and, if necessary, enforce, equal, reciprocal respect in her turn. Would you then have precipitated the war? In my conscience I believe I should have retarded, possibly have prevented it. One insult tamely borne is an invitation to a second. An injury helplessly acquiesced in, is a signal for more. Temperately and steadily opposed in his first attempt upon our interests, or upon our honour, Buonaparté would have hesitated before he tried a second experiment. As it was, he had nothing to deter him. He had every temptation to proceed. He saw plainly enough that he was considered, as the right hon. gentleman now owns he did consider him, as a privileged person—that an untitled usurper was in the eyes of the British ministry a favoured power—and he used his privilege accordingly. I do not wonder at him. I hardly blame him. Flesh and blood—at least a tyrant's flesh and blood—could hardly resist the temptation of trampling upon unresisting imbecility. But for my country I do complain, that its honour has been sacrificed, and its interests trifled with, in a vain and foolish attempt to propitiate violence by submission, and to repel aggression by tameness and indulgence. I do complain, that instead of having taken the best chance of averting war altogether, by a timely notice of our determination to encounter it rather than submit to oppression or to shame, we have ensured the war, such as it now comes upon us, and have gained by our system of forbearance no other advantage than this whining catalogue of unredressed grievances, to which the right hon. gentleman appeals, as a proof of his wisdom and moderation, but which I consider as the strongest evidence of weakness and misconduct.—

With regard to the fourth resolution, as it had been so unanswerably argued by his right hon. friend (Mr. Grenville) he would not enter into any additional argument. He would content himself with expressing his firm persuasion that the present ministers were the first statesmen who ever imagined that the most likely way of bringing to a happy conclusion any point upon which they intended to make a stand was, to put previously out of their hands all collateral means of pressing it to advantage; that when, from the beginning, they were determined to take their stand upon the article of Malta, it did seem to him to be the very height of inconsistency, weakness, and improvidence, not to have turned the possession of the Cape to the obvious advantage of which it was capable, that of making it tell upon the settlement of their other disputes, and specifically upon that of the dispute respecting Malta. All the evils, whatever they were, attending the recapture of the Cape they had already incurred. They had by this act rivetted Holland in the chains of France. But having done this, having ensured all the mischief arising from their own act, that they should wantonly throw away all the possible good, implied a degree of folly utterly irreconcilable with the character and conduct of any ministry, except that whose mistakes and mismanagements were the subject of the resolutions now before the House. This only was wanting to hasten the war, which their previous neglect of their obvious duty, and surrender of the honour of the country, had, perhaps, already rendered unavoidable. It was to throw away the only remaining chance of an adjustment, the only means for the preservation of peace with safety, which their former profuse concessions had left for a moment in their hands. Subscribing, therefore, to the truth of every allegation contained in the resolutions to which he had referred, he could have no hesitation in giving a hearty assent to the resolution which asserts, that by these instances of misconduct the ministers had proved themselves unworthy of the confidence of parliament, and incapable of administering the public affairs to advantage at a crisis of such difficulty and danger. In his conscience he fully subscribed to, and adopted, the averment of this resolution also; and with all the solemnity which he felt to belong to such a declaration, he declared, that he did not think the country safe while the administration of its affairs was suffered to continue in such hands.

The question being put, That the other orders of the day be now read, the House divided:

Tellers.

|      |   |                         |   |     |
|------|---|-------------------------|---|-----|
| YEAS | { | Mr. Long .....          | } | 56  |
|      |   | Mr. Robert Dundas.....  |   |     |
| NOES | { | Mr. Attorney General... | } | 333 |
|      |   | Sir John Honeywood ...  |   |     |

So it passed in the negative. Upon which Mr. Pitt and several of his friends left the House. And the previous question being put, that the said first proposed question be now put, it passed in the negative. The second resolution being put,

Mr. Fox said, he should not vote for the resolution, though it was impossible for him to approve of the conduct of ministers. He hoped that what had occurred would be a warning to them how they kept the House in the dark to the last moment. He could not agree to a vote of censure, because he did not know but that the successors of the present ministry might be more objectionable to him than they were.

The House divided:

Tellers.

|      |   |                   |   |     |

Mr. Fox and several of his friends left the House without dividing. The third and fourth resolutions were then negatived. The fifth was withdrawn; and at four in the morning, the House adjourned.

Debate in the Lords on the Conduct of Ministers.] June 2. Earl Fitzwilliam brought forward certain resolutions, condemning the general conduct of ministers, in having held forward to the nation a confident expectation of a permanent peace, during the time that France was pursuing a hostile system towards this country. His lordship prefaced his motion by an able speech, in which he first pointed the attention of the House to the conduct of our ministers and of France, at the time of the treaty of Amiens. During the negotiation, the first consul, in contempt of decency, pursued his constant system of aggression. It was then that he made himself president of the Italian republic; changed Piedmont into a military arrondissement; annexed Parma and Placentia to France: and it was after France had thus aggrandized herself, that our ministers consented to cede the conquered colonies also. When the first consul next seized upon Switzerland, our ministers sent a person over to that country with offers of assistance, which could evidently be productive of no advantage to the Swiss. Numerous insults and aggressions had been passed over, without any spirited remonstrance, until, at length, the report of Sebastiani forced government to retain Malta. He considered the uniform conduct of the present ministry to be such as neither to command respect at home or abroad, and that they had proved themselves utterly unworthy of the confidence of the public. He then read a series of resolutions, which were exactly similar to those proposed in the House of Commons by Mr. Patten [See p. 1535]. The first resolution being put,

The Earl of Limerick vindicated the conduct of administration, in the several points which had been alluded to by the noble mover. As to their conduct with respect to Switzerland, it was not their fault, that the continental powers would not interfere to save it. In the negotiation which had ended in war, he thought they deserved approbation instead of censure; they had avoided war as long as it was possible to avoid it with honour. He concluded by dwelling, with animation, on the rooted hostility of the first consul towards this empire, and his desire to remove from the neighbourhood and

Earl Grosvenor defended the conduct of ministers, and moved the previous question.

Lord Mulgrave thought the present time improper for such discussions, as the greatest unanimity was now required; he therefore moved the question of adjournment.

The Earl of Caernarvon deprecated an adjournment, and condemned the conduct of ministers. They had found the country, at the time they had the presumption to undertake its government, in the possession of many valuable acquisitions, which had been the fruit of former victories. These they had abandoned to France. Whatever private virtues ministers might possess, he considered the want of talents to be as highly criminal in those who had the direction of state affairs, as he did the want of courage to be in an officer.

Lord Ellenborough said, he could not sit still when he heard the capacity of ministers arraigned by those who were themselves most incapable, and when he saw ignorance itself pretending to decide on the knowledge possessed by others. He warmly vindicated the firmness and ability displayed by ministers in the whole of the negotiation, and during the whole course of their administration.

Lord Melville supported the question of adjournment, as he thought it was better not to discuss the question, than to discuss it partially. He expressed a strong disapprobation of many parts of the conduct of ministers, but thought it would be a dangerous time to address his majesty to remove them, as this was not a season in which the country could bear to be any time without an administration; and there might be a considerable difficulty in agreeing who should be the new ministers, even were the present removed.

Lord Hobart complained of the manner in which ministers had been treated. It was evident that the adjournment would be an indirect censure upon ministers.

Lord Grenville, although he disapproved in a variety of instances of the conduct of ministers, said, that he had hitherto abstained from expressing his disapprobation for fear we might appear to the enemy, not so firmly united as we ought to be. Of all the various acts of misconduct of the present administration, there were none which he condemned more severely than their uniform system of withholding the necessary information from parliament.

The Lord Chancellor vindicated the conduct of ministers. He allowed that in a business so complicated, partial errors might have been committed, deprecated the motion for adjournment, and pressed for an immediate decision.

At half past four in the morning the House divided upon the motion of adjournment: Contents, 18; Not-contents, 106. The House again divided on the previous question: Contents, 14; Not-contents 96. So it passed in the negative. The second resolution was also negatived; after which, the debate on the remaining resolutions was adjourned till the 6th.

June 6. Earl Fitzwilliam having, after a short speech, moved the third resolution [See p. 1536], a long debate ensued, in the course of which, the resolution was opposed by the duke of Cumberland, lord Coventry, lord Grosvenor, lord De Dunstanville, lord Hobart, the Lord Chancellor, and lord Pelham; and supported by lord Minto, the earl of Warwick, lord Carysfort, lord Grenville, and earl Spencer. On a division, the numbers were, for the resolution, 17; Against it 86. The remaining resolutions were negatived without a division.

Debate on the Army Estimates.] June 6. The Secretary at War having brought forward some of the Army Estimates of the year, and stated, that but a small augmentation was intended to be made in the regular army,

Mr. Windham said, that his object in rising, was not so much to comment upon the details which had been laid before the House, as to take the opportunity, which the army estimates always afforded, of making some observations upon the war and the general state of the country. The first subject upon which he should make any observations, was, the propriety of having so large a part of our force to consist of militia. He thought the scale upon which it was proposed to form the military force was wrong, because the population of the country was such, that it would not afford, at once, a large militia and a large army. In fact, the system pursued of late years, if it did not "suckle armies and dry-nurse the land," must at least, be said to suckle the militia and dry-nurse the army. If such large bounties were given to men who engaged only for a few years, and for home-service, how was it to be supposed, that for a small bounty men would be induced to enter the army, to serve for life and in every quarter of the globe? The army, in such a state of things, must not only stand still, it must go backwards, for it was not to be conceived, that, with these high bribes, desertion would not become general. In fact, desertion, it was well known, had become a sort of trade. Men got a livelihood by passing from corps to corps, and performing, what they called, the grand tour. If, at the end of the tour the man remained in the service, the only effect of all these bounties was, that you had obtained a soldier in the militia or fencibles, in exchange for a soldier in the regular army. One reason, perhaps, for this anxiety for augmenting the militia, was, that the money with which they were levied, did not come in the shape of a direct tax, and therefore, it was thought, would pass without notice. But this was a poor and criminal policy. The money, though not raised avowedly by parliament, was equally drawn from the pockets of the people. His general objection, however, to the measure was, that it would create a militia, and not an army. It was the duty of those entrusted with the government of a country, in the first place, to form in their own minds, some idea of the nature of the war which they were to carry on, and then to regulate the public force accordingly. After endeavouring to preserve peace as long as they could, and longer than they ought, ministers were forced into war, when all their means of concession and submission were exhausted, and when no option was left; and finding themselves in that situation, they seemed to have no idea of doing any thing but what they understood to have been usual on such occasions, and what the situation itself, indeed, necessarily forced upon them. They issued press-war-rants, they offered bounties, they sent out recruiting parties, they put ships in commission, they did whatever they were told was regular and proper. If they could be said to have any plan at all, it seemed to be one of strict defence; that is to say, we were to wait passively, until we could find an opportunity of sneaking into a peace, as we had just sneaked out of one. There was not an instance, in which a nation successfully carried on a system of pure defence. But it remained to be considered how far a force of this sort was good, even as a mere defensive force. It appeared to him that for the purposes of defence, we ought to have as large a regular force as possible, because regular forces could only be opposed by regular forces: it was "diamond cut diamond." But even adopting the system that ministers were acting upon, and admitting the number of men to be realized, he should contend that there would not be men enough, supposing an invasion to take place: and in the mean time that such exertions were made to raise an ineffectual force, the recruiting of an army, the force certainly most effectual, would be essentially impeded. If, at last, it would be necessary to have recourse to more extensive and energetic means of raising the force of the country, it would, in his opinion, be better to begin with them. He would have a force still less regular than the militia, but one that should not stand in the way of recruiting the army. Some such measure must in the end, be resorted to; and, in his opinion, it would be better to adopt it in the first instance. The only means we had to adopt was, either to strengthen ourselves, or to weaken the enemy; or we could not exist as an independent nation. This being the case, it remained only to consider the order in which these subjects were to be taken, and what the means by which they might severally be pursued. In touching upon this point fairly, he would refer for a moment to the events of last war. In that war, it appeared to him that the plan of weakening the enemy was not only the most proper, but, by far, the shortest and most practicable. He thought it would be more easy to kill the revolutionary tiger, than to chain or to cage him. To that object, therefore, almost the whole force of this country ought to have been directed, though there was no reason, in the meanwhile, that the other object should have been lost sight of. The same objects that existed at that time, exist at present; though, certainly, the progress of time may have changed the relations of these objects, as well as the means of attaining them. That which before was practicable, might now be hopeless; and, in that case, could be no longer an object of pursuit; for he knew of no situation so deplorable, as that of remaining, with respect to France, in our present relative state, with no means of augmenting our own force, or of diminishing that of our rival. Whatever might be thought, therefore, of the project of reducing the power of France; in the only way in which it can be reduced, namely, by co-operation with parties within, it had, at least, this recommendation, that if practicable at all, it was at once the most effectual and the most easy. Whether we believed or not in the truth of the notion, it was, at least, one which we must wish to be true. As Mrs. Cole said of the Roman Catholic religion, "that it was a most comfortable persuasion to one of her calling;" so we may say, that a possible co-operation with royalists and destruction of the present revolutionary government, or, which is the same thing, restoration of the ancient monarchy, is a very comfortable persuasion to persons in our situation. If some means of this kind were not adopted, the prospect before us would be gloomy indeed, in spite even of that mediation, of which gentlemen had talked so much, but from which, for his own part, he so little hoped any good. We were to consider what the task was, of restoring the lost balance of Europe, by the addition of consequence and power to ourselves. The treaty of Amiens had, by one stroke, taken from the power and consequence of this country, in point of actual possessions, to say nothing of character, what we might be well satisfied if ten years of successful war would replace. We had, in one fatal moment, so fallen to leeward, that unless some fortunate shift of wind should come to favour us, we might be beating for years and years against a head-sea without regaining our former station. If he were asked what his hopes were of doing any thing at this moment, either in France itself or on the rest of the continent (the powers of the continent could hardly be considered in existence), he should certainly say "very little;" thanks to the treaty of Amiens, which had given away the powers and the mind of the continent from us, and had made the whole coast of Europe an iron-bound coast to us, not affording an inlet or a creek into which we could run a cutter. It might be said, that the powers of the continent detested France; he believed they did: but did gentlemen never hear of that maxim of tyrants, "Oderint dum metuant?" He, however, could not entirely abandon the hope, which he had placed in the exertions which the continent would, some time or other, make for itself, and therefore he was the more hostile against the scheme of policy now proposed because it would not only render such exertions infinitely less probable but would make us incapable of taking advantage of them should they be made. It was his opinion, that if England would make an open declaration, in the face of Europe, of her views and objects, he did not mean a romantic, chivalrous declaration but, one that would draw with us the sympathy and feeling of all Europe, it would contribute more than any single act, to terminate the calamities which now oppressed the world. Much was always said of the great power of the French republic, but it was by no means right to confound together ideas so separate as those of strength and durability. Nothing was more intelligible than that a nation or individual might be at the period of their greatest strength, when they touched the very moment of their dissolution. The power of France was, at this time, indisputable; but how long that power would exist was a different question. That we wished and hoped to see an end to it, it was impossible for us to deny, notwithstanding all the dissembling and crouching language which we held at certain times, and all the boastful and vapouring which we indulged in at others. That prospect was at the bottom of all our hopes. Every thing which he saw in our plans and counsels, as well as in those who were to conduct them, was calculated to throw him into despair; but he begged that this declaration might not be understood as implying any distrust in the resources and strength of the country, supposing them to be properly applied. Much as he thought of the dangers of invasion (and few persons were inclined to treat them more seriously), they were only formidable to him from the idea of the manner in which they might possibly be met. We were in the state of a ship in a storm. The vessel was tight and well-found, and nothing was wanted but care and conduct, to enable it to brave all the fury of the elements. But if the officers were ignorant or negligent, if the crew were drunken and mutinous, if all proper precautions were not taken, and all proper exertions used, down she might go with all the means of safety in her power. We must not dissemble to ourselves the violence of the storm, with which we were threatened. We had to deal with an adversary who would not do things by halves;

and who had the resources of a continent at his command. Against such an attack he confessed he wished to have something more than the mere loose notions, and vapouring talk of which we heard so much in that House. He entertained a high idea of the native courage of the people of this country; but he did not quite understand the notion, which many seemed to rely on with confidence, of stopping armies by peasantry. An army incapable of recruiting itself, may be finally worn down by the continued attacks even of irregular troops; but he wished to know where the examples were to be found of armies stopped by such troops, unless, possibly in circumstances far different from the present. He believed that none of the generals whose names were familiar to us, either in earlier or more recent history, when they had beaten the army before them, ever asked leave of the peasantry of the country, to pursue their march in whatever direction they thought proper. Such notions belonged only to men, who were totally ignorant of what they were talking about, who had never heard a gun fired in anger,

Men who had really pretensions to be heard upon such subjects, would talk a different language, would tell us that invasion was neither to be despised nor dreaded, or was only to be dreaded, should it happen that by a foolish and ignorant policy it had previously been despised. Upon the whole, whether he considered the interest of the country with a view to the war in general, or, to the narrower and more immediate object of defence, he must equally condemn the present system, which went to create a great and disproportionate militia force, and by the same act, as well as by the means of carrying into effect, to impoverish and keep down the army.

Mr. Pitt seemed to consider the number of militia to bear too great a proportion to the whole of our force. A war that should be completely defensive, would, in his opinion, be both dishonourable and ruinous. He wished to establish it as a principle, that whatever was necessary for the defence or the honour of the country, either in men or money, must be obtained.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed in this sentiment, and said, that a considerable defensive force was at present necessary, on account of the extensive preparations of the enemy. The time might come when circumstances would point out the necessity of giving the war a more offensive character, and in such a case, he had no doubt but the population and spirit of the country would furnish the means of supporting it with honour. For the present, he thought it best to direct the attention of the country principally to the means of defence against the vast preparations of the enemy; for this purpose, he relied, not only on the militia, but on the yeomanry and volunteers also, as a subsidiary force, in aid of the regular army.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Debate in the Lords on the Spiritual Persons Relief Bill.] June 10. On the order of the day, for going into a committee on the bill to amend and render more effectual the laws relating to spiritual persons,

The Bishop of St. Asaph (Dr. Horsley) spoke as follows;—My lords; upon the second reading of this bill, I declared, that, with an entire approbation of the principle, I was dissatisfied with the fabric of it in many parts. In the general view which I propose to take of the fabric of the bill, I cannot avoid saying something upon the principle of it; for, in considering the fabric of the bill, I must not only consider the connexion of the different clauses with one another, but the relation of them all to the principle of the bill. My lords, the residence of the beneficed clergy upon their benefices, and the abstraction of the clergy from all secular occupations, are two points of principal importance in ecclesiastical discipline. It is impossible generally speaking, that the parish priest should discharge himself of the duty which he owes to the flock committed to him, without his personal residence among them. The public instruction of the people from the pulpit, the public celebration of the offices of the church, are but a part—I had almost said they are but a small part—of the duty which the parish priest owes to his parishioners. My lords, he owes it to them besides, to live among them,—to exhibit in his own deportment, and in the good order of his family, the example of a godly and religious life: He owes it to them, to be present to relieve the distresses of the poor by alms proportioned to his means; and he owes it to them to be ready, at the call of the sick and the dying, to administer those consolations which, to persons in those circumstances, can only be afforded by the word of reconciliation in the gospel, and by the means of reconciliation offered in the sacraments of the church,—to assist the penitent in making his peace with God. And how are these great duties to be performed by a clergyman not resident in his parish? My lords, this is not all; the resident clergyman is to maintain the pure dignified character of a clergyman unembarrassed and unsullied with the low occupations of the world.

My lords, before the statute of Henry the 8th, the enforcement of these two points of ecclesiastical discipline was entirely in the hands of the ecclesiastical superiors: they were enforced by the canons, and by ecclesiastical censures and penalties; and the temporal laws and the temporal courts had nothing to do with either. I mention this, because upon the second reading, a noble duke, opposing the principle of the bill, said that it went to take the clergy in these points out of the hands of judges and juries, and to put them entirely under the bishops. My lords if it were so, this would only be a restoration of things to the old footing: for judges and juries had no concern with these matters before the statute of Henry the 8th. But, my lords, I have no wish that the clergy should be taken out of the hands of judges and juries: I think, that whoever looks to the state of the church, with respect to the residence of the clergy, will find that it has been much improved since the secular authority has been empowered to interpose in it; and that the statute of Henry the 8th, with all its vices on its back, has been, upon the whole, productive of more good than harm; and if a motion were made to repeal that statute, without putting something more equitable and more efficient in its stead, I would oppose it: so little am I inclined to take the clergy out of the hands of judges and juries. But, my lords, this bill goes to no such effect; it only remedies the iniquity of the bill of Henry the 8th with respect to the penalties of non-residence, and the intolerable rigour of it in the restrictions upon taking in ferm. The statute of Henry the 8th punished non-residence by pecuniary penalties; which were the same, without any discrimination, whatever the means might be of the delinquent to sustain them; and it was therefore unjust; for it is very evident that a penalty of 50*l.* is a much heavier penalty upon a clergyman whose whole income perhaps is not more than 30*l.* per annum, than upon another whose income may be 500*l.* And though in the present state of the church, many allowable causes of non-residence exist, it gave no discretion to judge or jury to mitigate the penalty: nor indeed can such discretion be placed with them, according to the mode of recovering the penalty which that statute prescribes. Now the present bill remedies this iniquity of the old bill, by establishing a scale of penalty justly proportioned to the degree of the delinquency and the means of the delinquent; and it gives a discretionary power to the bishops, of dispensing with residence, and relieving from the penalties of the statute, in cases in which non-residence ought to be indulged. My lords, the present bill, like the original statute of Henry the 8th, being intended to enforce residence in all cases in which there is no reasonable cause of exemption, though it places the clergy under the coercion of the secular courts, withdraws them not from the authority of the bishops: on the contrary, it is a farther object of this bill to strengthen the ecclesiastical authority with regard to residence. In theory the ecclesiastical authority in this point is complete. The power of the bishop goes even to deprive a contumacious non-resident of his benefice. Nevertheless, the exercise of this power is so difficult as to render the power itself almost useless. It is exercised only in the bishops' courts; where the process is so tedious, and may run to such an expense, that few bishops are willing or indeed able, if they have many opulent non-residents to deal with, to engage in it. This bill therefore wisely puts the exercise of this power into the bishop's own hands, without any interference of his court. And, my lords, the length and expensiveness of the proceedings in our courts are not the only considerations which make it expedient that the power should be placed in ourselves personally. In the courts of the archbishop, of the bishops of London, Winchester, Rochester, and all the dioceses which have their courts here in town, justice, I am persuaded, is as regularly administered as in any of his majesty's courts in Westminster-hall; but in the provincial courts, I fear the case is not quite the same, especially in matters in which clergymen are interested; because the judges of those provincial courts are themselves clergymen. When I was bishop of St. David's, I gave one of the best livings in the patronage of that see a rectory in Cardiganshire with a good house upon it, to a clergyman, under the most explicit and solemn promises of residence. When he was in possession of the living, he represented to me, that he had a curacy in Glamorganshire (which indeed I knew to be the case); and he hoped I would not so insist upon his promise, but that I would give him some time to detach himself from his engagements there. The request seemed reasonable; and I told him I would give him half a year. The half year passed away; and my clerk was still upon his curacy in Glamorganshire, and seemed to have made no preparations for fixing himself upon his rectory. I began to suspect that he meant to elude his promise. Another half year was consumed in remonstrances on my part, and shuffling excuses on his; and when I was preparing to come to town for the winter season, I sent for him, and after some warm expostulations with him, I said to him "Sir, take notice, that, if I do not find you in residence upon your living when I return into the country next summer, I shall take measures that may be very disagreeable to you." Upon my return to my diocese the ensuing summer, I found my clerk was not yet in residence: and I caused a process to be instituted against him, in order to his deprivation, in my consistory court. He was up to the business: he took advantage of all the causes of delay which the nature of the proceedings admit; and after a whole twelvemonth's litigation, and some expense incurred, this unprincipled clergyman, through the connivance of my own court, slipped through my fingers; the judge of my court being a non-resident clergyman. This instance shows the expediency of placing the offence of non-residence under the coercion of the bishop himself, in a summary way; as is wisely proposed to be done by this bill.

My lords, another part of the bill goes to release the immoderate rigour of the statute of Henry the 8th in the prohibition upon the clergy of taking in ferm. The whole principle of the bill therefore consists of three parts: it goes to do away the injustice of the statute of Henry the 8th in the part relating to the residence of the clergy, at the same time that it enhances the penalties upon culpable non-residence; it goes to invigorate the episcopal authority; and to give relief in the matter of taking in ferm. The restraints of the statute of Henry the 8th in that matter are most unquestionably extravagant and intolerable. Nevertheless, it is a matter of the first importance to abstract the clergyman from those occupations which would degrade his character in the eye of the laity; it is certainly the ancient constitutions, that a clergyman should be a clergyman, and nothing else. Far be it from me to join my voice to the despicable cant of puritanism; as if it were the duty of a clergyman to withdraw himself entirely from the commerce and society of the world, and that every moment of his time is sinfully employed which is not given up to meditation and prayer, and studies strictly theological. My lords, there is no branch of learning that misbecomes a clergyman: he that would understand the Bible, in such a manner as he ought to understand it who is to expound it, should be deeply skilled, as the writer of a great part of it was, "in all the learning of the Egyptians." I have not scrupled to tell the clergy, ex cathedra, that a clergyman's time is not always misspent when he is studying the proportions of architecture and the divisions of the monichord: for I assert, in contempt and defiance of all the whining cant of Puritans, that there is no branch of abstruse science or polite literature which may not be useful, which may not be even necessary, for the illustration of some part or another of the book which it is our duty to expound. And as to intercourse with the world, I hold that none can be qualified to instruct the world without it: he who is to teach men their duty practically, must know human nature generally, and the particular manners of his country and his times. But, my lords the clergy should be kept apart from those occupations which would degrade them from the rank which they ought to hold in society, and mix them in familiar habits with the inferior orders—from every thing indeed which would give them a lay character. I know that it becomes me to speak tenderly of farming, the fondled bantling of the present times. Agriculture is an occupation for the gods: can the character of a country curate be degraded by his addicting himself to those pursuits which procured divine honours to Ceres and Triptolemus? But, my lords, I beseech you to remember that this godlike occupation of farming will not be taken up by the inferior clergy, if they are allowed to engage in it, in the manner in which some of your lordships apply to it, for your own amusement, for the public benefit and to your own great loss;—they will apply to it as a business, and for gain: the country curate, if he turns farmer, will take part in the labours of husbandry: he will wield the sithe and the sickle; he will fodder the kine, and help to throw out the dung upon his land; and thus he would be associated with the labouring peasantry; even the business of the markets, which he will attend to show his own samples and make his own bargains, will mix him too much in familiar habits with the lower farmers, and thus the whole dignity and sanctity of his character will be obliterated. The restrictions of the old statute are certainly rigorous in the extreme, and require relaxation: but when we come to the consideration of these clauses, I beseech your lordships to take care that the relaxation is not carried beyond the proper limit,—that the new bill does not exceed in indulgence as much as the old one in severity. I do not say positively that this is the case. It is a very difficult subject, and I have not made up my mind; but it is a matter to be well looked to. And this is all that I shall at present say upon that part of the bill.

With respect to the clause which enacts the penalties of non-residence, I have already expressed my approbation of it. I fear indeed that the time of allowed non-residence is longer than it ought to be: I think, with a little ingenuity, the three months will often be turned into six. My lords, this penal clause is followed by another, containing a very long list of cases of exemption—of absolute exemption, without any interposition of that discretionary power of exemption which is given to the bishops in a subsequent part of the bill. Some such exemptions were given by the old bill; and it is certainly proper that they should stand: but many cases are specified, which are either already exempted by the general reservation of the exemptions of the old bill,—and then the enumeration of them nominatim only serves to swell the list of exemptions to the public eye, and to give the country a suspicion that we are inventing all sorts of loopholes for the clergy to creep out at; or if they are not so exempted, they are in my judgment not entitled to this absolute exemption: and many others are added, which are certainly improper. I shall mention one as an example. The situation of a minor canon in any cathedral or collegiate church is made one of the grounds of absolute exemption from the penalties of non-residence upon a benefice. It is true the exemption is only given for the time during which the statutes of the cathedral or collegiate church require the minor canon's attendance, and during which he shall accordingly be in attendance, and performing his duty there; but, my lords, I am informed, that the statutes of the church of St. Paul (and the case may be the same in some other cathedrals, though not in all) require the attendance of every minor canon for the whole year; and yet very considerable livings often fall to the share of these minor canons. Now, if a minor canon of St. Paul's were to obtain a living of 12 or 1,300*l.* a year in the diocese of London, and the bishop were to say to him that he ought to be resident upon his great living, though it should oblige him to relinquish his situation in the church of St. Paul's and to give up the petty emolument of his office there,—is it fit that this minor canon should have it to say to the bishop of London, “No, my lord: here I am, a minor canon in your lordship's cathedral; I cling to my stall; and without your lordship's permission to be absent from my living, I defy the penal statute.” My lords, in this situation is the bishop of London placed by this clause with respect to a minor canon of his own cathedral.—This clause is followed by another, which gives the bishop of every diocese a discretionary power of granting a licence of non-residence for a certain time, in certain enumerated cases, but in certain enumerated cases only. Then follows the clause of enumeration; which is very full; it contains no case which may not be a fair ground of exemption. But, I do strongly object to this principle of enumeration. I apprehend, that the enumeration will have the effect of an advertisement to the clergy of all the pretences upon which they may come to the bishop, and tease him for a licence. I will illustrate this by an example. One of the cases in which a licence of non-residence may be granted is illness or infirmity of body of the incumbent himself, his wife or child;—certainly a most reasonable case. If his own health require the assistance of the air or water of some particular place, it would be very hard that he should not be allowed to remove to that place for a time; and if the ill health of wife or child require such assistance, it would be cruel not to give the husband or father liberty of accompanying them. Highly as I think of the duty of residence, it never should have divided me from a sick wife or a sick child; and a restraint to which I would not submit myself, I would not have imposed on others. But see, what may be the consequence of advertising this as one of the cases entitled to indulgence; see what pretences may be set up on the ground of this advertisement. I suppose a clergyman in affluent circumstances, with a sprightly wife and child, has long been resident on a country living; the lady is grown perfectly sick of this sequestered situation: she says to her husband “My dear, we have been a long time in this dismal place; surely you might get a licence of non-residence for some time; I am dreadfully nervous, you know; you are overloaded with bile; and the poor child is ricketty: Bath would set us all up: ask the bishop for a licence.” The husband, perhaps, is a little bashful: he has taken, to be sure, a great deal of rhubarb; the lady never goes through the day without ether: and the child is perpetually swallowing something to strengthen its limbs; but yet he is conscious that there is no such degree of disease among them as would justify him in a request to be non-resident, especially as his situation is a very healthy one; he is unwilling therefore to make the application. “Pho!” says the lady “you are so conscientious! Leave it to me to manage: I will speak to the bishop's lady; she is as nervous as I am, and will take my part from fellow-feeling: I warrant you we shall prevail upon the bishop, who is himself a good-natured man, if you will but get over your foolish scruples, and sign the petition.” The man is prevailed upon: the petition is signed; the apothecary of the village can, with a very safe conscience, make affidavit of the ill health of the family; knowing that he has supplied them with medicines in a quantity sufficient to make them all sick if they were not so before hand: The bishop is besieged with the solicitations of the lady and all her friends, among whom his own lady is one of the warmest; and he must muster up a great deal of resolution to stand the siege. And all this inconvenience arises from what I call the advertisement; for, without that, the indulgence might be granted to real ill health; but these solicitations upon the pretence of ill health would not have been invited. My lords, I would propose that the bishop should have this power of licensing, without any enumeration of cases, in every case which in his judgment should be entitled to the indulgence. But, much more than to the clause itself, I object to the proviso annexed to it. It is provided, that if, in any of the enumerated cases, the bishop shall refuse to grant a licence to the clergyman petitioning for it, the clergyman may appeal to the archbishop of the province; who is empowered to grant the licence which the bishop has thought proper to refuse. An appeal, my lords! from what? The licence of non-residence is no matter of right; it is a favour. I understand the propriety of an appeal from a judicial sentence where rights are in question; but I do not understand the propriety of an appeal when a favour only is denied. The clergyman is to go to the archbishop, and say, "My bishop has refused me a favour which I asked: make him grant it." My lords, the appeal given in this case to the archbishop, I assert to be unconstitutional in the highest degree: it invests the archbishop with the ordinary government of every diocese in his province, in matters merely spiritual; in which he has no right to interfere beyond the limits of his own proper diocese. In any other diocese, the archbishop's authority is merely visitatorial; he possesses not an atom of ordinary jurisdiction; and ought not to be introduced to it. My lords, I desire to know in what instance the archbishop is authorized to interfere in the administration of any other diocese than his own, in spirituals. If I refuse to ordain a candidate for holy orders, he has no remedy by appeal to the archbishop. It is true, it is my duty, in such a case, to acquaint the archbishop with my refusal of the candidate, and my reason for refusing him; and to transmit to the archbishop all the testimonials of character and papers of form that were produced to me: not that the archbishop has any power to revise what I have done; but for this purpose,—that the archbishop may send a circular letter to all the other bishops of the province, informing them that such a person has been refused by such a bishop, and requesting that no one of them would ordain him without consulting himself the archbishop or the bishop who first refused. The very terms in which these circular letters are conceived, imply the independence of the bishops in the matter; for the archbishop neither commands me to ordain nor forbids any other to ordain, but advises every other not to proceed to ordination without a consultation. My lords, if a clergyman comes to me with a presentation to a living in my diocese, and I refuse him institution, he has no appeal to the archbishop. The patron has his writ of quare impedit in the secular courts,—and very properly: the clerk has no appeal to the archbishop, because institution is a branch of the voluntary jurisdiction in spirituals in which the archbishop has no share; but the patron has his remedy in the king's courts, because his temporal rights are affected. In short, my lords, there is no instance in which the archbishop can meddle with the voluntary jurisdiction. In the contentious jurisdiction in causes between parties agitated in the bishop's court, an appeal certainly lies to the archbishop; and in all such cases, an ulterior appeal lies to the king in chancery,—and very properly; because all this jurisdiction arises out of the civil establishment, and antecedent to establishments was not inherent in the spiritual society as such; but in the voluntary jurisdiction—in matters purely spiritual, there is no authority in any diocese beyond the bishop's; and the attempt to introduce a superior authority, in this instance, is a most outrageous violation of the ecclesiastical constitution,—not merely the particular constitution of the church of this kingdom, but the constitution of the church Catholic, by which every bishop in his own diocese is supreme. And, my lords, this is a matter of no light consideration. The attempted innovation is most dangerous; for ecclesiastical history bears me out in the assertion, that the whole superstructure of the papal tyranny arose out of encroachments and usurpations, small as they seemed in their beginnings, of metropolitans and patriarchs, upon the independent authority of bishops. My lords, I am aware that upon this point some of my reverend brethren have an opinion different from mine. I know that one very learned prelate, whose deep erudition and great talents are far above any praise of mine, to whom I bear the greatest personal regard, and whose opinions are entitled to your lordships' gravest consideration,—I know or have reason at least to believe, that this reverend prelate will tell your lordships, that an archbishop in his opinion, stands related to the bishops of his province just as a bishop stands related to his parish priests; and that the bishop is bound by his oath of canonical obedience to the archbishop, just as the parish priest is bound by his oath of canonical obedience to the bishop. My lords, if the analogy were perfect,—which—in my judgment it is not, it would make for my opinion rather than for his. My lords, the bishop when once he has instituted a rector or vicar, or licensed a perpetual curate to a parish church, has nothing more to do with the cure of souls in that parish; he commits that cure to the priest, and it is entirely gone from himself; and he has no right to interfere with it, otherwise than by his visitatorial authority, to see that the priest in the exercise of it conforms to the laws of the church and the realm. If the priest does any thing contrary to either, the bishop, as visitor, has a right to admonish him; and if admonition is ineffectual, to punish him by ecclesiastical censures and penalties: but no otherwise can he interfere in the cure of souls with which he has invested the priest. To him he commits the care and government of the souls of the parishioners; saving, indeed, to himself and his successors his episcopal rights. Now what are the episcopal rights which are so reserved?—I say, the whole of the visitatorial power; and besides, the right of making use of the church for the performance of some rites which a bishop only can perform; but these make no part of the parochial cure of souls. The bishop has a right to go to the parish church when he thinks proper, to confirm the parishioners, and persons of other parishes, whom he may think proper to call to that church to receive confirmation: he has a right to interfere in some matters without expressly holding a visitation: if the priest takes upon him to repel any person from the holy communion, without consulting the bishop upon the case,—if he takes upon him to reconcile a convert from the church of Rome, and to receive his public recantation, without the permission of the bishop,—if he introduces a curate to take a share with him in the cure of souls,—without the bishop's licence,—these are offences which the bishop may correct: but these are extraordinary cases; making no part of the general parochial cure of souls,—which the bishop is to control and direct so that every thing may be done in order, but he cannot take the exercise of it upon himself: and just so, I say, an archbishop has a visitatorial authority over the bishops of his province, but no right to interfere with them in the exercise of the voluntary jurisdiction over their clergy. And I apprehend that the mistake arises from confounding the voluntary and the contentious jurisdiction. In the contentious jurisdiction which is exercised in the bishop's court, in causes between party and party, an appeal is always open to the archbishop's court, and an ulterior appeal to the king in chancery; and this extends to the bishop's government of his clergy, so far as it is exercised in his court. If a clergyman upon any offence committed, be libelled in the bishop's court, pro salute animæ, an appeal lies from the sentence; because the whole power of the court arises out of the civil establishment of the church, and the very court itself is a creature of the secular authority. But the case is quite otherwise with respect to that voluntary jurisdiction which is exercised by the bishop personally without his court; which is inherent in the episcopal office and character, by the constitution of the church catholic, antecedent to all alliances between church and state.

With respect to the oath, the bishop is certainly bound by it to the archbishop as much as the priest to the bishop; as much, I say, my lords, but not more. And what is the obedience to which the oath binds either?—Not to an indefinite, unlimited, but to canonical obedience,—to no obedience beyond canonical. And I say, that a submission to the archbishop, in the exercise of my voluntary jurisdiction in my own diocese, is no part of the obedience which I owe the archbishop by virtue of my oath. But, my lords, I must observe, that the relation between the archbishop and bishop, and the relation between bishop and parish-priest, are materially different. The parish-priest derives his whole power of cure of souls from the bishop: the bishop confers it on him by institution, or, in the case of a perpetual curate, by licence; but in either case it comes from the bishop solely. But a bishop owes not a particle of his diocesan authority to the archbishop: the archbishop neither confers nor can he withhold it, although he has a limited control over it. In England, the diocesan authority is conferred by the election of the clergy of the cathedral church: it is that election which makes the bishop of the diocese. It is true, that election is so controlled and directed by the king, as supreme head of the national church, that it seems to be little more than a mere form; for when the clergy of the cathedral are impowered to proceed to election, by the congé d'élire, their choice is directed to a particular person recommended by the king. In effect, therefore, it is from the king that the bishop receives his diocesan authority; the election of the clergy of the cathedral being only the form by which the king gives it: but the archbishop has no share in the giving of it. It is true, the election is followed by a proceeding in the archbishop's court, which is called the confirmation of the bishop elect: but this is not a proceeding by which the archbishop confers the diocesan authority; it is merely a revision of the proceedings in the business of the election, to see that all has been done in due form and order, without any such irregularity as would render the election ab initio a nullity. Inquiry is also made into the character of the bishop elect; to see that he is a person in public reputation, and, in the tenor of his life, fit to be advanced to so high a station in the church. And when it is found that all has been regularly done, and that the life and character of the bishop elect are unimpeachable, the judge of the archbishop's court pronounces that he is duly elected,—that is, duly invested with the diocesan authority. But that sentence does not invest him; it declares only that he is invested.—In another part of the United Kingdom, the bishop is invested with his diocesan authority immediately by the king's letter patent, without any previous election of the clergy of the cathedral, or any subsequent confirmation of the archbishop. In both parts of the kingdom, therefore, the bishop derives the whole of his diocesan authority—in the one both in form and effect, in the other in effect though not in form—solely from the king; not an atom of it from the archbishop. Then for our temporalities, and all our secular authorities and prerogatives, in both parts of the kingdom, we hold them solely of the crown.—Then, my lords, what part of our diocesan authority do we derive from the archbishop?—Certainly not an atom of it. We derive only from him the power of order: which is given by consecration, and can be given in no other way; no secular power can give it. But the power of order is the spiritual capacity of exercising those sacred functions which none without that power can perform. And this power of order is always described by the canonists as a distinct thing from the diocesan authority: and it is distinct, and indeed in its nature is a higher thing: Christ first gave it to the apostles; the apostles conveyed it to others; and those only who have derived it from the apostles in perpetual succession have power still to convey it. But it is so distinct from diocesan authority, that the power of order may be possessed (and in some instances is possessed) without a particle of diocesan authority; and diocesan authority might be conferred on a person not having the power of order; though such a person, without the power of order, could not perform any one of the sacred functions of a bishop. The bishop, therefore,—which is the great point that I am anxious to prove,—derives no part of his diocesan authority from the archbishop. The contentious jurisdiction in every diocese arises out of the civil establishment, and is properly subject to appeal; but the bishop of every diocese has a power, which is called the voluntary jurisdiction, which is of higher origin and earlier date than any civil establishment; which the archbishop, beyond the limits of his own proper diocese, has no right to take into his own hands; except in extraordinary cases,—namely, vacancy of a see, when it devolves to him for the time, as guardian of the spiritualities; and when, for the purpose of visiting his province, he inhibits the bishops for a short time. And I contend, that the power of appeal proposed to be given by this bill would mix the archbishop, in the ordinary jurisdiction of every diocese in his province, in the voluntary branch, in a manner in which he ought not to mix in it; and would be a violent infringement of the independence of the bishops.

But, my lords, dismissing this ground of objection, I might argue against this appeal simply from the impolicy of it; and perhaps some of your lordships may allow more weight to this argument than to the other. My lords, I say, that this appeal lays the ground of much ill-humour between the bishops and their clergy, and the archbishops and the bishops; and is likely either to defeat the purposes of the bill, or will be nugatory. If the archbishop, in the exercise of the power given to him, should pin his faith upon the bishop (which is the course most likely to be taken), and say "I will not grant what the bishop has refused; I will confirm his refusals," then the appeal is nugatory. If, on the other hand, the archbishop should be very alert in the exercise of this new unconstitutional authority with which the bill improperly invests him, I think any bishop that finds himself interfered with will be apt to say to his clergy "I will have nothing more to do with this business: I will license none of you: go to the archbishop, and he may license you all, if it so please him;" and then the purpose of the bill will be pretty much defeated. — But noble lords may say "What then is your plan? Would you give every bishop a power within his diocese of licensing at his pleasure, without any check upon him in the exercise of that large discretion?" My lords, my plan would be this: I would propose to your lordships, that every bishop should be empowered to grant licences within his own diocese, in every case which should seem in his judgment entitled to the indulgence: but then he should be required to set forth in every licence the cause of granting it; and, besides, he should be obliged to transmit to the archbishop, on or before a day to be fixed by the act in every year, a report of all the licences granted by him in the year preceding; specifying not only the names of the clergy, and the names of the benefices in respect of which they shall have been granted, but the time for which each has been granted, and the causes of granting: and this report, with the addition of his own proper diocese, the archbishop should be required to transmit to the king in chancery. And this, I maintain, would be a severer check upon the bishops, in the exercise of their discretionary power of dispensation, than any the bill imposes in its present shape; because it makes the acts of the bishop public and notorious. My lords, what is the security for the proper conduct of any public men in the exercise of any discretionary powers with which they may be invested? What is the security for a judge's just exercise of his discretionary powers? The security is this, and nothing else,—that the judge is a public man, in a great conspicuous station, and that nothing that he does is done in a corner: my lords, this is the security you have for the discretion of a judge. The very same you have for the discretion of a bishop: a bishop is a person holding a conspicuous situation in the country, high in rank, and vested with great authority; and the jealous eye of the public is upon him and upon all his actions.—But, my lords, it may be said, that cases may occur when the cause of granting cannot with propriety be set forth in the licence,—cases in which it may be fit that a licence should be granted, and yet the cause of granting may be unfit to be told. A clergyman may be disqualified for duty; or even his absence may be made a matter of necessity, by reason of some disorder which it would be cruel to divulge. Other cases may occur, hardly fit to be mentioned here. But for these cases the bill has in my judgment very wisely and properly provided. Here I consent that the archbishop should be called in,—not by way of appeal; but, as this bill calls him in, to confirm any licence granted by the bishop when the cause of granting cannot be set forth; without which confirmation, such licence should be void.—My lords, in that part of the bill which gives the bishops a summary exercise of the ecclesiastical authority, I shall request your lordships to attend carefully to the structure of the clauses, to see that they are so drawn as really to go to the effect intended. And this is all I shall say at present upon that part of the bill.

Debate on the Budget.] June 13. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means,

Mr. Chancellor Addington rose to bring forward the Budget. He said, that in consistency with the assurances, which the House had given his majesty of support in the present contest, it now behoved them to make the efforts which were necessary for that purpose. We are, said he, called on to summon all our fortitude, and to put forth all our force; but, to make these efforts, we must submit to great privations, and unusual inconveniences; to make even great and extensive sacrifices. We had an enemy to contend with who had calculated the means as well as the circumstances of our exertions. It was therefore necessary for us to be prepared, not only for a vigorous but for a protracted contest. This was a system which was not less consistent with the calculation of the coldest prudence, than due to the fortitude and wisdom of a great and powerful people. It was upon opinions such as these, and with reference to such a system as that to which he had adverted, that he felt it his duty to propose the plan which he was now about to submit to the committee. The following were the various items of the supply:

Ways and Means.

The means of providing this sum will consist of three parts. The taxes voted annually—The growing produce of the consolidated fund, and issue of Exchequer bills; and lastly, an augmentation of the duties of Excise and Customs, and a separate tax on property. The Ways and Means will be as follows:—

|----------------------------------|-----------|
| Land and Malt voted annually ..  | 2,750,000 |
| Exchequer Bills .....            | 3,000,000 |
| Surplus of the Consolidated Fund | 6,500,000 |

|----------------------------------------------------------|-----------|
| Exchequer Bills on aids of 1804 ..                       | 1,500,000 |
| Money in Treasury, residue of Bounties on Hemp, &c ..... | 37,782    |
| Lottery .....                                            | 400,000   |

I now come to the Ways and Means by which I propose to raise the amount of the sum which I have stated to be necessary for the service of the year. The three great objects to which I look as the sources of this revenue are the Excise and Custom Duties, on which I intend to submit to the Committee a large augmentation; and a tax upon property. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I consider these duties as applicable to war only, and I intend to propose that they should cease within six months after the restoration of peace.

CUSTOMS.

IMPORTS.—An increased Duty on Sugar imported, of 20 per cent on the duty now paid, and an increased duty of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the duty now paid on other goods imported; with the exception of Cotton-Wool, Tea, and Wine .....

EXPORTS.—On all Articles exported to any part of Europe, a duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, and, to any other part of the world, a duty of 3 per cent ad valorem .....

On Cotton-Wool exported 1 penny in the lb. ....

Tonnage.—An additional duty on Tonnage .....

Deduct increase of drawbacks ..

Produce of Customs .....

EXCISE.

Tea.—An additional 15 per cent ad valorem on the lower sorts, and 45 per cent ad valorem on the higher .....

Wine.—An additional duty of 10*l.* per Pipe .....

Spirits.—50 per cent on the present duty on all Foreign and British Spirits .....

RENTS AND FUNDS.

A Tax of 1 Shilling in the Pound on the actual rent of all land in England, to be paid by the land owner, and 9d. in the Pound, to be paid by the tenant. In Scotland, the tenant to pay only 6d. in the pound. Besides this a tax of 5 per cent on the nett produce of all trades and professions; and also of 5 per cent upon the dividends due on the public funds, except upon such dividends as are due to Foreigners residing out of this country ..... 4,500,000

With regard to that species of property arising from government securities, I know perfectly well the delicacy which has always been felt upon this subject, but I am sure that it will not be expected, at the present time, that that kind of property should not be called upon to bear its share in the general contribution. The question now is, not what species of property shall be exempted, but in what proportion each species shall contribute? It certainly is intended that this kind of property shall be made contributory, though it is not in every instance. I mean, however, now to propose, that all persons possessing property in the funds shall be required to make returns to commissioners by whom this bill is to be carried into execution. These commissioners will not be all of them resident in London, as under the income bill, but they will be appointed in different parts of the country. They are to have the same powers for certain purposes as the commercial commissioners. All persons having property in the funds are to lay their accounts before these commissioners; and if they do not do it before a certain day, they will be held to have made their election, in which case provision is made that they shall be charged in another way. It will be understood that no person can be charged except according to the first provisions to which I have alluded, unless it is by his own choice. If the persons do not make their returns to the commissioners at a proper time, then, and in that case only, the provisions are to be executed at the Bank. All agents for Foreigners, and persons not being British subjects, having property in the funds will be exempted: the Committee will feel that they could not with justice have been included in this impost. When I say foreigners, I mean those not resident in England. I shall now, for the sake of clearness, give a summary recapitulation of the taxes.

|--------------------------------|------------|
| On the Custom Duties .....     | 2,000,000  |
| On the Excise Duties .....     | 6,000,000  |
| On the Land and Property ..... | 4,500,000  |

The committee, however, must be aware, that though parliament may determine to raise so large a part of the supplies for the service of the year, yet it must be obvious, that a very considerable part of this sum cannot be raised within the present year, I will, therefore, only calculate the sum to be produced by these taxes in this year at 4,500,000*l.* there would then remain, 10,000,000*l.* to be provided for the service of the present year; this sum must be raised by way of loan, and I have this day entered into an agreement with some respectable bankers of the city of London, for a loan of 12,000,000*l.*, 10,000,000*l.* of which was for England, on the following terms:—For every 100*l.* 80*l.* 3 per cent consols, which at 58½, the price of Saturday, would be 46*l.* 14*s.*—80*l.* reduced at the same price, 46*l.* 14*s.* The bidding was upon the long annuities; they were taken at 6*s.* 5*d.* which at 17 years and a half purchase, was 5*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* The discount was 2*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* which made the whole amount 101*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* The bonus to the contractors is therefore 1*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* and the interest to be paid by the public, 5*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* per cent. I have to congratulate the House, that, under such circumstances, so beneficial a bargain has been made. I have now to state the means by which I propose to provide for the interest of the loan. For Great Britain, which amounts to 480,000*l.* to which add the charges for management, and one per cent for the sinking fund 190,000*l.* And the whole sum to be provided for will be 670,589*l.* This sum I propose to raise by an increase of the duties on certain articles of the customs, which I calculate will amount to 250,000*l.* The increase in consequence of the consolidation of the assessed taxes will amount to 220,000*l.* But there will still be a considerable sum wanting. The measure by which I propose to make it up is one which has often been recommended. I mean a change in the mode of collecting the receipt tax. I mean to propose, that in all cases where money is to be paid, it shall be competent for the person paying to demand a stamp from him who is paid. The price of the stamp used, it is intended, shall bear a very minute relation to the sum paid; but that in no one instance shall it be less than 2*d.* or more than 5*s.* The produce of this regulation I estimate at 220,000*l.* Those three sources of revenue will produce 690,000*l.* applicable to the payment of the above 670,589*l.* being the amount of the interest and expenses on the loan. Having recapitulated the different heads of Supply and Ways and Means, the right hon. gentleman continued: The committee will perceive, that the great object I have in view is to raise a large part of the supplies within the year. The extent to which I wish to carry this principle is this, that there shall be no increase whatever of the public debt during the course of the war. In the first place, it will be necessary to ascertain the probable amount of the annual charges of the war, and then to make provisions for carrying on a vigorous and even protracted contest, without making any greater addition to the public debt than what will be annually liquidated by the sinking fund. The annual charge of the war, unless demands should be made upon us by the intervention of foreign powers who may wish to make a common cause with us, I think will not exceed 26,000,000*l.* I do not mean to deny, that this is an enormous sum, but not greater than the object for which we have to contend. If then the House think fit to adopt the measure I am proposing, if I am right in my estimate of the growing produce of the consolidated fund, which I have considered at six millions, and if my calculation of the annual taxes be correct, which I have estimated at 12,500,000*l.* but which for this purpose I will only take at 10,000,000*l.* there will only remain a sum of 6,000,000*l.* to be borrowed, which will be more than covered by the sinking fund which now produces considerably more than six millions. The growing produce of the consolidated fund is also likely to increase, unless we are again visited by those calamities with which the country has been afflicted. If then my calculations are correct, we shall be enabled to meet a war expenditure of 26 millions without any increase of the public debt, an object so desirable that no difference of opinion can be entertained upon the subject. I trust therefore, this system will be adopted; it is one which has been before tried, and of which the effect is known; it has inspired confidence at home and created respect abroad. But the pecuniary effect is not all; it will be a difference in another respect, the difference between a temporary and a permanent tax: it will have another effect also, that of convincing the enemy that it is hopeless for him to contend with our finances: it will have a still farther effect, that of convincing the other powers of Europe, that they may safely join with us in the common cause of resistance against the common enemy, for that the resources of this country are such as to give full security for the punctual discharge of any engagement it may enter into, and this is an object for which I have in view some provisions. I desire the committee to look at the mode adopted for raising the supplies for the service of the year; they will find on land a considerable duty imposed, as well as upon personal property. They will find at an early period of our history, taxes were raised within the year on all descriptions of property, descending even to the wages of servants. To illustrate this, I will refer to the times of William and Anne, when the funding system was first introduced: let it be recollected, that then not only 4*s.* in the pound on land was imposed, but also 50*s.* per cent on stock in trade, 5*s.* on all salaries, offices, perquisites or pensions: 4*s.* in the pound on all annuities and sions, and all persons of any profession were charged 4*s.* in the pound for that which was received or got by any practices, or emolument whatsoever. It is to be recollected, that these times, although they were arduous, and the object for which they were then contending was considerable, yet they were minor to the objects which we have now in view, and therefore the exertions which we now make, ought to be so much the greater. That was a great and a glorious period in the history of this country, but not so great as the present, the contest being very different; for the present contest is for the existence of this country as a free state, and the question now is, whether we shall maintain and support that existence, or whether we shall abandon the people of this land as a prey to the French? Our prospects with regard to revenue are most flattering. It has been increasing progressively from 1792 to 1803. In 1792 the permanent taxes were 14,260,000*l.* but on the 5th of April 1803, they were 15,994,000*l.* But this is not all, the permanent taxes which were imposed during the war have been productive in an equal degree. We have besides this, the benefit of the operation of that great system that sheet anchor of this country, the system which has been long adopted for the gradual reduction of the debt, which is a capital operation for the benefit of the public, an operation which carries with it this singular advantage, that it executes its purposes for our relief in proportion to our pressure, and if the system which I am about to recommend shall be adopted, we shall not only provide for our expenditure within the year, but shall have a gradual diminution, even during the war, of the public debt. Now, I apprehend that in the support of such a system, all descriptions and classes of the community are interested. I have, therefore, thought it incumbent on me to propose such modes for raising the supplies, as are likely to be effectual, even though I know part of them will bear hard on that part of the community which I should most rejoice to spare. For the question now is (and every peasant in the country is convinced of it, as well as those of the highest rank), whether Great Britain shall continue her present power and estimation in the scale of nations, or make an item in the catalogue of the conquests of France: I have therefore a confident expectation, that all classes of the community will see the necessity of our preparing not only for a vigorous, but for a protracted war. It has been expected, whenever application is made to the liberality of parliament for large supplies, that something should be said on the conduct of government. I am aware, however, that the committee will not expect from me many declarations on this subject. I feel it a duty to make great exertion. I trust it will appear, upon a full examination of the conduct of government, that ministers have not been negligent. I will not expatiate on what ministers intend to do, but I will say generally, it is their wish to avoid extremes; to avoid any thing that may endanger our honour—not to plunge the nation into a war of extermination, nor to submit to any humiliation; to hold out that we enter into the war with reluctance, but have no fear of the issue: that ministers ask assistance, not because they wish to go to war, but because we are at war; and that we are at war because we cannot be at peace; that our object is peace on fair and honourable terms; but that we have no means of obtaining peace but by great exertions in support of war: this is the principle on which we appeal to the patriotism of parliament. We are acting on a principle of firmness, for the support of the dignity of the king and the true interests of his people; we will endeavour to maintain dignity without arrogance, and to show moderation without pusillanimity. After some farther observations, the right hon. gentleman proposed his several resolutions, which were agreed to.

The King's Message relative to the Batavian Republic.] June 17. Lord Hawkesbury presented the following Message from his Majesty.

“GEORGE R.

“His majesty thinks it right to inform the House of Commons, that, from an anxious desire to prevent the calamities of war being extended to the Batavian republic, he communicated to that government his disposition to respect their neutrality, provided that a similar disposition was manifested on the part of the French government, and that the French forces were forthwith withdrawn from the territories of the Batavian republic: this proposition not having been admitted by the government of France, and measures having been recently taken by them in direct violation of the independence of the Batavian republic, his majesty judged it expedient to direct his minister to leave the Hague; and he has since given orders that letters of marque and general reprisals should be issued against the Batavian republic and its subjects.

“His majesty has at all times manifested the deepest and most lively interest for the prosperity and independence of the United Provinces; he has recourse therefore to these proceedings with the most sincere regret, but the conduct of the French government has left him no alternative; and in adopting these measures, he is actuated by a sense of what is due to his own dignity, and to the security and essential interest of his dominions. G. R.

The King's Message relative to the Defence of the Country.] June 18. The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented the following Message from his Majesty:

“GEORGE R.

“His majesty thinks it proper to acquaint the House of Commons, that, for the more effectual defence and security of the United Kingdom, against the avowed designs of the enemy, and for the purpose of providing such means as may be best calculated for a vigorous prosecution of the war, his majesty deems it important that a large additional force should be forthwith raised and assembled.

"His majesty recommends this subject to the consideration of his faithful Commons; and relies with confidence on their zeal and public spirit, that they will adopt such measures as, upon this occasion, shall appear to them to be most effectual, and for carrying the same into execution with the least possible delay. G. R."

Debate on the King's Message relative to the Defence of the Country.] June 20. The House having resolved itself into a committee on the King's Message relative to the Defence of the Country,

The Secretary at War said, that what he had at present to submit to the committee was, the mode proposed for raising an additional force for operations offensive, as well as defensive, against the enemy. There were two points to which the subject was reducible; first, that the force provided should be equal to an effectual and powerful defence; and, secondly, the disposable force which we should have for offensive operations. It was the duty of parliament to attend to both our naval and military defence; and that must be done with reference to the strength and resources of the enemy in various quarters from which they might have an opportunity of annoying us. Our preparations must also be made with reference, not only to the government, but to the singular character of the present governor, who disposed despotically of the immense power of France. In ordinary times, and under regular and established governments, nay even during the late war, a force of 140,000 men was deemed sufficient, with the strength of our immense navy co-operating, to enable us to look with contempt on the threats of our enemies. They would still be sufficient for home defence; for he made little doubt but the army which would attempt to invade us would be sent to the bottom of the sea before they could arrive, or be dashed to pieces by the cannon of those who would be opposed to them. When he looked to the promises made to the first consul by the different provinces of France, and by his military coadjutors, he could only smile at their audacity; at the same time, he made little doubt, from Buonaparté's character, that the attempt would be made. The officers, however, who offered themselves for this service, and wished to follow the "triumphant" banners, as they called it, of their chief, would find the passage of the British channel far more tremendous than that of the river Styx.

"Alligat, & novies Styx interfusa coerceset."

The vengeance which the first consul meditated against this country was now clearly and distinctly traced, and nothing would ultimately satisfy him but the degradation of England, to enable him, by the destruction of the power and the interests of this country, easily to effect the slavery of Europe. The first consul possessed those properties that would never suffer him to be at rest. But however violent his animosity, ready as he professed himself to be, to sacrifice fleet after fleet, and thousands after thousands, to his views of ambition and vain glory, and however we might despise his threats, it was not the less necessary to make additional reinforcements, to convince him that his enterprise would be more perilous than he might have conceived it. In this case, what he meant to propose to the committee was, that there should be raised an army of reserve of 50,000 men, of which 34,000 should be levied in England, 10,000 in Ireland, and 6,000 in Scotland. That army of reserve would leave a disposable regular force, and place the country in a complete state of security. From our present situation, it must inevitably happen that we should have great naval success; but it must be confessed that the military system hitherto pursued was by no means proportioned to the power, strength, and the grandeur of the country. It was therefore necessary that a new system should be adopted, but that would be best resorted to in a time of quiet and tranquillity. The first consideration was, that the force proposed should be levied as speedily and be made as efficient as possible. The second was, that the army of reserve should serve, whether English, Scotch, or Irish, in any part of the united kingdom to which they may be ordered, and also the islands of the channel, such as Jersey and Guernsey. As to the arrangements, there were three points to which he wished to direct the attention of the committee. 1st, That all persons should be liable to serve, from the age of 18 to 45 years, who were to be officered by persons properly qualified from knowledge and experience. 2ndly, That their extent of service should be Great Britain, Ireland, and the islands of the channel. And, 3rdly, that, instead of during the war, their time of service should be limited to four years. The grounds of the plan were different from those pursued in 1797; nor were the troops to be considered on the same footing with the volunteer force then raised and officered by themselves. He gave great praise to the zeal and patriotism of these corps; but their officers could not be considered so effective as men whose habits and education afforded them more knowledge and experience. We had already 72,965 militia, and officers of the description alluded to could not be found for them. The additional force of 50 battalions would be officered from the half-pay list; where those might fail, recourse would be had to officers in the marines; in the third case, officers would be selected who had been in the service of the East India company; in the fourth case, which supposed the failure of the former classes, those officers would be chosen from the fencible regiments who served with so much distinction and honour to themselves in Ireland. The fifth resort would be, to officers in the recruiting service. He would abstain from entering into the consideration of Irish and English regiments serving indiscriminately in either country. They had already shown that no legal compulsion was necessary; and that reciprocity which he proposed of mutual defence, could not, he supposed, be liable to the smallest objection. The substitutes in both countries would have to serve, instead of five years, as heretofore, only four years; or one month after the ratification of peace. He then enumerated the proportions that should be raised by the counties and cities, comparing them with the force raised during the last and former wars, and concluded with exulting in the strength and security which the united kingdom had to rely on, upon considering that, in Great Britain and Ireland, there would be an army of 112,000 for internal defence, leaving a strong disposable force for offensive operations. Upon the whole, however, he said, it would not be more at the commencement of the present than at some periods of the last war. The burthens to be imposed would necessarily be very heavy; but they would be cheerfully borne when it was considered that it was to avoid the most horrible state of slavery and submission to foreign tyranny that any country had ever experienced. The arrangements then were, that all males from 18 to 45 years of age were liable to be drawn by ballot. In the plan for raising a supplementary militia, he found that peers were not exempted, and it was proposed on this occasion to follow the same rule. The exemptions were to extend only to officers in the army and navy, and those apprentices whose indentures had been executed before the 5th of June, when his majesty's message was delivered. He was firmly convinced, from the spirit already manifested, that the country would feel that these measures, with whatever inconvenience they might be attended, were no more than were necessary to carry on the war with success and glory. It was requisite to have a large disposable force to co-operate with our powerful navy. France was vulnerable at some points, to which he only wished to allude; and while we had such a disposable force, the first consul would find himself obliged, with all his blustering to look to his own preservation. His first motion would be, for an address to his majesty, thanking him for his gracious communication, and assuring him of the utmost support. He should next move for leave to bring in a bill, or bills, "to enable his Majesty more effectually to raise and assemble an Additional Military Force for the better defence and security of the United Kingdom, and for the more vigorous prosecution of the War."—The motion for the Address was agreed to nem. con. On the motion for leave to bring in the bill,

Mr. Windham said:—Sir, the right hon. gentleman has introduced this measure in a manner perfectly suitable to the solemnity of the occasion. I wish the measure itself had been equally suitable to the manner of its introduction, or to the circumstances out of which it has arisen. But, alas! it has fallen miserably short both of the occasion and of the expectation which I had allowed myself to form of it. Instead of helping us out of our difficulties, it serves only to confirm a most material part of them, and for the rest, to give us but very imperfect and inadequate assistance. This grand measure of which so much expectation has been raised, turns out, at last, to be nothing more than a mere addition to the militia, with all the evils incident to that system. In addition to 70,000 men raised or raising according to that system upon the population of Great Britain, and of 18,000 so raised in Ireland, we are now to have 10,000 more for Ireland and 40,000 for Great Britain, making in the whole the number of 138,000, of which 18,000 (the original militia in Ireland), are to be raised by bounty in the first instance, and the rest to be raised by ballot, with the privilege of exemption from personal service, on the condition of finding a substitute. Does any man dream after this, that it is possible for Great Britain to have an army? The hope is utterly childish. The recruiting of the British army has, as every body knows, long stood still. An army not recruited must, by degrees, waste away. In spite of all the hopes, which some may indulge of transferring men hereafter by new bounties from the force thus raised to the regular army,—the army must unavoidably stand still for the present, and one may venture to say, under the influence of such a system is not likely to be again put in motion. This, therefore, is my fundamental objection to this measure, that it destroys all hope, now and hereafter, of a force truly regular,—that it completely cuts up the army. This it effects, not so much by the raising of so many men, but, by admitting the principle of substitution. That a compulsory levy cannot be made without a power of commutation of some sort or other, I am ready to allow. The grievance would be utterly intolerable. But I hoped that another mode might have been adopted, namely, that of commutation of service for a fixed fine; which fine should be paid not into the hands of the corps for the purpose of being laid out in providing a substitute, with all the effect which such an additional demand must have in raising the rate of the bounty, but should be paid to government, to be employed by them in any way they should think proper, or, if you choose to give it an appropriation, for the providing a recruit for the army. The great point is, to abolish the present competition, under which it is impossible that the army can stand; and with this view, my meaning would certainly be, not merely to abolish this competition so far as it would arise from the body now proposed to be raised, but universally for the whole of the militia, old or new. There should be no recruiting but for the army. The militia, and every force raised by ballot should consist of nothing but the balloted men, so far as they would go. To insure the service of them, as far as I could, I would impose a fine; but I would sooner leave the service incomplete, than, in order to complete it, introduce that fatal principle of substitution; wrong in a constitutional view if that were now worth attending to, but far more wrong and perfectly fatal from the effect which it must have of destroying all possibility of recruiting the army.—That it is the militia system, extended as it has been of late years and changed, as it is, in its nature and character, that has eat out the army, nobody can reasonably doubt. What is there in the condition of this country that should make it incapable of having an army in some degree, at least, proportionate to its population? That the militia system, as carried on of late, must prevent this, is perfectly obvious. What ground is there for concluding that there are any other causes, if these were removed, which must equally produce the same effect? When we say, therefore, that we can get no men for the army, the answer is that we have never fairly tried. Let the experiment be bonâ fide made. Abolish the competition; and in order to meet the effects of the change thus produced, put your army on that new footing, which, without being necessary for its improvement, may be necessary to maintain its numbers. The first of these measures is, to change the condition of service from life to term of years;—a measure to which I have never heard any objection that could at all be set in competition with the advantages to be expected from it. Let the army, therefore, at this moment, and not at any time of future peace, and with a view to wars that may then be future, be put upon that footing, in which, in conjunction with other changes, it may hope to be recruited as it has heretofore been, and may release us from this dreadful state of being engaged in a war, without an offensive and disposeable force.—With all the disadvantage which the very memory of the bounties heretofore given, will not fail to produce even when the bounties themselves, to this inordinate amount, shall be given no longer, I should not despair of seeing our army gradually restored, and the service again go on as it did in all former times.—It is in conformity to these views that my judgment must be regulated upon the present measure. As a levy of so many men on the principle of ballot I may submit to it, government declaring it to be necessary. But as a ballot including the further principles of substitution, I must formally protest against it; because it tends to produce effects, which no consideration of present advantage could, perhaps, justify the incurring: but which, likewise, in my opinion, render the measure perfectly ill-calculated to meet even the present danger. I may accept the ballot for the sake of the immediate force which it will produce, however disadvantageous I may think it in various other respects: but I must at least endeavour to disarm it of its chief mischief, by recommending that the terms of exemption from service should be a fixed fine, as I would, for the same reason, extend that principle to every other part of the militia.—The great desideratum which we have to make good, the great problem which we have to propose to ourselves is, to find the means by which that natural force, which, in this as in all similar instances, is on the side of those attacked, may be so applied as to overcome the superior advantages of another kind which may be found on the side of the enemy. If the enemy could bring with him an army not more considerable than that which we should have to oppose him, great as the object is at stake, such is my confidence in the excellence of British troops, that even without those subsidiary aids, which yet it would not be right to neglect, I should feel perfectly at ease about the event. But we are to calculate upon the supposition, that the enemy may be able to land an army in this country greater either than the whole of our regular force, or at least than that part of it which could immediately be collected to oppose them. The question then is, how shall this deficiency be supplied? And here we have, as the foundation of our hopes, this leading fact, that in the case of every invaded country, but certainly of every invaded island, the physical force is always on the side of the invaded. No country probably, was ever invaded by a force superior in number, to the portion of the inhabitants of that country capable of bearing arms. It certainly will not happen to us to be so. Were the enemy to find the means of putting on shore in different parts, a body of a hundred thousand men, a supposition not likely, but by no means to be rejected as impossible, the population of this very town would yield a force that ought to make no difficulty of contending with them.

There is no question therefore of the sufficiency of physical force; but, though we are abundantly satisfied of this truth, let us not overlook another truth, not less important and certain, that in the conduct of human affairs it is rarely the physical force which determines the event. If it did so, no country would ever fall a prey to invasion. Hanover would at this time be an independent country. It was not for want of inhabitants capable of bearing arms that that country yielded up without a blow, its laws, its government, its liberties, its property, to the handful of men, comparatively speaking, who marched against it under general Mortier. It is thus, in other instances. A battle is fought, a fortress is taken, and the country submits. If we have a mind to pursue this truth, in cases of a different sort,—by what means do all the governments of the earth subsist? By possessing the physical force? Quite the contrary; the physical force is always on the side of the governed. The government of every country, with all their establishments of senates and magistrates, and ministers and officers, and even with the armies which it may have at its disposal, is nothing, in point of numbers, compared with the inhabitants at large: yet thus weak in physical force, these governments are able, fortunately for the peace and happiness of the world, to hold in subjection those inhabitants, and that not only in countries where the general sentiment may be supposed to go with the government, and the submission of consequence to be voluntary, as in these happy realms, but in countries, such as that of France at this moment, where of 50 or 60 millions or more, whom Buonaparté may have at his disposal, there are not probably so many thousands who really wish him well or submit to his government on any other principle than that of fear. This truth, therefore, the jacobinism of modern times chose as the foundation of all its operations, the scope and object of which was to apply the physical force of every country to the subversion of its government.—We are in circumstances, when we must prosecute a similar inquiry for a very opposite purpose; and must endeavour to find out how the physical means of a great country may be employed, not for the overthrow of its government, but to save itself from the incursion of foreign armies. And we may venture to say, that if these means can be gradually discovered and brought into use, the discovery will form an epoch in human affairs hardly less important, and certainly much more satisfactory, than that which was produced by the discovery above alluded to, of the art of overthrowing governments. We are now in the state of being compelled to try what can be done towards effecting this great desideratum; in which if we cannot succeed better than has been done in most of the countries in Europe, the fate of this country will hang on nothing but chance. We must form our judgment of the present measure by its tendency to carry those endeavours into effect. The general course of the proceeding, in the minds of his majesty's ministers, seems to have been this: a regular force, a force consisting of troops of the line is confessedly the best; but circumstances, and above all the urgency of the case, will not allow of this being obtained in time. Not being able therefore to obtain the best, you must get the next best. This next best is a militia, or a force raised upon the principles now proposed. There will therefore be three species of force in the country, 1st, the regulars, 2dly, the militia, and 3dly the volunteers, and other corps of that description; and these being to be taken, in point of preference, in the order in which they are here enumerated, the regulars being to be considered as better than the militia, and the militia than the volunteers,—the masculine more worthy than the feminine, and the feminine than the neuter,—you must do in this, as all persons must do in similar circumstances, you must take the second when you cannot get the first, and the third when you cannot get either of the other two.—All this so stated, is perfectly true: but in the application of this to the support of the present measure, there is a complete fallacy; for it is not what the option would be between these descriptions of force, supposing them all before us; but whether you will begin by raising that which you do not consider as best, and thereby produce a state of things in which to obtain the best shall be no longer practicable. From the language held about the comparative value of these objects, you would suppose the higher bounty given for the best force: and that it was only when hopes on that side were nearly exhausted, that you laid out your endeavours on a force confessedly less eligible. But just the contrary. You give your 15 guineas for service in the militia: and ten or five for service in the army: and then you exclaim, that you are obliged to have recourse to militia, because you can get no army. This statement, therefore, when applied thus generally, can by no means be admitted. All that can be said is, that in the mode proposed, and by a continuance of the militia system, you will, for a time, raise your men faster, and will, in the same time, produce a greater force. The question will then be, how far the superior quantity will compensate the difference of quality; and how far present advantages must be made to outweigh, in the actual circumstances, all consideration of objects, even of the highest consequence, in future.—In this view it may be necessary to say a word or two on the difference that must, for ever, subsist between troops of the line, and every other species of troops serving upon the footing of a militia. It is as little pleasant to me as to any other gentleman to be making comparisons, that can rarely be satisfactory to both parties, and to be marking perpetually to officers of the militia, that, after all their zeal, the service in which they have laboured, cannot, by the very nature of it, ever attain to all the qualities which belong to regular troops. The difference between the two services, is founded on the eternal difference that must subsist between troops, who always remain at home, and those who are placed from time to time in distant stations; between troops who have seen service, and those who, generally speaking, have not; between troops commanded by officers, who have never acted with them in difficulties and dangers, who have never shown, because they have had no opportunity of showing, their title to command by the valour which they have displayed, who can pretend to no experience, who can bring no authority from former reputation;—and troops, whose officers possess in themselves all these sources of ascendancy, and all these claims to respect. There is, moreover, a sort of soldier character, arising from a thousand causes, and acquired insensibly in the course of regular service, which will easily be distinguished by discerning eyes, and will furnish in general a marked discrimination between the militia soldier, and the soldier of the line. These circumstances must of course enter into account when we are regulating our choice between the two services, and founding our measures on the mixed consideration of numbers in each, compared with their respective qualities,—However confident I may feel that our militia force will prove a most valuable part, should the enemy come, of the national defence, I can never say generally that a force of that description is to be put upon a level with that of the regular army. I have been surprised, therefore, to hear it urged, that while a certain number of men must be kept at home for the defence of the country, it was a matter of indifference whether our army to that amount was composed of militia or regulars. But is even this the only difference between regulars and militia, between a disposable and undisposable force? Though the circumstances of the war may, at one time, require a force of a certain amount to be kept within the kingdom, the next moment may set a great part of it at liberty: and is it of no consequence that its constitution should be such as to make it incapable of availing itself of that liberty? Nay, if even that should be so, and that in point of fact the power of sending it abroad was one of which no use could be made, is it indifferent whether the enemy is apprized or not of that truth, and whether he is enabled to calculate his plans upon the previous knowledge, that the force existing in the country, can, in no case, be sent against him? If the dangers which threaten us are ever to end, it must be by some change, from within or from without, which shall be made in that power which has sworn our destruction, and which, till she is destroyed herself, will never cease in her endeavours to accomplish it. And what must be the counsels, and what the situation of this country, if we are voluntarily to place ourselves in a situation, in which it shall be impossible for us to co-operate to the producing any such change, or the availing ourselves of it, if it should happen by other means? If such is our situation, or such are our ideas, there is no difficulty in predicting that we must ultimately perish.—In every view, therefore, either of what is to be looked to hereafter, or is necessary in the present moment, I must condemn a measure, of which both the immediate effect, and final tendency is, to deprive the country of a regular army. And here it may not be amiss to advert to another measure of less extent, but of the same general character, and which, as far as it goes, is a revival of that system unhappily adopted in the beginning of the last war, and of the effects of which the army has not yet recovered; namely, that of raising men for rank. Notwithstanding all the modifications introduced into it by the right hon. gentleman, the effects of it, as far as the measure extends, will be much the same as in the former instance. No prohibitions will ever restrain officers placed in those circumstances, from giving more than the regulated bounty. In fact, it is notorious that they do give more, the effect of the measure therefore, in this respect, is only to add to the competition against the army already subsisting, and to raise the rate of bounty against the other recruiting parties, against the ordinary recruiting, you may say, of the same regiment. So that it can hardly be considered as adding a man to the army.—On the other hand, if money is not to be employed in raising these men, then what are you to rely upon? Upon a hope ten times more fatal in the accomplishment of it, in my opinion, than any effect likely to result from the increase of the rate of bounty; namely, that a certain number of British officers forgetting that delicacy of sentiment, and nice sense of honour, which so peculiarly mark the character of officers in our service, and make them what they are, will become, what is called, able recruiters, that is to say, men versed and expert in the noble art of crimping, one of the most degrading employments, and most inconsistent with all upright and liberal feelings, that can well be conceived. Such is the state of the measures offered to us at last by his majesty's government, with a view of averting the dreadful dangers with which we have to struggle. If a body of men must be raised by ballot, let the numbers be confined to the mere men balloted, and let the sums paid as penalties for exemption be laid out not for completing these corps, but for augmenting the recruiting fund for the service of the army. Let the same be done for the militia universally. If government have a mind to procure substitutes, in any instance, for the old militia, let it take the providing these substitutes into its own hands, so as to see that no increase be thence made to what it should fix for the rate of bounty. Let the condition of service in the army be changed so as to make the engagement for term of years instead of for life, with such increasing advantages held out, at the close of succeeding periods, as might be most likely to ensure a continuance of the service of the men once engaged. To these changes should be added a total abolition of drafting. In general, in this as in many other regulations that might be proposed, the maintaining, or rather the creating, an army would be my object, conceiving that even for purposes of mere defence, a small portion of truly regular troops, in conjunction with the undisciplined efforts of the country, may be set in balance against a very large proportion of troops imperfectly formed. Thus far I have been considering only, what may be called the embodied force of the country. But will this force, increase it, constitute it how you will, be sufficient? And must not a new and larger fund be resorted to, namely, that which will embrace all the strength, energy, zeal, talents, faculties mental and corporeal, of the country? If we think that we can be protected by any of the ordinary means of war, by trusting our defence to men, dressed as soldiers, and hired or compelled to defend us, bating the chances, by sea or otherwise, that may interpose to defeat the enemy's projects in the first instance, we are little less than undone. This embodied force, be it good or bad, can go but a very little way. You cannot have it, if you wait to the last moment; to call it forth beforehand, to the necessary amount, would be an evil which the state of society in this country could never endure. This evil will be felt to a fearful extent in the present measure; without, at the same time any adequate advantage, being derived from it. The whole indeed of this measure is of that sort of which the examples are so numerous, and which are calculated more for show than use. We hear often of parliamentary grounds, and in cases where parliamentary grounds would seem to be something distinct from grounds of reason and common sense. In the same manner we meet occasionally with what may be called parliamentary measures; that is to say, measures which in skilful hands will make an imposing figure in a statement, particularly when addressed to persons wholly unacquainted with the subject; but will never pass upon experienced and intelligent men, and will be found utterly to fail in practice; a sort of show goods, such as will appear to a sufficient advantage in a shop window, but will never bear the eye of a dealer, and will be found wholly unfit for wear. At all events, you must have recourse to other, and more extensive means. You must prepare the country; you must put the country in a situation in which its patriotic zeal, its native courage, its various and abundant energies may have a way to operate and produce their natural effects. The general plan, which presents itself to me for that purpose, and on which a thousand others might be engrafted, according as circumstances varied, or future views developed themselves, would be instantly to distribute the country, or such parts of it as you wished immediately to prepare (for one merit, at least, of this plan is, that you may take as much or as little of it as you please) into small divisions of two or three contiguous parishes each, according to the population stationing an officer in each, with a small deposit of arms and ammunition, and whose office it should be, in concert with all the zeal, intelligence and influence which he might find in the neighbourhood, to train those who should voluntarily offer themselves, to such parts of military training as they would be alone capable of, and as are, after all, by far the most important. It would never enter into my idea, to introduce into bands of this sort any of the foppery of dress, or any distinctive dress at all; a ribband, or even a handkerchief round the arm, to distinguish those, who were receiving this instruction, from the crowd that might occasionally accompany them, is all that would be necessary. Those essential parts of military training, as they seem to be thought, a fife and a drum, the marching in rank and in file, the wheeling backwards, the eyes right and eyes left, whatever may be their value on other occasions,—a point that I do not presume to meddle with—must here, however, reluctantly, be given up. Firing at a mark; learning, indeed, to fire at all, which (thanks to the game laws) few of our peasantry are acquainted with; some instruction in the manner of cleaning arms; much instruction in the methods of lining hedges, firing from behind trees, retiring upon call, and resuming a new station, these are all the heads of discipline to which I should propose them to be exercised. It is not, indeed, very well ascertained what proportion these may bear (a very deficient one, no doubt) to the whole of what is required of soldiers; nor how far much of that which use and prejudice have taught us to consider as essential, might be dispensed with, though possibly not without some disadvantage, even in regular armies. It is not very clear, that troops in the duke of Marlborough's time, were required in marching to move all of them the same leg at once. Much of the modern practice was introduced under the authority of the great king of Prussia, who adapted his system to his own mode of warfare,—the warfare of large armies in open countries,—and might himself possibly be aware, that many of its rules, though upon the whole desirable, were not of that importance which his less-informed imitators have since ascribed to them. The French, whose authority at this time it is not for Europe to dispute, have changed back much of what was then introduced, and have got nearer in some respects to what was the old practice, but more nearly perhaps to what was the practice in the late American war: and though with them the eternal difference between trained and untrained between regular and irregular; (what are called irregular being with them perfectly regular troops in their own kind) between veteran and disciplined soldiers and hasty levies, is perfectly understood; yet the mode of warfare introduced by them countenances much more than heretofore, the utility of such armed and partially instructed bodies, as that which I have presumed to recommend. The measure is, at least, good as far as it goes. It draws no man from his home; it puts no man in a state of painful constraint: it stops no man in his business, so as to leave his family to distress or become a charge upon the public. It has the further merit of not interfering with any thing else, so as to prevent any man from entering the army or navy, or militia, or serving the state in any other way. Expense I would have none. The pay of the officer the price of the powder consumed, the hire of the store-house for depositing the arms in cases where the parish church could not be made to serve the purpose, with such an allowance to the men, as was a mere equivalent for their lost time, these would be the whole, or nearly the whole, of the expenses incident to the plan, which certainly could not be thought objectionable on that score. So much as to its negative merits. As to its advantages, it provides for a distribution of arms whenever the time shall come; and it prepares the people in a certain degree for the use of them. It fills the country with powder and ball: and it instructs those in whose custody they are placed, to what hands, when the emergency shall call for it, they may be entrusted to the greatest advantage and with most safety. The officer aided by the leading gentlemen, by the clergymen, by the principal yeomen and others, and having continued intercourse with the lower orders, will soon be able to form a tolerable judgment of those on whom he may rely, upon such an occasion, and those, who from feebleness or otherwise are less worthy of such confidence. But the greatest, possibly, of all the advantages which I should be inclined to hope from this plan is, that most important of all preparations, the preparation of the mind. It seems to be almost the only way (I must think the most effectual) in which they will be thoroughly impressed with a conviction of the danger. The present measure will, I confess, prove a powerful instructor as far as inconvenience goes; but that is, at least, not the pleasantest way of conveying instruction. But the present measure will never instruct the people in this, that it must be on their own exertions, that they must depend for salvation. One main objection to the measure is, that its tendency is the direct reverse. In the other way, both a sense of the danger, and a knowledge of the means necessary to be employed against it, will be carried into every farm-house and every cottage. It will be the conversation of the village green, of the church porch, and what is not the least, perhaps, of the ale-house. Men will be turning their thoughts to what they can do upon the occasion, will be calling up the memory of former exploits, will be counting upon their newly acquired means and knowledge, and above all will be familiarizing their minds to the object. It is not to be told how much of military knowledge (which is nothing more than the application of common sense to situations, new indeed, but soon capable of being comprehended) will spring up under this cultivation, in situations, where apparently it was to be least expected. An officer stationed in this way, if only by promoting military conversation, will become a source of instruction by no means to be despised. Every day of exercise or walk into the fields will be a sort of clinical lecture. If the officer be an intelligent man, and has seen service, he will soon find himself surrounded by people, who will have acquired under his instructions reasonably good military ideas, and have qualified themselves, should the occasion arise, to render them very useful assistance. This sort of armed force not confined, like the volunteers hitherto raised, to small troops in towns, and who (without disparagement be it spoken) consist for the most part of persons, who from bodily force, habits and situation of life cannot generally be expected to support the fatigues of military service. This sort of armed force, co-extensive with the active population of the country, though it cannot of itself stop the march of an army, must produce an immense effect, aided by troops of yeomanry, whose utility will be very great, in co-operation with such such resistance as we expect from forces of a different description. When we talk of the difference to armies acting in a friendly or a hostile country, we certainly do not suppose that difference to be less, because the hostile country happens to be prepared and armed. But every preparation of this sort has hitherto, by his majesty's ministers, been completely neglected. We are, for aught we know, within two months of invasion, and the measure now just brought forth, is the only measure except the calling out the militia, which they appear to have thought of. But they do, it seems, immense things in secret. True dignity shows itself in calm! Why, Sir, what these measures can be, of which the country knows nothing, it is not very easy to comprehend; and therefore one a little distrusts the nature of this calm. There are different sorts of calm. There is the calm of confident and complacent hope, and the calm of despair. The calm of men, who having passed the first agitation of danger, have settled their minds to a determined resistance to it; and the calm of those who are only tranquil, because, from ignorance or insensibility, they are wholly incredulous of its approach. I wish the hon. gentleman's calm may not be that of a wretched lodger, who, hearing a noise below, instead of manfully getting up to resist the robbers, only hides his head in the bed clothes, and hopes they may go off with their other booty without coming into his apartment.—Their secrecy too is altogether as whimsical an idea. They observe, I suppose, that Buonaparté is very secret; and judging him, as they well may, to be a great captain, they conceive, by imitating his secrecy, that they shall appear to be great captains themselves. But they forget the difference between attack and defence. A man who means to surprise his enemy, does very right to keep his intentions secret; but it is not altogether so proper on the part of him who means only not to be surprised. An officer who was about to surprise a post, by a night attack suppose, would do very well not to tell his soldiers, whither he was leading them; but it would be odd, if the officer on the other side was to say to the next in command, "I have intelligence that we shall be attacked to night; but remember this is only for yourself. Don't say a word to the guard; secrecy is the very soul of military operations."—There is another rather material difference, that Buonaparté has nothing to do but to issue his orders with a certainty that they will be punctually obeyed, whether the army like them or not, whether they are called upon to execute them at a longer or shorter notice, or whether they have any conception or not of the general purpose which they are meant to answer. But the army here to be applied to, is the people of Great Britain, who, besides that they may debate a little upon the orders which they receive, must act in a great degree from their own impulse and discretion, and who will never be brought to act at all, if they themselves are not previously made sensible of the danger.—I, for one, will not pay them so bad a compliment as to suppose that they are not fit to be trusted with this secret. I disclaim the notion, I renounce "as impious and heretical," that "damnable doctrine," that to blind the people as to their true situation, to conceal from them the reality of the danger, is the only way to keep up their courage. If this is really their state, then is the country in a deplorable way indeed: but changed as the people of this country are by a thousand causes, and under the influence of a sort of language, and policy which has prevailed for so many years, I will never believe, that they must be lulled into a false security, be exposed to all the dreadful dangers of a surprise (the effects of which no man can calculate), because, to show their danger would be to dismay them. How do we combine this with all the vaunting and high-flown compliments, which we are for ever paying them? Are they only brave, when they believe there is no danger? I reject the imputation. Their safety depends upon their exertions; and their exertions must be stimulated, as I am confident they will be stimulated, by a sense of their danger.—In addition to those exertions which the people themselves must make, and on which must rest our chief hopes, there is much that ministers themselves ought to be diligently employed about, but to which I must suspect no attention has been given. Every officer of note and character in the country ought to be called upon for his opinion; not an opinion given in conversation, and with an obliging acquiescence, perhaps, to the presumed notions or wishes of the person he is talking to, but such as must stand in evidence against him, and on which his military judgment and credit will be at stake. Innumerable measures of precaution are likewise necessary, and which would not be the less useful, because they would be attended with no expense or distress to the country. I do not object to the present measure on account of the expense or inconvenience which attend it, great as they will be. Whatever is necessary must be done, let the hardship be what it will. But I beg that we may not invert the proposition, as many are apt to do, and suppose that whatever is burthensome and oppressive, must therefore be efficacious. I suspect the present measure to be of that character: possibly in all its parts; but unquestionably I must object to it, in that part, which goes in the first instance, and finally, as I believe, to make it impossible for us to have an army.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the proposed plan, and said, that until we convinced the enemy that we were impregnable at home, a peace was on no account to be expected.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Debate in the Commons on the Additional Force Bill.] June 23. On the order of the day for the second reading of this bill,

Mr. Calcraft objected to the plan, and thought government would do better, were they to complete the regular regiments, by ballot. However highly he respected the superiority of the regular troops, he could by no means think so lightly of the militia, as Mr. Windham had done, as he recollected their gallant achievements in Egypt and Holland. He also bore ample testimony to the good discipline of the British army in general.

Mr. Sheridan declared, that the idea thrown out by the last speaker, of a compulsory levy of men for the regular regiments, was altogether unconstitutional; but to repel invasion, the constitution required every man to come forward in the defence of his country.

Mr. Elliot objected both to the composition of the force proposed, and to those who were to have the direction of it. As to the first point, he thought regular troops decidedly more advantageous than those who were levied merely for defensive operations. He considered that the system of recruiting the regular army by bounties, had never been fairly tried in this country; as it had always been counteracted, by bounties given to persons recruiting for a more limited service. He recommended an augmentation of the bounty-money, as he thought it the most desirable thing to augment, as speedily as possible, that force, which was not only the best fitted for encountering the enemy at their landing, but for offensive operations. After pressing strongly the superior advantages to be derived from regular troops, he concluded, by expressing his disapprobation at the slowness with which ministers brought forward their measures, at the present critical period.

The Secretary at War observed, that there were many reasons evidently flowing from our insular situation, our commercial prosperity, and our great naval force, which prevented this country from having as large a regular establishment as many others. He agreed with Mr. Sheridan, that it would be unconstitutional to raise men by ballot for the regular army; it was therefore impossible, by bounties, to raise, in a sort time, as great a number of troops of that description, as the exigency of the times might require.

Mr. Pitt defended the principle of the bill, which he considered the most proper expedient, to obtain the purposes intended by it. He did not consider this as merely a defensive measure, but that by enabling us to spare a greater number of our regulars, it would forward the ultimate objects of the war, by increasing our disposable force. He declared, however, that, at the present moment, the defence of the country appeared the first and most important operation; when that should be accomplished, then it must be considered how we should best direct the spirit of the country against its implacable enemy. He yet would not say, that a mere defensive war was to be altogether despised; it was something to be safe from a power, which had conquered most of the powers of the continent, and there was no reason to fear, but that a considerable reinforcement might be obtained for the regular army, by means of the force now to be raised. It appeared to him to be essentially necessary, that a large force should be raised, as speedily as possible; and he did not know any other measure, that would be likely to be more effectual for this purpose.

Mr. Windham said, that notwithstanding the clear statement of Mr. Pitt, he was still unconvinced of the propriety of the measure. He did not deny, that the present bill would procure a greater number of men, in a shorter period than perhaps any other; but he would by no means allow, that the value of the men so raised, would be in proportion to their number. He neither thought the men would be equal to soldiers raised in the common way, nor would they be as well officered. If the invasion was to take place at all, it would probably take place before this force was half raised, or in any degree efficient. He thought the name of Army of Reserve, was ill applied to such a force as this, and recommended a Vendean rising en masse, as a better mode of repelling invasion, than the means which the present bill held forth.

Mr. Pitt, in explanation, said, he considered the present plan, merely as a foundation for recruiting, and as part of a general system from which the most important results might hereafter flow.

Lord Castlereagh replied to Mr. Windham, and defended both the militia system, and the measure now proposed. He thought it strange, that that right hon. gentleman who generally preferred regular troops so decidedly to any others, should now recommend a peasantry, armed and disciplined, like those in La Vendée.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer also defended the measure. He said it was from a similar one, the calling out the supplementary militia, that the country had been able to make those exertions last war, which decided the campaign in Egypt. He condemned the idea which had been thrown out, of fitting up our regular regiments, by a sort of conscription, which would be entirely contrary to the liberty

July 18. The Secretary at War said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a bill for amending the act for the defence of the country, passed in the present session, and to enable his majesty more effectually to exercise his ancient prerogative in requiring the military service of his liege subjects. The bill already passed contained provisions for enabling his majesty to take such preliminary measures for ascertaining the strength and resources of the different parts of the kingdom as were necessary, with a view to further measures of internal defence. It likewise provided a compendious mode of acquiring possession of such property on the part of the public, as might be necessary; and there were provisions for indemnifying those persons who might suffer either by the preparations, or by actual invasion; but, upon mature consideration, that bill did not appear to go far enough. It was particularly defective in one point, namely, in enabling his majesty to avail himself of his ancient and undoubted prerogative, in commanding the assistance of all his subjects fit to bear arms, for the purpose of repelling the invasion of a foreign enemy. That it was the ancient prerogative of the crown, to command the services of all who were capable of bearing arms for the defence of the country, could not be doubted. The king's prerogative, with regard to those points, was laid down by Judge Blackstone. Having spoken of the ancient Saxon constitution, by which every man was compelled to three duties, namely, the "Arcium constructio, Pontium reparatio, et expeditio contra hostem," the learned writer thus proceeded—"Besides those, who, by their military tenures, were bound to perform forty days service in the field, first, the assize of arms, enacted 27 Hen. 2nd, and afterwards the statute of Winchester, under Ed. 1st, obliged every man, according to his estate and degree, to provide a determinate quantity of such arms as were then in use, in order to keep the peace; and constables were appointed in all hundreds by the latter statute, to see that such arms were provided." The same writer added "that it was usual, from time to time, for our princes to issue commissions of array, and send into every county officers in whom they could confide, to muster and array, or set in military order, the inhabitants of every district; and the form of the commission of array was settled in parliament, so as to prevent the insertion therein of any new penal clauses; but it was also provided, that no man should be compelled to go out of the kingdom, at any rate, nor out of his shire, but in case of urgent necessity, nor should provide soldiers unless by consent of parliament." In another passage, speaking of the power of the sheriff, the same writer said—"He is also to defend his country against any of the king's enemies, when they come into the land, and for this purpose he may command all the people of his county to attend him, which is called [the posse comitatus, or power of the county; which summons every person above fifteen years old, and under the degree of a peer, is bound to attend upon warning, under pain of fine and imprisonment." Such were the general principles of the constitution as laid down by that able lawyer. He would refer the House to one or two authorities more: by the 1st Ed. 3rd, stat. 2, ch. 5, it was enacted, that it was the king's will, no man, from thenceforth, should be charged to arm himself otherwise than he was wont in the time of his progenitors kings of England; and that no man should be compelled to go out of his shire, but where necessity required, and the sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm, and then it should be done as had been used in times past for the defence of the realm. And in the 5th Hen. 4th upon a petition of the Commons, the form of a commission of array was then settled in parliament, and of course had the effect of an act of parliament. Similar writs were directed to all the sheriffs in England. Now this being the ancient law of the realm, it might be asked, why was it necessary to call the attention of parliament at this time to any parliamentary measure? It was because the process by which the prerogative of the crown and the duty of the subject could be enforced, was so tedious as to render it in a great measure useless. The party refusing to obey the king's summons might be fined and imprisoned; but it could only be by the due course of law, a delay which would render the process nugatory. It did therefore, upon the principle and reason of the thing, with reference to the ancient exercise of the prerogative so vested in the crown, seem to be necessary to adopt some simple, decisive, and effectual measure. He apprehended he would not be required to urge the necessity of such a measure. The situation in which the country at present stood was known to every one who heard him. It was threatened by an enemy the most formidable and vindictive this country had ever had to deal with; an enemy not only threatening invasion, but making preparations for it; not only having the insolence to threaten us with contaminating our shores, but with actual subjection. True it was, our force, both by sea and land, was powerful; but when he considered that the enemy was possessed of a considerable portion of the continent of Europe; when he reflected that the powers of the continent were compelled to submit to grace the car of the first consul of France, it was not enough to rely on the force we had, great as it was. Under these circumstances, though every one must have a reliance on the skill and vigilance of our navy, we ought to have the means of overwhelming any expedition that might be directed against our shores. Though with the army we had, it was possible to line the whole coast of Great Britain and Ireland—it could not be done in such a way as to prevent the enemy from taking a temporary possession of some part of it. If they embarked 100,000 men in eight or ten different directions, then, after deducting 50,000 that might be drowned or destroyed in the passage over, or dispersed, he would suppose that 50,000 men would be able to land. These remains of the expedition would come over more or less dis-united, more or less sea-sick, and more or less provided with necessaries; and though it was probable we might give a guess where the enemy would land, yet we could not rely upon our opinion in that respect, for they might change their determination; or, from being driven out of their course, they might be disposed to throw themselves any where. Under these circumstances, the whole power of the country ought to be put in a state to be made use of in case of necessity, and after calculating on our own powerful armies, we should have a second or a third line, or legion upon legion, and army upon army, in order to fill up the regulars, and bodies of troops in the field. In case of actual invasion, the operations in the field would be extremely active, and the conflict severe; we therefore ought not to look to the slow mode of recruiting by ballot, but should resort to the ancient law, and to those powers of the prerogative, by which the king could command all his subjects to bear arms. Let any one consider those armies which had been produced in the field by some of the wisest princes on the throne. Let us see how queen Elizabeth was supported, when she was attacked by the Spanish armada. How was that army which begirt the throne produced? By having recourse to the ancient prerogative of the crown. He would now proceed to develop the outlines of his plan. The plan divided itself into two heads; the first related to the enrolment, and assembling of the men when enrolled; and the second to the exercising and drilling them. What he proposed was, to make use, as much as possible, of the machinery of the militia, and to avail himself of the powers entrusted to the lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants. He should recommend that the lieutenancy should meet as soon as possible, for the purpose of directing an enrolment of all men in every parish, between the ages of 17 and 55. He should divide the men comprehended in the enrolment into four classes. The first would contain all the young men between 17 and 30, who were unmarried, and without children of the age of ten years. The second, all men between 30 and 50, who were in the same predicament. Thirdly, all the men between 17 and 30, who were married and had no more than two children. And the fourth class would include all the rest. He should also propose, that the enrolment should describe the persons in the following manner, distinguishing those who were serving in the army of reserve, or in the militia, or in any of the king's forces, or in any of the volunteer corps approved of by his majesty; and also those who were serving by substitute in the militia, and for this reason, because while a person had a substitute actually serving, he could not be called upon for military services. He did not propose to distinguish those who had served by substitutes: for the militia laws said they might be called upon whenever it came to their turn; with regard to constables and peace officers, they would appear in the roll so distinguished. When he came to speak of the assembling, he should propose to exempt such persons as long as they continued in those situations. The enrolment he was desirous should proceed much in the way of making on the militia. Every man would have an opportunity of appealing, in case he was improperly described, or belonged to any other class. He meant to propose that when the deputy lieutenants ordered the lists to be made out, they should appoint a day for receiving them, which should also be the day of appeal. He proposed that the lists should be corrected in the spring and the autumn; that they should be kept in as correct a state as possible, and that the abstract of the county roll should be transmitted to the principal secretary of state, divided into the different classes, so that it should describe the number of men, and those who were entitled to exemptions. Having so provided for the enrolment, he next proposed that his majesty should have it in his power, in case of actual invasion, or the approach of an enemy's force towards our coast, to call upon the lieutenancy to assemble or embody all those persons who did not fall within the description of those whom he had mentioned, as entitled to be exempted, and to order that all those of the first class should be forthwith called out to repel the invasion, and, during the time they were assembled, should be subject to military discipline, and be sent to any part of Great Britain, into any existing corps, or any new corps, that might be raised; that the time of their service should be limited to the period of the invasion: and that as soon as the enemy were exterminated, they were to be at liberty to return home. That upon assembling, every man should be entitled to two guineas, to furnish them with necessaries, and when their services were over, and they were at liberty to return home, that over and above the usual sum allowed to the militia, they should be paid the sum of one guinea. He should also propose, that when these men were so assembled, they should take an oath of fidelity, which should extend not only to repelling foreign invasion, but to quelling any rebellion or insurrection that might exist during the time. He would now proceed to that part of the plan which related to the exercising and training. He should say, in the first place, that the constitution of this realm not only provided for enabling his majesty to call on his subjects to repel an enemy, but the wholesome institutions of our ancestors provided, that every man should be exercised in the use of arms. We might talk of population, but if men were unaccustomed to the use of arms, and did not know how to handle a firelock for their defence, the population was weakened in proportion to their ignorance. Our ancestors were so sensible of this, that there were many instances to be found in our books of obliging persons to provide themselves with arms, and to learn the use of them. As late as the reign of Henry 8th all servants and labourers were required to practise the bow, and townships were ordered to provide butts for shooting at, and were fined if they did not. By the 33rd Henry 8th c. 9, every man under 60, not labouring under some bodily impediment, was directed to exercise the art of shooting with a bow, and fathers, governors, and masters, were ordered to have those under them instructed in the use of arms. He should highly approve of some measures being adopted, for obliging all our youth in public schools to be instructed in the use of arms, and that the military art should be part of the public education; for we lived in times when, unless a man knew the use of arms, and had the valour to employ them, neither his life, his property, his honour, or his family, could be safe. He should propose that his majesty should be enabled to direct the lord lieutenants to make preparations for exercising the young men of the first class once a week, in the different parishes. For this object, the king might order sufficient arms to be provided for such young men. These arms might be lodged in the churches, or other convenient places: and should be kept in order, at the expense of the parishes. There were other provisions in the bill he intended to submit, directing the lord lieutenants, and deputy lieutenants to appoint officers to command the men, dividing them, as much as possible, into companies of parishes; or where the parishes are too small, adding one or more. He should recommend that over every 120 men, the lord lieutenant shall appoint officers. That every person in the first class should attend once a week for the purpose of being exercised, provided the place of exercising did not exceed three miles. He should propose that persons omitting to attend, should pay a small fine, proportioned to their circumstances in life. When these men were called out, if any young man was desirous of serving in the cavalry, he should be at liberty to do so, upon his appearing equipped as a dragoon. He should also propose, that if there were volunteers in a parish, to half the amount of its population, the remainder, though not exempted from enrolment, would not be required to serve personally. He should propose to extend this plan to the whole of Great Britain. With respect to Ireland, it was not his intention to extend the measure to that country. With regard to putting arms into the people's hands, he did not deny that, in some instances, it might be dangerous; but he begged the House to consider what was the state of Europe and of this country. In such times as these, he would rather run the chance of his countrymen misemploying the arms entrusted to them, than that they should be obliged to submit to a foreign enemy. There was one point to which it was necessary he should advert, and that was the quantity of arms in the possession of private persons in this country; for though the arsenals of this country were never better supplied, yet the public arms might not be sufficient. He apprehended, that under the late Defence act, the king might require such arms to be delivered up. However, if there was any doubt, a bill could be brought in. It appeared to him, upon the whole, that this plan was simple, efficacious, and consistent with the ancient law, and if carried into execution, was calculated to give effect to that zeal and animation, by which every British bosom was inspired. He concluded with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill to amend and render more effectual an act, passed in the present session of parliament, entitled 'An act to enable his majesty more effectually to provide for the defence and security of the realm during the present war, and for indemnifying persons who may suffer in their property by such measures as may be necessary for that purpose;' and to enable his majesty more effectually and speedily to exercise his ancient and undoubted prerogative in requiring the military service of his liege subjects in case of invasion of the realm."

Mr. Windham said, he did not rise to oppose the measure: on the contrary, he wished it had been brought forward sooner. He wished it were possible so to vote the question, as that their decision might have a kind of retroactive force; a power of antedating the measure, and putting the country in a situation of having received the benefit of it long ago.

Of all the charges against the present ministers, the best grounded was, that by their delays and their weakness they had brought the country to a state of danger of which their preparations were far short. He repeated the charge, and he was ready at any time to enter into the question. When ministers were accused of bringing the country into danger, the first question to be considered was, whether there was a corpus delicti, whether the danger actually existed? As to that, he should take the admission of ministers themselves. That a design existed to invade this country, was admitted on all hands. Such a design could not exist, without implying considerable danger. It certainly was not for those, who treated, even at this time, the idea of invasion with contempt, to say that the mere intention in Buonaparté to destroy this country was in itself a circumstance of great danger. Even he, who was so branded as an alarmist, did not talk that language. He said, that invasion was formidable only if a proper sense was not entertained of its practicability and proper means were not taken to resist it. It was by this test that he wished to try the conduct of ministry. Have their preparations kept pace regularly with the preparations of the enemy? Have they by their exertions so kept a head of the danger, as that at no period it can be said to be greater than at the period preceding? or so, as that the country cannot be said to be in danger at all. For let it be remembered always, that according to the principles of those with whom he was arguing, danger from invasion, and blame to the ministry, were synonymous; since invasion in itself was, as they said, a mere bugbear, and had in it nothing to be apprehended.—It was quite consolatory to think how many comfortable opinions are heard upon that subject. The only draw-back was, that they did not come from exactly the classes of people from whom one should hear them with greatest pleasure. We were told daily of the impracticability of invasion, by many eminent lawyers, many sound divines, many worthy country gentlemen, many respectable merchants, many skilful agriculturists, many very handsome women. The only persons from whom we did not hear these opinions, were our soldiers and sailors. Ask a sailor, whether with any superiority of naval force he could ensure the country against an invading army?

He would tell you, that such was the uncertainty of all naval operations, such the extent of coast to be guarded, such the variety of modes in which invasion may be attempted, some in larger and some in smaller vessels, some from nearer and some from more distant points, that with all the naval superiority in the world—even with that which the hon. gentleman deprived us of at the peace of Amiens,—he could not engage that an enemy should not effect a disembarkation on various points even in considerable force. But put this same question to a landsman, to a man who perhaps never saw the sea but from Margate or Brighton, who never embarked in any thing but a bathing-machine, and he will tell you, that to talk of invading a country in the face of a superior navy was the idlest of all follies, and that as long as we had our wooden walls (he would more properly say, our wooden heads) we should never treat invasion otherwise than as a threat fit only to frighten children. The same in the case of the opposition to be made, should the enemy have effected a landing. A man who knew no more of military operations than himself or most of those whom he addressed happily did; who never saw troops but on a parade; who had never fired a gun in anger, would dispatch you twenty thousand French in a morning, as easily as captain Bobadil; but men who really knew what they were talking of, men who were at once officers, and officers who had seen service, the men on whom we must rely, and on whom we might rely, should such an emergency arise, they would tell you a different story; and, though they certainly would not speak of invasion with dismay, if proper precautions were taken, they would never consider it as a matter to be treated with contempt. He would wish that those, who were guided by authority upon this subject, would consider how many of the opinions, which they heard were entitled to the smallest consideration. For himself, he would not declare an opinion one way or another. He would not even say, whether he considered the attempt as likely to be made. He preferred to take that fact on the declaration of ministers; because, he knew, if, by any accident, such as might happen, the design were relinquished, what vapouring there would be, on the part of many, and how he and others should be told, that nothing but their own disordered imaginations could ever have given birth to such an expectation. He took the probability of the attempt, therefore, upon the ministers' admission : and stating from that point, he begged to know, on what ground we thought the attempt was to be disposed ? Was it at this time of day, after all that had been achieved and suffered, that we were warranted in holding cheap the projects of French enterprise ? Did the French require to be told, that seas were deep and winds variable ; that islands can only be approached by water ; that if met with at sea they would be liable to be destroyed by our cruizers ; with many similar truths, the knowledge of which we seemed to think was confined altogether to ourselves. For one person that had studied this question, for one memorial that was written in England, he would venture to say, that there were a hundred in France. One circumstance he must complain of, viz. the clamour raised against those, who could not partake in this security, and who warned their countrymen, in consequence, not to trust to it too implicitly. These were treated as pusillanimous men, who were foolishly frightened themselves, and were doing no small mischief by communicating their fears to others. Those who saw danger to the country, which only the exertions of the country could prevent, were not to declare its situation, were not to call for those exertions, but were to leave the country to repose in false security, till the moment should perhaps be past, when resistance would be any longer practicable. Though the House was on fire, they were not to alarm the family by any intemperate cry or knocking ; but were to tap gently at the door, and whisper only, that if they did not get up they would be burnt in their beds. There were two cases in which representations of danger seemed to be unnecessary : one where the danger was of a sort to admit of nothing being done to prevent it ; the other, where all that could be done, was done already. But was either of these the case of this country ? Were we in circumstances in which nothing could be done, or in which every thing necessary was already doing ? Ministers, indeed, would have us suppose that we were : and, when pressed upon the subject, enumerated their exploits in a manner altogether diverting. They told us, with great triumph, of the expenses they had incurred, and the inconvenience they had produced : how, in a time of profound peace, they had filled the nation with all the bustle of war : how, at a moment when nothing was to be heard but economy and saving, they had suddenly started forth into measures, the most extravagant and wasteful. They had called out the militia : they had twice augmented the army and navy. They had brought forward the Army of Reserve bill, with all the enormous expense attending it : they had lastly produced the measure at present under consideration. All these things they had done ; but with all that they had done, had they done enough ? And the measures, which they had taken, had they been taken in time ? There was no possible reason to be assigned, why every measure that had been adopted, should not have been adopted weeks and months before. What made this so inexcusable was, that there was nothing in our situation, that ministers ought not distinctly to have foreseen. There was not a danger to which the country was exposed, that was not the natural and necessary consequence of their own measures. It was a cunning child, the proverb said, that knew its own father : and, upon the same principle, it must often be a cunning father that knew his own child. The hon. gentlemen did not seem to be endued with this power. The whole train of our present calamities and dangers was the genuine progeny of the treaty of Amiens. One might make an allegory of it and say, that the treaty of Amiens, which had been begot by Wisdom upon Folly, by Dignity upon Meanness, as you choose to call it, by Boldness upon Pusillanimity, had two daughters, War and Invasion, which in due course, the time of gestation being longer in the larger animals, it was now delivered of. Not only, therefore, ought the hon. gentlemen to have begun their preparations from the date of the king's message, but from the very moment, when they signed the treaty, which was to settle the country in the happy enjoyment of the blessings of peace. Nothing, however, could prevail upon them to do this. They resisted all admonition, reviling and calumniating all who attempted to admonish them. Latterly, the secret of this had come out. The country, it seems, is a commercial and monied country, and must not be suddenly alarmed. The hon. gentleman was afraid of his omnium. But he ought to have recollected, that there was an omnium of another kind, the omnium of our laws, liberties, independence, and lives, which was likewise deserving of some consideration, and which would infallibly go, if we were thus to keep the country in ignorance of its danger, for fear of alarming the monied men. Nothing could justify the ministers, therefore, if, in a matter of this sort, where all was at stake, any thing really important was either omitted or delayed. But they had omitted and delayed not only great and important measures, in the execution of which there might be a difficulty, but innumerable other measures, about which there could have been no difficulty, and which required nothing but thought and consideration. Such were all measures of precaution and timely arrangement.—Every possibility ought to be provided for; every case duly considered; nothing omitted, which care, foresight, and able military counsel could effect. Our motto should be :

Omnia precipi, atque animo

Mecum ante peregi.——

But was that the picture of our actual state? Had not the very measure of a board of military reporters and advisers been rejected, though the effect of such a board, besides its other advantages, must have been, to restore to the service those officers, whose age alone prevented their serving us in the field, but who were certainly not on that account likely to be less valuable in counsel? Persons who might have valuable suggestions to offer for the public good, would address themselves more readily to a board of this sort, than to individuals whom they did not equally confide in, and whom they might suspect of rejecting their proposals from jealousy or partiality. The illustrious personage at the head of the army could never think it any disparagement to him, to receive the opinions of eminent officers; on matters too which it was impossible that he could have leisure to consider himself. Here, then, was one substantial instance of a measure omitted, capable of being of material importance in our present situation. But were there not others of a different description which many might suspect not to be attended to, as they ought to have been? Was nothing to be done in the way of works, by which the deficiency of our living force might be in part supplied, and the points which troops would be called upon to defend be rendered less numerous? Much of this sort, he was persuaded, was to be done. But in the midst of these omissions, there was one measure, the hon. gentleman might say, which we have amply provided for; we have given full instructions for the driving of the country! But as a measure to be relied on generally for stopping the progress of the enemy, nothing more absurd could have entered into the mind of man. In half the time that it would require to carry this driving into effect, the enemy would have passed the country, to which it was meant to apply. The next objection to the measure was, that it was utterly impracticable. In hardly any circumstances would a tract of country, adjoining to the sea, be capable of being driven, before the enemy would be at hand, to drive the drivers, and totally mar the operation. But the attempt in the meanwhile would be mischievous and fatal. The confusion it would produce would be endless. The roads would be blocked up; the passage of troops stopped; all military operations impeded: we should be run down by our own bullocks. It would be the scene described by major Sturgeon: "The drums beat in the front; the dogs barked in the rear; the oxen set up a gallop; on they came thundering upon us; and threw our whole corps into confusion." He came now to the immediate measure before them. In a constitutional view, not an objection could be made to it. As a compulsory measure, though he was not for objecting to it, because he thought it perfectly right that such compulsory means should be vested in the crown, yet he wished it not to be acted upon unnecessarily. The power might be wanted, and therefore very properly existed: it was useful too, that it should be known to exist: but if the end proposed could be accomplished by other means, it might be right, that it should not be exerted. Here his majesty's ministers seemed to be a little inconsistent. For the sake of a great and most important object, the instant creation of a regular army, when it was proposed by some gentlemen, and concurred in by him (Mr. W.) and others, that there should be a ballot for troops of the line, to serve in Europe only, and for term of years, and with the privilege of commuting the service for a fixed fine, the ministers would not hear of the proposal: now, their whole thoughts seem to run to compulsion. For his part he was far more inclined to voluntary service than to compulsory. By this universal compulsory training, much inconvenience would be produced, where it could not be attended with any correspondent advantage. The training would be universal: every one would partake in the burthen of it; but of those who were thus trained, a portion only, and comparatively a small one, could be brought into a state convertible to any military purposes; much of what would be fashioned by this act must be formed of materials, which the hand of the potter would throw away. But there seemed to be something besides the mere constraint, and interruption of business or pleasure, which would make this necessity of training be felt as a hardship. Men, in England, had not the same feeling as Frenchmen in general had, with respect to exhibiting themselves in public; nor had those, who would view them in those exhibitions, the same feelings as the people of France, with respect to military show and parade. There was a modesty with us, which would make many who from their size or figure, or want of ease or suppleness, might be conscious of not appearing to advantage, unwilling to display themselves under the discipline of the drill; while instead of exalting and magnifying, and giving an artificial importance to such displays, there was a universal disposition in our people to depreciate and make a jest of them. These dispositions, added to the impatience which many would feel of being mixed familiarly with those, whom they were accustomed to meet upon a different footing, would, he feared, have the effect of rendering this general training disliked. He was therefore the more inclined to seek the aid of voluntary service, as far as it could be obtained. For in this mode you were sure of one advantage. The volunteers had at least one qualification, which you looked to in a soldier, namely, good will. In compulsory service, all was apt to be cold and lifeless. But here several considerations required to be attended to. It was first to be seen how these voluntary exertions were to be obtained, and afterwards what shape was to be given to them. For the obtaining such exertions, it would seem to plain men that there was but one course to be pursued in the first instance, namely, to show, that exertions were necessary. Before people betook themselves to means of defence, they commonly required to be satisfied that there was some danger against which defence was wanted. But to attempt to satisfy them of this, was, according to the phrase at present in use, to excite despondency; and accordingly every man who sought to rouse the people to what their safety required, was branded as an alarmist, and treated as little less than a traitor to his country. He could not agree, that to tell the people of their danger was to throw them into a panic in which they would be able to do nothing. On the contrary, he believed it would only animate them to new exertions. This, at least, was sure, that they would not be animated to exertions without it. And why should they? The measures necessary for defence, were not in themselves of a nature so pleasant, as that men should have recourse to them, if there was nothing particular to require their being adopted. Either therefore you must forego these measures altogether, or you must take the course, so much condemned, of appealing to men's fears, in other words, of apprizing them of their danger. And, upon this occasion, it was impossible not to remark upon the difference there was in the practice of the two nations, France and England, and upon the different ideas which the governments severally entertained of the character of the two people. In France, when the nation was in danger of invasion, and the duke of Brunswick threatened to march to Paris, the government so far from dissembling the danger, sought, by all means, to proclaim it even with a degree of exaggeration. They thought that to apprize the French people of the approach of the enemy, was the way to summon them to exertion; and the French people answered to the call. They cheerfully fell to work to fortify Montmartre near Paris, and undertook, with zeal and alacrity, whatever else the government prescribed. But the compliment paid by his majesty's ministers to the people of this country was, to suppose, that to announce to them their danger would be to frighten them out of their wits. It was said, in answer to this, that the cases were different, for that the danger in France was much more pressing: that those in France had more to fear from the march of the duke of Brunswick, than we have from the invasion with which we are now threatened. But this argument would conclude just the contrary way. If the fear of terrifying the people was the reason for not apprizing them of their danger, the greater the danger, the less they ought to be apprized of it. The fact was, that those entrusted with the government, were bound by every tie early to possess the country with a knowledge of its situation, in order to give full and timely effect to those exertions, which would not fail to be made: at the same time, as in a matter of this sort, nothing which was capable of being otherwise provided for, ought to be left to chance, it was fit that powers, such as were now proposed, should be deposited with government, to be used by them, should the occasion require it, and to operate in the meanwhile as a stimulus to the voluntary exertions, were it to happen, that these should, in any part, prove deficient. He was, therefore, clearly of opinion, in favour of the existence of these powers, as he was, that they should be used sparingly, and only in case the voluntary exertions should not be found equal to what was expected. — It was impossible not to contrast to the slow and toilsome march of the measure now proposed, the speedy effect which might have been produced, had they adopted at once the mode of establishing small depositories of arms, in different parts, and sent down proper officers to instruct the people in firing with ball. That measure would have begun to take effect, from the very moment that the adoption of it was decided upon. All that seemed to be wanted, at the present crisis, was, to impress the people with a due sense of their danger, and then to give a right direction to the exertions which that conviction could not fail to produce. The means of the country were equal to any thing; and the disposition to employ them would never be wanting, when once the necessity was pointed out. The motives indeed were such, as had hardly ever existed in any other case, and were equally calculated to operate upon the selfish and the sordid, as upon the patriotic and the high-minded. The destruction of this country, should it once be accomplished would not be like that of any of the other countries, which have fallen under the French yoke. Other countries, when subdued, they would consider probably as part of themselves, and treat accordingly. But there was no reason for thinking, that such would be their conduct towards this country, were a case so dreadful ever to happen, as the one which would bring that question to the test. It was impossible to say what freaks of vengeance they would practise with us; they would not leave us like Flanders, or Holland, or Switzerland, or Genoa, or countries, which while they pillaged, they would seek to make productive through the same means by which they formerly flourished: after removing whatever was worth removal, delivering over the rest to general plunder, and destroying all the sources of future greatness, they would probably cast the island, as it were, to the dogs, or use it only as a place of growth for timber, and of men to man their ships. They would send us back to the woods; to the same state as we were in, when the country was first visited and conquered by their predecessors the Romans. Of what use would the island be to them? They had land enough of their own, of a better quality, and under a far better climate. They wanted neither our harbours nor our rivers. Why should the lords of the Rhine, the Meuse, the Seine, the Garonne, of all the ports of Holland, of France, and of Spain, come to England for the use of the Thames: or of the harbours of Portsmouth and Plymouth? Let no man flatter himself, therefore, that he can be saved in the general wreck; and since few, it was to be hoped, would be so foolish, even if they could be base enough, to act upon such an idea; let no man doubt of the exertions of the country, after the country should be once satisfied of the danger. This was the first step to be taken, namely, to satisfy the people that their exertions were necessary. The notion that this would produce panic, he, for one, would not admit. But if it would, so much the more necessary was it, that that panic should be produced in time, in order that it might be over, and the first agitation subsided before the crisis actually arrived. That the exertions of the people would then be great, he was the last to doubt. He could not help here lamenting the systematic pains that had long been taken to extinguish among the common people those qualities of body and mind of which we were inclined at all times to talk so boastingly, and on which we were now, it seems, to place our chief dependence. In allusion to something which he had said the other day upon that subject, an hon. gentleman had asked, whether he meant bull-baiting, and what the courage was, of turning loose animals of one species to torment and worry those of another? He would only advert to the question so far as to say that he did not mean bull-baiting, though he did mean what many would consider as of the same sort, namely, those athletic sports and hardy contests, which heretofore made the delight of the common people, and which, in a way suited to their capacities and habits, trained them as those Gothic practices, the tilts and tournaments of old, did persons of better condition, to every generous and manly sentiment. As to the courage of bull-baiting, he could say but little for it; but might at least put it upon a level with that of a set of gentlemen, who in fancied coats, and upon prancing horses, cracking their whips, and rending the air with their shouts, were inciting forty or fifty savage animals to pursue to destruction a poor hare or fox.—Upon the whole, he thought it perfectly right, that powers such as those proposed by the act, should be vested in the executive government; but that government should not be in haste to make use of them, till it should be seen what might be hoped from exertions purely voluntary. It was likewise of great consequence that government should exert its influence to give to these voluntary exertions a right direction, without which they might prove injurious instead of useful.

Lord Hawkesbury contended, that this bill united as much as possible the encouragement due to the volunteer system, with that compulsion, which in some instances the right hon. gentleman was an advocate for. Wherever the number of volunteers in any district amounted to half the persons subject to be enrolled, then the bill ceased to operate. As to the general charges of supineness and want of precaution, he could only answer for ministers, that the army of this country was at present (combining quality with number) as strong as at any former period; and would soon be every way superior to what it had ever been. He agreed, that if we were base enough to let ourselves be conquered, our condition would be worse than that of other enslaved nations. France would wreak her vengeance on us for the many disgraces and defeats that she had received from us. But if London, or twenty Londons, should fall into the hands of the French, the country would be still unconquered; for while a single acre of British ground remained unsubdued, it must and would be defended.

Sir F. Burdett said, that if ministers really wished on this occasion to conciliate the hearts and wishes of the people, they should begin by repealing all the oppressive and unconstitutional acts of their predecessors. In that case he would answer for it, they would not fail of their object.

Mr. Pitt said:—I feel sincerely happy that this measure has been at length brought before the House, as it affords a prospect of that vigour which is necessary in the present conjuncture. I approve of its principle and object. I have always been of opinion that such a measure was essentially necessary, in order to put the question as to our domestic security beyond all doubt. In its structure there is nothing new to our history; in its tendency there is nothing ungrateful to our habits: it embraces the interests, it avails itself of the energies, and it promises to establish the security of the country. Its object is the safety of all. It is perfectly agreeable to the best institutions of civilized society, and has for its basis the rudiments of our constitutional history. It is obvious, that unless we make efforts adequate to the crisis in which we are placed, the country is insecure, and if those efforts cannot be effectual without compulsion, no man can entertain a doubt of the propriety of resorting to it; but I have a confident expectation that compulsion will be unnecessary. By his majesty's prerogative, he has it in his power, whenever the country is threatened with invasion, to call out all his subjects for its defence; and the object of the measure is, that the people when called out should be trained to military evolutions—should be capable of conforming to orders without confusion or delay—of collecting with celerity, and acting with decision. Such a plan is highly desirable. The training of the people, however, should be prompt. The efforts of those to be entrusted with the execution of this important duty should be unremitted, until the country shall be secure against any attacks of the enemy. The amount of our danger it would be impolitic to conceal from the people. It is quite impossible that a people should make adequate efforts to resist a danger, of the nature and extent of which they are kept in ignorance. Upon these grounds I disapprove of the outcry so often raised against my right hon. friend and others, who have endeavoured to rouse the energies of the country, by pointing out the necessity which existed for employing those energies. Whether ministers ought sooner to have proposed this measure, is a question into which I shall not now enter. I will not stop to inquire into the time which has been already lost; but shall express my earnest hope that no time will be wasted for the future—that every instant will be actively engaged until the country be completely safe. I think that some arrangements should be made to connect the different departments of the executive authority, that upon orders issued from government to the lord lieutenants of counties, the people might be immediately set in motion; that without interfering with agriculture, the several classes might be disciplined; to attend the drill at least two days in each week; to assemble in particular places throughout the country; the limitation of distance from the residence of each man to the place of assembly to be about six miles; the time of attendance to be not less than half-a-day. The distance I propose is not more than the stout English peasantry are in the habit of going to a cricket match. These men might be disciplined by soldiers on furlough, who, on being called back to their regiment, when danger should actually reach our shores, might be enabled to bring with them a hundred sturdy recruits. With regard to the motion, I must say that it is not liable to the objection, that it would have a compulsory operation; for in fact it does not propose to resort to compulsion, if the object can be attained by voluntary offers; and I am of opinion that the purposes may be so effected. These voluntary offers may be promoted considerably by the presence of the nobility and gentry in their respective districts, and on that account I rejoice in the prospect that we are soon to separate. If voluntary offers shall not be adequate to the purpose, we must of course resort to compulsory proceedings. The dwelling of the man is the principal object to be attended to; but, in my opinion, the poorer classes should be remunerated for the time they may be engaged in discipline. In the execution of this measure I do not like the idea of waiting for the slow progress of a ballot. In those parishes where voluntary offers should not be promptly made, the compulsory levy should be promptly enforced. This compulsion, however, would not, according to my apprehension, be in any instance necessary, if the lord lieutenants of counties, with the deputies and other persons of respectability, would go round from house to house in their respective districts, and solicit the people to come forward. Much has been said of the danger of arming the people. I confess there was a time when that fear would have had some weight; but there never was a time when there could have been any fear of arming the whole people of England, and particularly under the present circumstances. I never entertained any apprehensions from a patriot army, regularly officered, according to the manner specified in this measure, however I might hesitate to permit the assemblage of a tumultuary army otherwise constituted. From an army to consist of the round bulk of the people, no man who knows the British character could have the least fear—if it even were to include the disaffected; for they would bear so small a proportion to the whole, as to be incapable of doing mischief. There was, indeed, a time when associations of traitors, systematically organized, excited an apprehension of the consequences of a sudden armament of the populace, but that time is no more, and the probability is now, as occurred in the case of the volunteers, that, if there are still any material number of disaffected, by mixing them with the loyal part of the community, the same patriotic zeal, the same submission to just authority will be soon found to pervade the whole body, and that all will be equally anxious to defend their country, or perish in the attempt.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the present measure could not have been brought forward with propriety, until the other measures, the calling out of the supplementary militia, and the army of reserve, had been organized and in forwardness. These measures could only follow each other in succession. Government, in the mean time, had availed themselves of as many offers of voluntary service, as they could accept of, without crippling the army of reserve. He spoke in high terms of those volunteers, with whom he was best acquainted, the Irish volunteers. He then stated the object of the present bill, which was to give effect to the undoubted prerogative of the crown. The crown had now the right to call upon every liege subject in case of invasion: the present bill was to impose a duty on the people, to receive such previous instruction in the use of arms, as alone could render that prerogative of any avail.

Mr. Fox said:—Sir, I shall not trouble the House at any length; more especially as the present measure will have my hearty concurrence. This is the first time I have made my appearance in the House for some weeks past; and I will state why I so absented myself. Though disapproving of the present war, I did not wish to oppose the measures necessary for carrying it on with effect. This is the first measure which I could, consistently with my own opinion, come down to support, being a measure for the defence of the country. There are two kinds of force which ought to be particularly attended to, in a country which is invaded. We ought to have a regular and well disciplined army; but are we then sure of victory? The army, like the naval department, is liable to many vicissitudes, and therefore, I should be very sorry if we had not other resources in case of any unforeseen accident. There is another species of force, and that is the militia. I will not go into a minute detail of its construction; but I have my doubts whether it is not an anomalous sort of force, partaking more of the regular army than it ought to do, for the purpose of mere defence. The militia and army of reserve, therefore I view in the same light as the regular army; and I cannot but believe, on that account, that this measure is the best calculated for the defence of the kingdom against an invading enemy. He may have a great regular army, composed of the best disciplined soldiers; he may have officers of the first talents to direct these soldiers, and to lead them on to victory; but he cannot have an armed mass of a country, who are bound by every tie to defend that country to the last drop of their blood. I am sorry to say this bill is not framed in the way I could have wished. I would have its operations to be voluntary, and not compulsory. I would not have this measure thought a burthen by any one. I would wish it to be a voluntary force, and that you should go round from house to house to know who would be willing to serve their country in the hour of danger; and that those who agree to go, should be immediately called forth, to be instructed as often as the circumstances of the case will allow. I am convinced, that there would not be five refusals in five hundred.

You would then get the object of this bill; but in a way much more popular and more extensively beneficial to the country. I own, Sir, that, at the present moment, I approve the system of this bill, by which you are to get a large force; but in doing that, you ought not to wait for too much instruction? Perhaps I may be told, these are not soldiers. Be it so; I am not attempting to give you soldiers, but armed citizens; men, whose bosoms glow with the love of their country, and their connexions; and who, in defence of these, would be as ready to fight an enemy as the best disciplined soldiers in the world. I do not approve of the idea of raising the people under different classes. Why not make them consist of one class, who would voluntarily bind themselves to go? As to the danger of arming the people in general, I am convinced the present measure cannot be attended with any. Those who thought they had reason to be discontented with the government, for the many unconstitutional acts which it has been guilty of, will now, when invasion threatens them, be united as one man in defence of their country. To show confidence in them, is to draw forth zeal. If you apply to the people for voluntary efforts, you will have a large army of armed citizens ready and willing to march whenever commanded, and to whatever place, cheerfully to meet and bravely to fight the enemy. But if the bill is to operate in a similar manner to those passed for raising the regular army and the army of reserve, and as a means of recruiting those, I fear it will not be efficacious.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer felt the greatest satisfaction, at finding there was no opposition to the motion. He denied, however, that ministers had been tardy in their preparations; on the contrary, many most important steps had been taken, between the 8th of March, the date of the message, and that day: first the militia had been called out; secondly, the supplementary militia was ordered to be embodied; then followed the army of reserve; and, in addition to those acts, upwards of 60,000 volunteers had already offered; and, after all those additions to the public force, the present measure was brought forward. He considered this measure as singularly adapted to the genius and character of the people, as it was making a common cause with them, in the defence of our common country.

Leave was given, and the bill was brought in and read a first and second time.

July 22. On the question that the bill do pass,

Colonel Craufurd said, that although it was impossible for any man to feel more forcibly than he did, how essential to our safety it is that we should place our chief reliance on an army of regular troops under experienced officers, yet, on the other hand, no man attached greater importance than he did to the advantages that must result from the measure now under discussion. The best army in the world might be defeated; but such an army as he wished to see, backed by such a mass of irregular force as this bill was calculated to produce, must be invincible. He believed therefore that the government never had proposed, nor parliament adopted, a measure more important than this is; and if it should please God so far to crown the efforts of our navy with success as to prevent the invasion taking place until the late and present bills should have produced their full effect, and the force of the country should be arrayed; then indeed we should be in such an attitude of strength as would enable us to bid defiance to the whole world. No man could value more highly than he did the efforts of an armed people acting in co-operation and support of the regular army. In a paper which he presented to his majesty's ministers before the Army of Reserve bill was brought in, he strongly expressed his wish that the great mass of the peasantry might be prepared to take an active part in defence of the country; and therefore no man could feel more pleasure than he did in voting for a bill which was calculated to produce that effect. But exclusive of the real physical strength that we should gain by this measure, it would also be attended with moral advantages of no less magnitude. By passing this bill parliament proclaimed to the people that their country is in danger it called upon them to take up arms, and to prove to the universe that they were prepared to repel the attacks of all the enemies in the world. This bill did at last confirm the truth of that language which had been so often held in this House by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham), whom he considered as entitled to the eternal gratitude of his countrymen for his patriotic efforts to awaken them to a sense of the danger which was hanging over their heads, at a time when they did not appear to be aware of it. The language of his right hon. friend had been represented as the effects of a disposition to view things in a desponding light. But at length his majesty's ministers must acknowledge, that his right hon. friend had spoken only the language of truth. Since the treaty of Amiens the French government had dared to assert, that England, single-handed, could not contend with France; and the honour of this country now required, that we should not make peace until we had made France feel that we defied her menaces. But although he was convinced that we possessed within ourselves sufficient means for maintaining such a contest, yet it could not be denied that it was an arduous one, and that it called for the utmost exertion of all our energy, improved by every means which the military art can suggest. The present bill, and that which had lately passed, would no doubt add very greatly to our security, provided it should please God to enable our navy to prevent invasion from taking place until they had had time to operate. This, however, would be a work of some time; and in the meanwhile we should be, with respect to our enemy, in a state of comparative weakness. Every measure which appeared to be best, in a purely military point of view ought then to have been adopted, without reference to other considerations; and he therefore lamented that more prompt and effectual means had not been resorted to for the immediately increasing the strength of the old regular regiments of infantry of the line. When he lately asserted it to be his opinion that the enemy might land an army of 60 or 70,000 men within a few days march of the capital, and that unless we had a large army of regular troops to oppose him, we should be in danger of seeing London fall into his hands, in answer to the first of these assertions, he had been told by his majesty's ministers and others, that he argued upon that as a probability which, in fact, could at most be considered as barely possible; that he seemed entirely to overlook the difficulties which the enemy would have to encounter, the opposition of our navy, the uncertainty of the winds the difference of the tides, and he knew not what other impediments, which made it wholly improbable that such a disembarkation should be effected. But when the secretary at war opened to the House the present measure, it was with great satisfaction that he listened to that part of his speech, in which he urged opinions very similar to his own. Upon this he could only remark, either that the same thing said in this House by different people was very differently received, or that in the interval of a few weeks between his own speech and that of the right hon. secretary, the enemy must have made vast exertions. But whatever might be their means of attacking us, he was convinced, that when the present measure should have been effectually carried into execution, and some others which he should hereafter mention. The people ought not only to be armed, but regularly armed; and he did not think it advisable to place any reliance on private arms, amongst which there would be a great variety of calibres, all very different from that of the musket; so that when each man had exhausted the stock of ammunition which he brought with him into the field, it would be extremely difficult to supply them. Besides which, these private arms would be without that weapon (the bayonet), with which, when it was possible to use it, the English troops had so often shown themselves to be superior to the enemy. It appeared to him, from what had fallen from ministers, that in carrying this bill into execution, it was intended to confine its operation to the men of the first class only. To this he objected: for even admitting that an aggregate number equal to the whole of that class might be ultimately sufficient, yet in certain parts of the country, it would be necessary to arm a much larger number than the first class. It must be admitted by every body, that it was desirable to attack the enemy in the first moment of his disembarkation; but it was impossible to make any distribution of our regular forces which should ensure our being able to do it with effect. If, however, 10 or 12,000 French troops should arrive on a part of the coast where we could only bring 4 or 5,000 men to oppose them, we should with such a force have a very good chance of driving them into the sea, if immediately assisted by a great mass of the peasantry of the adjacent district. Should it be found impossible to procure in time a sufficiency of fire arms for more than the first class, he should recommend to supply the deficiency by a distribution of pikes, a weapon which, on some occasions, had been used with great vigour by the deluded peasantry of the sister kingdom. In forming pike corps, the principle of volunteering might be advantageously applied; it might be made to be considered as a matter of honourable distinction for the youth of the country to volunteer entering into corps, the choice of which would be deemed to amount to a pledge that they would fairly charge and close with the enemy; that being the only mode in which they could employ the weapon which they had voluntarily made choice of. And if they really did resolve to close with the enemy, and were not improperly exposed till they had an opportunity of doing so, he was convinced that they might be employed with great effect. But although the present measure, if properly executed, might ensure our ultimate security, yet it was our duty to guard against temporary disasters of any magnitude; and, however unpopular the opinion might be, he would again assert that, if the enemy should succeed in landing an army of 70,000 men, we should still be in danger of having the fate of the capital decided for a time by the loss of one great battle. Setting entirely out of the question the calculation of the consequences, he felt it so disgraceful that this powerful nation should have to calculate the chances of its capital falling into the hands of the enemy, that this motive alone was quite enough to make us feel it our duty to persevere in our preparations for its defence, until we could say to ourselves, "We have done all that the military art can suggest: we will now put our trust in God, and in the exertions of our own strength and courage." Of this state of preparation we were still far short; for if the enemy should land such a force as he had mentioned within the narrow seas, the only means which we could safely rely on for preventing their reaching the capital were a numerous regular army, and a judicious system of fortification; and in neither of these branches of our defence were we doing enough to satisfy him. With respect to the first, the importance which he attached to increasing the infantry of the line, in preference to the militia, or any other description of force, did not proceed from any disposition to undervalue the merits of the latter; nor did he believe that, in his partiality for the former, he was at all blinded by the prejudices of education. He gave the militia full credit for the zeal, the patriotism, and the courage, which as Englishmen they could not fail to possess; but it was impossible they should be equal to the regular troops; and he would ask the hon. baronet (sir W. Erskine), who differed with him upon this subject, whether any military man, in attacking 50,000 French troops, could possibly feel the same confidence in an army composed of two-thirds militia and one-third regulars, as he would feel if it consisted of one-third of the former, and two-thirds of the latter. Under this impression, he was desirous that all the old regiments of the line should be immediately filled up to as great an extent as they could be carried to without rendering them unmanageable. Some of these regiments were very weak; yet every one of them contained a foundation of all that constitutes the excellence of an army. Upon this excellent foundation he should wish to see a great increase of force established. He therefore recommended, in the first instance, the measure of recruiting from the militia; and if the militia colonels, yielding to the necessity of our present situation, should be disposed to make a generous sacrifice of all private feelings, he thought that the experience of what had happened in the last war warranted the hope, that we should, in a short time, procure 20,000 volunteers from the militia for the regular regiments. These men being in a great degree ready trained to the use of arms, he would incorporate into the 50 or 60 regiments now in Great Britain and Ireland, in such proportions as to equalise their strength; and upon the same stock he would engraft the army of reserve, so as to carry each regiment to the amount of 14 or 1500 men. By these means we should form an army possessing all the qualities of veteran troops, in a much shorter time than it could possibly be accomplished upon any other system. As to the consequences of that event, he would never attempt to calculate what they might be: he had never said, that if London was lost, England was conquered; but he had said, and he would repeat it, that if London was lost, England would be in the most disastrous situation that ever a country was placed in without being conquered. In contemplating the possibility of such an event, he should say, that if we did not take every practicable precaution to prevent it, if we did not improve to the utmost all those means which

God had put into our hands of defending and securing those blessings which he had so bountifully bestowed upon this country, we should be guilty, not merely of culpable neglect, but of absolute impiety. But even supposing that the regular army was augmented in the way he had recommended, still he should think that we had not done enough. In the art of fortification great additional resources were to be found, whether for the obstruction of invasion, or for preventing the capital and other important points of the country from falling for a time into the enemy's hands, even in case of the army having suffered a defeat; and in this most important branch of every defensive system we were extremely deficient. He was well aware that the perfect execution of such a system was a work of time; but he would pledge himself to prove, that, even during the time that would be requisite for giving full effect to the present measure, and to that for raising the army of reserve, we might, without interfering with either of these operations, erect such fortifications as would add greatly to our strength and security. But in order to accomplish this, they must be set about, not in the usual routine of the ordnance department, but as a great and most important national work, undertaken with all the powers which the country is capable of exerting on an occasion in which its welfare and security were so deeply involved. His majesty should be empowered to command the services of whatever number of people might be necessary for the accomplishment of this great object, even though it should for a time interfere with our manufactures, or other ordinary occupations. He knew that in this country there existed a sort of prejudice against fortifications: the people had long been in the habit of looking for security against invasion, to the advantages of our natural frontier: hitherto we had most fortunately escaped the danger of this exaggerated confidence in our naval defence; but, that we had so escaped, was to be attributed to our never before having had to contend with such an enemy as we are now engaged with. There were four grand objects which, for the present, we ought principally to have in view in the erection of works: 1st, To secure our naval and military arsenals; 2dly, To increase the difficulties of landing within the narrow seas: 3dly, To obstruct the enemy's progress towards

London; and, 4thly, To defend the environs of the capital itself. With respect to the first, it was notorious that our principal depot of military stores was wholly undefended; and although our naval arsenals were in such a state that they could not be carried by assault, yet they were still exposed to the effects of a bombardment; and it would be easy to throw up works which would make it impossible for the enemy to construct batteries near enough to bombard them without previously making themselves masters of these advanced works by operations, which he did not conceive they would have time to accomplish. With respect to the second object, the defence of the coasts, he was well aware that it was impossible to fortify the whole of the coast of Great Britain and Ireland in such a manner as to prevent the enemy landing; but he could never agree with those who maintained, that because we cannot defend the whole of our coast, we are not to attempt the defence of any part of it: he could never subscribe to the extraordinary doctrine, that the frontier possessing greater natural advantages than any other in Europe, should be the only one incapable of being strengthened by the exertions of art. Within the time requisite for carrying into effect the present bill, and that for raising the army of reserve, we might fortify the coast from Yarmouth Roads to the Downs inclusive, in such a manner as to leave us little or no room for apprehension in that quarter, provided the thing was undertaken, as he had said before, not as a little ordnance job, but as a great and important national work. This was a strong assertion, but it was one by which he would abide. He spoke from some knowledge of a profession which he had assiduously studied; and he flattered himself he should gain credit for having studied it with some success, when he said, that the marquis Cornwallis had proposed making him his quarter-master general in Ireland, at a time when he was one of the youngest lieutenant colonels in the army. If the measure which he proposed was practicable, the effect of it, would be to deprive the enemy of a great part of the advantages which he derived from the possession of the ports of Flanders and Holland. He could hardly suppose that armaments issuing from these ports should be able to pass through the straits of Dover, and effect a landing on our southern coast, in co-operation with those proceeding from the ports of France in the Channel; and therefore the former, if equally shut out from that part of our eastern coast immediately opposite to their own, would be obliged to make for some more distant point to the northward of the Humber. This would oblige them to employ vessels of a larger size; and they would scarcely find an harbour nearer than Leith fit for the reception of such an armament. At all events, the attack from Holland would by this means be thrown to a great distance from the capital, and the two wings of the enemy's army would thus be prevented from acting in immediate co-operation with each other. The attack upon that part of our coast which is situated nearest to London, and within the narrow seas, would then be reduced to the armaments issuing from the French ports in the channel; which being in general tide harbours, are much less favourable for a great operation, and more easily watched by our naval force. He was by no means prepared to admit that it would be impossible to extend with effect this system of coast fortification from Yarmouth to Portsmouth: but supposing that to be impossible, it would be absurd to argue, that because we cannot secure the whole of the most vulnerable parts of our coast, it would therefore be useless to fortify any part. He should now proceed to state a few general hints on the third head, viz. that of impeding the enemy's progress towards the capital. From the different places at which a considerable disembarkation might be effected within the narrow seas, there were a certain number of great roads or lines of operation by which the enemy might advance to London. As these roads approached the centre, they of course united into a smaller number, and drew nearer to each other. What he proposed therefore was, that a line of defence should be marked out crossing all these great approaches in the situations the most advantageous for fighting great and decisive battles; that the principle positions which it might eventually become necessary to occupy upon this line of defence should be minutely reconnoitred; that the shortest military communication should be prepared behind the line, from one of these positions to the other, so as to enable our army to manœuvre behind the line with more rapidity than the enemy could do in front of it; and that two or three commanding points of each position, as well as some intermediate spots between the great positions, should be fortified by compact works, such as could not be carried by assault. Accurate plans should be drawn of every one of these positions, upon which should be marked not only all the works previously erected, but also all such as it would be adviseable to add in case of actual invasion; and they should even go so far as to describe exactly what hedges were to be left standing for defences, and what others should be cut down for the purpose of giving scope for the cavalry to act. That such works as he had mentioned were not now in existence was notorious: whether such plans had been drawn he could not pretend to say; but as when the enemy landed, it would require the co-operation of a great number of persons to complete these positions, he thought it would be advisable to communicate copies of these plans to a much greater number of persons than he believed to be at present in possession of them. The effect of this fortified line of defence would be, that it would check the enemy long enough to enable us to bring the mass of our force to act against him in front of London.—With respect to the fourth head, viz. the fortification of the immediate environs of London itself, he would not take up the time of the House by entering into details upon that subject; but would very willingly undertake to prove, in another place, that if great means were employed, it might be effected in a manner from which the most important advantages would be derived.—He could not conclude without noticing what had a few nights ago been suggested by Mr. Windham, respecting the establishment of a military council. In expressing his conviction that the greatest benefit might be expected from such an establishment, he felt that he should be wanting in gratitude, and in the respect which was so justly due to the illustrious commander in chief, if he did not acknowledge, that in his administration of the army he had rendered the most important services to his country. His staff, too, was composed of many excellent officers; but they were all so much occupied by a constant pressure of official business, that they could not possibly have time to digest a great system for the defence of the country, as completely as it might be expected to be done by a military council, composed of able and experienced men, who would be at liberty to devote the whole of their time to it. It was well known what advantages France had derived from a council of this sort, consisting of Carnot, la Fitte, and other scientific men. He hoped that the different topics which he had felt it his duty to press upon the attention of ministers would be seriously considered, and that they would leave nothing undone which could add to the security of the country.

The Secretary at War said, that he perfectly agreed with the hon. colonel in most, but not all of his observations, and lamented that so little attention was paid in this country to the art of fortification; though, since the year 1796 or 1797, great improvements had been made upon that system, and he hoped would be continued. He then proceeded to describe the constitution of the quarter-master general's office, which he said was so distributed as to embrace every thing connected with the military service. If the hon. officer went to that office, he would find that there were departments in it where all plans of the nature he alluded to were minutely drawn out and accurately considered; and that inquiry would, perhaps, have saved the hon. officer the trouble of giving the House such an able military lecture. He agreed with him, that the French were very well acquainted with this country; but by no means so well as with other countries of Europe, and very little, as it appeared, with the character of the people. The hon. gentleman advised to fortify London; he, on the contrary would say, "You ought not to fortify London." When we had a fleet, containing 80,000 men, and such an army as never before was heard of in this country, it would be a libel on the people to think of fortifying their metropolis. Before they talked of fortifying London, they ought to wait till some of the enemies' boats actually made their appearance in our roads; though he did not absolutely deny the possibility, or practicability, of their coming over in considerable force. But as to the effect of such an attempt, though he sincerely esteemed the high professional abilities of the hon. officer, he did not know that, in the English service, he had ever been engaged in any combined operations of the army and navy, so as to give him any superior means of judging of the dangers of debarkations. There were three reasons why he should not attempt to follow the arguments of the hon. gentlemen: 1st, because not being a military man, he was not able to do it; 2nd, because the hon. officer did not disapprove of the bill; and 3rd, because he approved of many of his observations. Though discussions of this kind were not very usual in parliament, he would make some allowances for them at a time when men's minds were so much occupied by such subjects; but he must remind the hon. gentleman, that there had been many other great military officers, who abstained always from such discussions, as thinking them better subjects for representation to the executive government, than for parliamentary lectures; and the more so, as in that House they could have no practical effect whatever. He then contended that several parts of the former speech went upon misconceptions; that there was a depôt in the quarter-master general's office for the preserving and examining of memoirs and military plans, &c. He still insisted that quiet times were the fittest for making changes, and not when the hostile armies were, as it were, drawn up in the face of each other.

Mr. Pitt said:—Much, Sir, of what has fallen from the gallant officer is entitled to great attention, and entirely meets my approbation; but I must observe, that these considerations are not now for the first time introduced. With regard to the best means of national defence, though much may remain to be done, yet government is not without ample information upon this subject. There is hardly one military district in the kingdom, of which the government have not at this moment in its possession ample memorials, prepared a considerable time before the termination of the late war, under the auspices of the illustrious commander-in-chief, containing a minute statement of the various points of resistance which are to be found on the coasts, and all the intermediate points of military defence between the different coasts and the capital. Ministers, I know, have now in their possession similar reports with regard to those counties which contain the great naval arsenals of the kingdom. They have also memorials upon the very subject alluded to by the hon. officer, that of protecting the mouths of our harbours, and particularly that of the mouth of the Humber; and, what I think of more importance still, though more remote, I mean the defence of Newcastle, which from its connexion with the wants of the capital, is obviously of such importance that it cannot be necessary to enlarge upon it. It is hardly necessary to recall to the recollection of the House, the names of the gallant officers who had the commands of the different districts in the last war. We had the advantage of the talents of sir Charles Grey, who commanded in the north. In the southern districts we had the advantage, of all the suggestions of the duke of Richmond. Besides these officers, we had general Dundas, who, from, his situation, had the means of extending his views over all the districts. During a period of the war also, the marquis Cornwallis had the command. Having the benefit of such assistance, it is impossible to suppose that we had not at that time a great mass of military information. I have already admitted, that although much has been done, still much material improvement may be ingrafted upon those plans which have been already procured. I hope and trust that ministers will not stop short until they have arranged a scheme of national safety, that shall for ever set at rest the vaunts of a foe whose ambition knows no limits. I am ready to admit that our regular army is not quite so great as we could wish, but we have provided means for augmenting it to a degree much greater than was ever known; and in addition to all this, we are now providing an immense irregular force. As far, therefore, as relates to the description and to the extent of our force, parliament has provided means, which to the hon. officer himself (honourably cautious, and anxious as he is for the safety of his country), appear sufficient to place this country in a state of absolute safety. Much, however, as I rejoice in seeing that object attained, and much as I am inclined to attend to the knowledge and experience of the hon. officer whose plan it was to take the militia at once into the regulars, I cannot bring my mind to concur in the idea which he has suggested for the attainment of that object; I cannot think of so deranging our immediate system of defence, if there were no other objections to it: I cannot think of breaking in upon the spirit of the militia as it now stands, for the purpose of transferring them into the regular army. I know that the privates in the militia feel, in common with the rest of their countrymen, the value of the sacred object for which they are to contend; that they are anxious to have an opportunity of showing that they would not give place to any other troops in his majesty's service in the ardour of their devotion to their country; but I know, at the same time, it is impossible to divest men of feelings, and motives by which they have been long actuated; and I know, that if a measure of this kind were adopted, from the partiality and affection which the officers bear towards the men whom they have trained, and have long had under their command, they would suffer much mutual regret in being separated. I should be sorry if there was one militia officer who did not feel proud in having his troops complete, and making his corps vie with the best disciplined troops in his majesty's service. As such, then, are their feelings, in the same proportion must be their reluctance to see those men transferred from their officers into other regiments. I think I may venture to assert, that if you take a number of Englishmen under the command of proper officers and with a proper degree of discipline, they must and will, especially when under the superintendence of regular generals, and mixed with regular troops, furnish for the present occasion a force so great, so respectable, and so useful, that it would be very unwise to hazard the making it less so, either by reducing their number, or by wounding their feelings; by making them think worse of themselves by your showing that you thought worse of them; by making an invidious comparison between different kinds of troops; and by creating that worst of all feelings, a rivalry tinged with animosity. The hon. officer, however, not only wishes for this strong measure, but calls upon the militia officers to give their aid in transferring over to regiments of the line, those men on whose discipline they had bestowed so much pains. This is a sacrifice that can hardly be expected; but even if it could, there are other arguments against the adoption of this plan. In the first place, the danger is immediate, and the measure now proposed is one that must take up some time in its operation, and during that time the discipline of the corps must be necessarily loosened; and, therefore, I very much doubt whether, in such a pressing danger, the remedy suggested could be with safety adopted. The measures which have lately been adopted by parliament, have, in my mind, taken off much of the weight of the arguments which have been drawn from the necessity of augmenting the army of the line, by transferring the militia into it; because, means have already been taken for increasing the army of the line very considerably, by means less grating to the feelings of individuals than that now proposed. By placing a large proportion of the 40,000 men that are to be raised as the army of reserve in Great Britain, with regiments of the line, by permitting such of them as think proper, to enter into the regulars for general service, parliament has done much to increase the regular army, and to preclude them from the necessity of adopting the hazardous experiment which the hon. officer recommends. I believe it is universally admitted, that new recruits poured into an old corps which has a number of experienced officers, will much sooner acquire a knowledge of discipline and become good soldiers, than they will if they are left in a corps by themselves, whatever pains may be taken in their instruction. Taking that as an established point, I was, therefore, surprised when I heard the secretary at war, instead of proposing to diffuse the 40,000 men of the army of reserve over the thirty-nine or forty battalions that are in England, talk of dividing them among thirteen battalions, by which means all the advantage which they would derive from the instruction of a great number of old and experienced officers would be very much diminished. Our situation, in point of security, will certainly be improved by the adoption of the measure which is now before us; but it must be recollected, that while it improves, it alters our situation: if we had voted only the army of reserve, undoubtedly it might be filled with able and experienced officers from the half pay list; but we must recollect, that in addition to the army of reserve, we have voted an army of between 3 and 400,000 men. That we shall have no difficulty in procuring the men who are to compose this force, I am perfectly satisfied, because the spirit of the country is now roused in the capital, and will from thence rapidly pervade the extremities of the empire; but we shall want the means of preparing and drilling them, with accuracy. Does it not then occur to the House that we shall have infinitely more use for the services of officers not attached to regiments? that in addition to the noblemen, the gentry, and the yeomanry of the country, many of whom will serve as officers, it would be advisable, to every three or four officers of this description, to add one or two from the half-pay list?—There was not, Sir, any opinion delivered by the hon. officer which I heard with more pleasure than those which related to the propriety of having recourse to field fortification on the present occasion, of taking the necessary measures to secure our naval arsenals from a bombardment, even from the greatest possible distance. As to the propriety of erecting fortifications upon some parts of our coasts, I know well, the general prejudice which prevails; I know very well that when such a proposition is made, the answer is; What will you build a wall round the whole island? No, Sir, that was not the proposition made by the hon. officer. He spoke only of the propriety of fortifying particular places or the mouths of great rivers, such as the Humber; and I perfectly concur with him. I see the propriety, and even the necessity, of partial fortifications of this kind. By the adoption of the plan, you would be able, in the first instance, to oppose the landing of the enemy, and, if he should effect a landing, to meet him immediately. But which we should manage and spare by every precaution that human foresight can inspire. The third object to which the hon. officer alluded, was that of employing fortification on the lines of internal defence. This rests upon a principle so plain, that though it requires military knowledge to state it distinctly yet it only requires the plainest common sense to see the advantage that must result from it; it is as clear as any demonstration in mathematics. If then this plan does promise such advantages, I am sure I shall not hear any objections started on the ground of expense. But it is said, we ought not to fortify London because our ancestors did not fortify it. Why, Sir, that is no argument, unless you can show me that our ancestors were in the same situation that we are. We might as well be told that, because our ancestors fought with arrows and with lances, we ought to use them now, and that we ought to consider shields and corslets as affording a secure defence against musketry and artillery. If the fortification of the capital can add to the security of the country, I think it ought to be done. If by the erection of works such as I am recommending, you can delay the progress of the enemy for three days, it may make the difference between the safety and the destruction of the capital. It will not, I admit, make a difference between the conquest and the independence of the country, for that will not depend upon one nor upon ten battles; but it may make the difference between the loss of thousands of lives, with misery, havoc, and desolation, spread over the country on the one hand—or, on the other, of frustrating the efforts of confounding the exertions, and of chastising the insolence of the enemy.—If then I am right in my general view of this subject, the expense and the time of constructing these works are so diminished, that, late as it is, there is nothing that ought to prevent us from now making the attempt. It is well known that in the course of last war a detailed plan was prepared, resembling in many particulars the plan recommended by the hon. officer. A plan was, I say, completely digested, a survey taken, and the works actually traced by that able officer, general Dundas. This plan is not therefore new to military men, it is not new to the king's councils, it is not founded upon any want of confidence in our army, our navy, or ourselves; it does not arise from any apprehensions of the enemy, but it is founded upon this principle—that while we set no limits to the exertions of the people, we ought to omit no opportunity of shortening the contest, and of preventing that havoc which must attend a lengthened contest, even though it may end most successfully for this country. Englishmen must look to this as a species of contest from which, by the extraordinary favour of Divine Providence, we have been for a series of years exempted. If we are at length called upon to take our share in it, we must meet it with gratitude for the exemptions we have hitherto enjoyed, and a firm determination to support it with courage and resolution.

The bill was then passed.

Debate in the Commons on the Property Duty Bill.] July 5. On the order of the day for going into a committee on this bill being read,

Mr. Alderman Combe said, he conceived himself bound to oppose the bill from the instructions he had received from his constituents; who considered it a measure so unjust in its principle, and partial in its operation, that no modification of it could remove their objections. He considered this tax as merely an income tax, which he had always opposed, because it raised an equal sum upon incomes of unequal duration; upon the precarious produce of industry; and upon permanent income.

The Lord Mayor had also been instructed to oppose it, but considered himself at liberty to act according to the dictates of his conscience. He should however, watch the progress of the bill with great attention.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he never considered the old income tax as any thing but a war tax: there was this difference, however, between that and the present, namely, that the proportion now demanded was not so large, and that in incomes from land or interest of money, no particular disclosure was required. As there has been already such considerable sums raised upon consumption, it was but fair that property itself should be taxed, or otherwise it would be impossible to carry into execution the resolution of the House, for raising within the year a considerable part of the expenses of the year.

Mr. W. Smith objected to the tax, principally on the ground, that it was in reality an income tax, and not a tax upon property; considering it in that light, he thought it unjust, that a precarious income, derived from great mental or bodily labour, should pay an equal tax with an income which was permanent, and obtained without exertion.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that the income tax was not more unequal than every other species of tax. As to the principle that had been suggested, of making a distinction between incomes of a precarious and of a more permanent nature, this was a distinction which the legislature had never recognized in any case. The land tax, poor-rates, &c. had been always raised from the produce of the land, without considering the tenure.

Mr. Erskine was ready to support the present tax, not that he approved of it in principle, but because he was convinced of the necessity of making great exertions at so perilous a moment as the present. He felt it necessary, that great sacrifices should be made, and although he felt that his own professional income was not worth above two years purchase, he would gladly give up any part of it that could be asked, for the general service of the country.

The bill was recommitted.

July 13. The order of the day for the further consideration of the report of the committee on the said bill being read,

Mr. W. Smith entered at length into the principle and provisions of the bill. He was of opinion that the funds ought to be taxed in a larger proportion than land, because the latter was subject to many burthens from which the former was exempted. As to the tax on trade, his grand objection was, that if the tax were to be levied at all, it should be equally collected, and that appeared to him impossible, unless by the establishment of an inquisition, which would be much more intolerable than any tax. Could any man who felt the pride of independence endure such a measure? It was such an outrage upon the popular opinion, as a prudent minister ought to have avoided. If the tax, however, was to be persisted in, equality of payment was desirable, but how was that to be obtained? — By disclosures which could not be enforced, but by a violation of every principle of freedom. It had been stated, that without this measure no means could be devised of imposing a fair contribution suited to the circumstances of men; but it was a mistake to suppose that this was such a contribution as he described. It would press upon the trading community very little indeed; for they would remunerate themselves by increased profits for any burthens imposed upon them.

Mr. Pitt defended the old income tax. It was, he said, adopted at a time when the gloom of despondency hung over the minds of the most firm, and when fear and apprehension was to be found among the most loyal. Then that gloom and that fear considerably obstructed the progress of a measure, which, it was said, would increase the gloom and destroy the spirit of the country. But what were the consequences of this much abused measure? Why, that subsequently to its adoption the spirit of the country grew up with rapidity and vigour, its triumphs extended, its good fortune, as it were, revived. — With respect to the provisions of the bill, there were many of which he strongly disapproved. The modes of disposing of capital should not be interfered with, through the operation of a partial tax, tending to encourage the application of that capital to one mode in preference to another. Those modes were various. One man likes to employ his capital in a business which requires great labour, and from which he looks for proportionate profits; another seeks to derive profits from his capital in great risks; and a third chooses to indulge in idleness, and to enjoy a small profit in security. Of the latter, some resort to the funds, and others to land. Any attempt to meddle, by a legislative measure, with this, the usual and spontaneous distribution of property, would be highly unjust, and tend to violate the very character of an income tax. The great mass of property to be found in this country should be left to find its own level. If taxes are to be levied, they should be accommodated to the present state of property, which should in no case be disturbed. Every man had, to be sure, the right of disposing of his capital as he pleased. But, in a country like this, it would be unwise to encourage any man, by a partial tax, to give his capital, a particular direction; yet such was the tendency of certain clauses, which he hoped would be corrected in the committee. The tax upon income should, according to its principle, be universal, and no man should be suffered to escape its operation, but under certain circumstances, not to include the exemption, or unequal taxation, of any particular class of proprietors.—His objections to the bill referred to the principle of the abatements on small incomes, in which land proprietors occupy their own property, and small annuities in the funds were most unequally treated (the latter, in fact, involving little short of a breach of public faith), and those too of that class of persons who were really entitled to compassion. It was proposed in the bill to make various abatements to persons having annual revenue not exceeding 150*l.* and all under 60*l.* a year to be entirely discharged from the tax. From this exemption, however, the landed proprietors and receivers of interest in the funds to such amount were excluded. He could not conceive the grounds upon which this exclusion was professed to rest. It certainly was, with respect to the funds, a breach of the principle upon which loans had been contracted for; and what effects such an innovation was likely to have upon any future loan he would not pretend to say. For this strange difference in the application, he was aware of but one argument, namely, that it was fair to take a distinction between the profits of capital employed in industry and that not arising from the same source. This distinction he thought the very reverse of wisdom; for if an equal tax was imposed on the revenue of the land owner, and the profits of the man in trade, the deductions should be the same from both. Why should persons of humble revenue in the funds and in land be made the sacrifices of this singular difference, while those of superior revenues were left quite untouched?—Mr. Pitt next called the attention of the House to the situation of many of those who were to be made liable to the whole tax without any abatements, who had claims to abatement much more powerful than numerous classes of possessors of other property to whom abatements were extended. When it was considered that many of those to be affected by it were the aged and the infirm, altogether incapable of increasing their income by any exertion of their own; that their wretched pittance could receive no possible augmentation; was it consistent either with humanity, far less justice, to lay them under a pressure so severe? The principle of the bill as it now stood, was unfair; if it were allowed to remain, the same regulation ought to be extended to property in the funds as to all the lower species of property. But, above all, he deprecated the proposed regulation as inconsistent with national good faith, and as calculated to strike the first blow against that credit for which the country had been so long distinguished. In every loan bill the fundamental principle was, that there should be no deduction from the dividends of those who became the creditors of the public. Some persons had carried this so far as to contend that they ought not to be included in a general tax on income. He was at least confident that it was inconsistent with the justice of parliament to place those who had lent money to the public in a worse situation than at the time when the money was advanced. There was no violation of any compact with the public creditor in making property arising from the funds be considered as a part of general income; but from the moment that the funds were separately taxed, what foundation could the public creditor rest upon in any future loan which it might be necessary to raise for the public service? It would indeed be most extraordinary if, at the time that we were, for the purpose of upholding the character of parliament, and maintaining the good faith of the country, paying every year upwards of six millions to the extinction of the national debt, we should, for the sake of gaining a revenue of a few hundred thousand pounds, resort to a tax which might strike at the root of public credit, and materially injure the future resources of the country. Such a step was peculiarly unseasonable at a moment when the propriety of raising a large portion of the supplies within the year had met the universal approbation of all parts of the House. As soon as the motion for taking the report into further consideration was disposed of, he would move an instruction to the committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if it could be proved that the operation of the tax would be inconsistent with humanity, he should not persevere in pressing it. But unless this could be made out, he should support it, as a tax the best calculated to raise a large portion of the supplies within the year. Till that night he was not aware that there was any objection to the plan of raising a tax on the profits arising from capital. It was not meant that any distinction should be formed betwixt the different species of capital. It was to the income arising from this capital that the provisions of the act were to apply. The various species of capital were proposed to be divided into capital in landed property, property in the funds, and money arising from interest or annuities. The other denomination of property to which the act was to extend arose from income dependent upon personal exertions, or arising from professions. Every exertion had been made to render the operation of the tax on income and capital as equal as possible, while means had been employed to prevent the tax applicable to capital from being superadded to personal labour and industry. On this principle, the ratio had been established from 60*l.* to 150*l.* a year in estimating the exemptions and abatements. The funds stood exactly on the same footing in the application of the tax as landed and other species of property. As to the equality of the operation of the tax, it was formed on principles which appeared the best calculated to promote that most important object. He had no objection to the present tax being called an income tax, except that he thought that the title assigned to it more fully described its nature. He thought the proposition for instructing the committee unnecessary and irregular. It could only embarrass the proceedings of the committee, without at all binding their decisions.

Mr. Pitt then moved, "That it be an instruction to the said committee, that they do make provision in the said bill, that the like exemptions and abatements shall be allowed to persons possessed of income arising from land or from property in the public funds, as shall be allowed on the like amount of income arising from any other description of property, trade, profession or employment."—A long conversation ensued, in the course of which, the chancellor of the exchequer expressed his surprise at Mr. Pitt's unexpected motion: after which the House divided: Yeas, 50; Noes, 150.

July 14. The House having resolved itself into a committee on the bill,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said:—Sir, I have considered the sentiments which were thrown out last night, with regard to exemptions, and am decidedly of the opinion, that no breach of good faith could possibly attach on the supposed distinction between income arising from trade and other species of income. I would beg the committee to advert to the principles of the bill, in considering of the propriety of the alteration about to be submitted to them. It is proposed to make a distinction between the income arising from capital, and that arising from bodily labour and skill. In those cases where the income is produced by a combination of interest, from capital, and that arising from bodily labour, it was my wish to grant indulgence, so that no person should pay more than 5*l.* when his income amounted to less than 150*l.* The interest arising from capital is then one which may be fairly fixed with the tax. I mean to propose an exception from the principle of the bill, in so far as regards that sort of income which arises not from bodily labour, but from the learned professions, which is even more extensive than that arising from capital. Of all the cases of hardship to which this tax can apply, I conceive that it is most severe on the income arising from that species of industry. It will not be the policy of parliament at this time to exclude the income arising from that source, however, from contributing a fair sum towards the present exigencies. There is no one who arrives to great attainments in such professions as I allude to, who has not acquired a considerable proportion of capital; and you are, therefore, to combine the advantages which he thus derives, not from bodily labour, but from the labour of the mind, with the income arising from his capital. Almost every person engaged in trade, may carry on that trade by means of representatives; but persons engaged in the learned professions must give in person that advice which is necessary; for no proxy can possibly be admitted. It is absolutely impossible to apply an unobjectionable mode of taxation. I feel the difficulty of extending the exemptions, on account of creating a prodigious addition to the trouble of the commissioners. It does not appear to me, however, to be unjust or irrational to make a distinction, between capital arising from trade yielding a large interest, and that which yields a moderate income. No defalcation of any consequence would arise from the proposed exemption. There is no ground for a charge of violation of faith. It may be a matter of surprise to the committee, that after considering the subject with great anxiety, I should now feel disposed to think, under the present circumstances, that the public creditors should enjoy some exemption from the present tax. I am inclined to join in the wish which was pretty generally expressed last night, to extend the exemptions to persons deriving their incomes from land to the amount of 150*l.* and to propose a scale for that purpose. But I must fairly own that I do this with great difficulty. It is a difficulty, however, which I am satisfied may be got the better of, at the expense of what is highly important towards the preservation of the bill—the avoiding disclosure and contributing towards the ease of collecting the tax. Sir, this is a moment, when above all others, I am glad to see a reluctance in gentlemen to acquiesce in the adoption of any measure which may tend to injure the feelings of any class of individuals. It is most desirable to carry with us the opinions and feelings of that very description of persons for whom I have been brought to reconcile my mind to these exemptions. They constitute a very considerable proportion of the yeomanry, whose zeal, spirit, and ardent love of their country, have been manifested in a conspicuous manner during the last ten years, and never more alive to that ardent zeal than at the present moment. I am assured that an expectation was entertained by them, that they would experience the indulgence of the legislature, and that persons of a given income would not be subject to be taxed so fully as others. But having said this, I must acknowledge, that I look forward to some degree of defalcation in the amount of the tax, which will create a necessity, if the war should continue, for parliament to act up to its avowed principle, of raising the supplies within the year.

Mr. Pitt said, he had heard the observations of the chancellor of the exchequer with inexpressible satisfaction. They had freed his mind from those objections which, had the measure been persisted in as it originally stood, would not have prevented him from supporting the bill in general. His objections could not have prevented him supporting the system of raising great part of the supplies within the year. But he thought the dangers would have counteracted the advantages of the plan. He was most anxious that there should be a probability of every man concurring in the measure in general, and in every part of it. Though in the detail there might be considerable difficulties, he trusted there would be none as to the fundamental principles. Understanding that the point which formed the basis of his objection was given up, he was not anxious to tread over the controversy, or to advert to the motives which might have produced the changes.

The bill, after being repeatedly committed, passed the House on the 1st of August.

The King's Message respecting the House of Orange.] July 21. Lord Hawkesbury presented the following Message from his Majesty:

“GEORGE R.

“His Majesty having taken into his consideration the situation of the illustrious House of Orange, the bonds of alliance and affinity which subsists between his Majesty and that House, the important services which have been rendered by them to this country on so many occasions, and the losses which they sustained in the course of the last war, recommends these circumstances to the serious attention of the House of Commons; and his Majesty relies on the justice and liberality of this House, to enable him to make such pecuniary allowances to this illustrious family as may appear to be warranted by a consideration of their present situation, and of their claims on the generosity of this country. G. R.”

July 25. The said Message was taken into consideration in the committee of supply.

Lord Hawkesbury represented, that the proposition he was to make in favour of the House of Orange, was a claim binding in gratitude and generosity. This country had for the last century, found no ally more faithful than the illustrious, but unfortunate House of Orange; nor could the important services, rendered by William the 3rd, in bringing about our glorious Revolution, be ever forgotten by Englishmen. After the peace of Amiens, the Dutch offered indemnities to the prince of Orange, only on condition, that we should restore the ships taken in his name. That was refused by this country; some indemnity was therefore due from us. What he proposed was, that a sum of 60,000*l.* should be granted for the benefit of his family, and a pension of 16,000*l.* per annum, during the pleasure of his majesty.

Mr. Canning disapproved highly of the conduct of ministers, in the negotiation. He thought they ought to have remonstrated directly with France, and to have retained in their own hands sufficient pledges for the fulfilment of this part of the treaty.

Sir F. Burdett severely reprobated the proposition, which he considered one of the most indecorous that could possibly be brought forward. If the prince of Orange had betrayed his own country to the interests of our government, he deserved no compensation: if, on the contrary, it was for her own interests that Holland went to war, it was England that should claim compensation from Holland, and not Holland from England. If the prince of Orange was now to obtain indemnity for his losses, the elector of Hanover might next demand compensation for the loss of that country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the value of the ships taken, in the name of the prince of Orange, was 150,000*l.* As we refused to restore those ships to Holland, who offered, on that condition, to give indemnity to the prince, that circumstance, certainly gave him a claim, if not upon the justice, at least upon the generosity of the British nation.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The King's Message relative to the Rebellion in Ireland.] July 28. The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented the following Message from his Majesty:

“His Majesty feels the deepest regret in acquainting the House of Commons, that a treasonable and rebellious spirit of insurrection has manifested itself in Ireland, which has been marked by circumstances of peculiar atrocity in the city of Dublin. His Majesty relies with perfect confidence on the wisdom of his Parliament, that such measures will be forthwith adopted as are best calculated to afford protection and security to his Majesty's loyal subjects in that part of the United Kingdom, and to restore and preserve general tranquillity. G. R.”

The Message being read from the Chair, The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to move an Address of Thanks thereon. He said:—There must exist in this House a general anticipation of those feelings and sentiments which his majesty has entertained in making the present communication. There is also, I am persuaded, a disposition to justify and repay that confidence, by adopting such measures as may be best suited to the present conjuncture. Government had every reason to suppose, that the contamination of principles which had produced in former years, the calamities of rebellion in Ireland had been completely done away. These hopes, I am sorry to say, have been disappointed. Notwithstanding, however, all that has happened, I am convinced that the great majority of the people of Ireland are loyal to their king, and anxious to support the present happy constitution. Lamentable, indeed, it is, at this critical juncture, that any portion of his majesty's subjects should have been laying plans for the overthrow of that constitution under which they have enjoyed so many blessings. I am persuaded, however, that the number of those who are rebelliously disposed, is but small. I shall lay before the House, after this question is disposed of, information concerning the particular instances of insurrection contained in the proclamation issued by the lord-lieutenant in Ireland; but I cannot conceive that any information can be reckoned necessary to persuade the House to agree to the address which I am about to propose; namely, “That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to return his Majesty the thanks of this House for his most gracious Message; to assure his Majesty, that we learn with the strongest feelings of regret and indignation, that a treasonable and rebellious spirit of insurrection has manifested itself in Ireland, which has been marked with circumstances of peculiar atrocity in the city of Dublin; that his Majesty may be assured of the readiness and determination of his faithful Commons, to adopt forthwith such measures as may appear to them to be best calculated to afford protection and security to his Majesty's loyal subjects in that part of the United Kingdom, and to restore and preserve general tranquillity."

Mr. Windham said:—Sir, the proposing of an address to the throne, upon the same day on which his majesty's message has been delivered, is exceedingly unusual. I think it respectful to the crown, to make a small interval of time betwixt a message and an address, because it testifies more strongly the degree of attention which parliament have paid to it. The objects comprehended by this message are not at present fit for mature consideration. I conceive a great deal of information to be wanted, before we can frame an address proper for the occasion. When we have something more than this general communication of a rebellion having broken out in Ireland, many different reflections may arise out of the particulars in regard to what this House ought to do. Is it easy to say, that Ireland has been surprised by open rebellion; that government have been so ignorant of the danger that even the capital has been nearly wrested from them by means of that rebellion? Are not these points on which the House should be informed, before they adopt an answer to such a communication? For my part, I cannot conceive it possible, that the peasants of Ireland whose minds were lately so agitated, should, all of a sudden become perfectly loyal and peaceable subjects.

Mr. Sheridan said, he rose not to answer any argument, for he had heard none, but merely to express his astonishment, that any member could start an objection to a measure of so much urgency. He concluded by describing eloquently, the sufferings which a delay of twenty-four hours might occasion to the loyal inhabitants of Ireland.

Mr. Hutchinson cordially supported the address, and expressed the greatest sorrow for the outrages that had disgraced the part of the united kingdom from which he came. Whatever were his feelings towards his country, he should vote for strong measures upon the present occasion.

Lord Hawkesbury replied with great warmth to Mr. Windham, he said that right hon. gentleman had formerly been troubled with no such qualms or delicate scruples as he was at present; he had frequently before voted for addresses on the same day the message had been delivered. The proposition of delay was perfectly absurd in such an emergency as the present; the only tendency of his objection was, to show that there did not exist a perfect unanimity in that House.

Dr. Laurence insisted, that the whole system of ministers consisted in blinding the people, and preventing them from seeing the real state of affairs. They had constantly withheld information, and they now demanded a hasty vote, from passion and not from deliberation.

Lord Castlereagh replied; and after some observations from Mr. Alexander and Mr. Archdall, the question on the address was put, and carried unanimously.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then laid before the House a copy of the Proclamation issued by the lord-lieutenant and privy council of Ireland, offering rewards for apprehending the murderers of lord Kilwarden and the reverend Mr. Wolfe, which being read by the clerk at the table, the right hon. gentleman said:—Sir the House will have observed, from the proclamation which has been just read that the melancholy outrage which it describes was, in the opinion of his majesty's government, the result of dangerous and traitorous insurrection; and nothing should induce me to bring forward the proposition which I intended this day to offer for the adoption of this House, if I thought the horrid outrage was the result of ordinary riot, or any other species of attack than one intended directly against the state; and I am free to admit there could be no other ground which could justify a proposition for narrowing the liberty of the subject or trenching in any degree upon the principles of the constitution. It is with the utmost pain I feel the necessity of bringing forward such a measure. The communication just submitted to the House, does not furnish details of the circumstance attending this atrocious business so full as could be wished, in order to prove that it was the result of a treasonable insurrection. But there are occasions when parliament may feel itself justified in the adoption of vigorous measures. Such I mean this day to propose, upon the solemn assurance of his majesty's ministers, that circumstances exist to warrant the adoption of vigorous measures. This insurrection was obviously concerted with the enemy, and attempted at a moment when invasion menaced our shores. The bill which I have to propose is not one to enable the government in Ireland to declare martial law in districts where insurrection exists, for that is a power which his majesty already possesses, but a bill purporting to be for the protection of the lives and properties of his majesty's loyal subjects, and for the better suppression of insurrection and rebellion; and the object of which will be, to enable the lord-lieutenant when any persons shall be taken in rebellion, to order them to be tried immediately by a court-martial. I do not mean to give even the lord-lieutenant of Ireland the power of superseding by martial law the operation of the civil code, nor to deprive the subject in civil cases of the advantages derived from the ordinary course of the law of the land. Should the House adopt the present motion, I should follow it up with another, for leave to bring in a bill to suspend, for a time to be limited, the Habeas Corpus act in Ireland. This bill is calculated to effect, if possible, by more lenient means, the suppression of those crimes which, without this suspension, must force the government to the necessity of bringing to trial, by court-martial, persons against whom suspicions of high-treason are entertained; but by detaining such persons in custody, we prevent them from engaging in treasonable machinations; and persons so arrested may be tried in the ordinary process of the law without any military interference. It has been said, that the present is a case which calls for delay and inquiry; but, Sir, if ever there was a case which called for promptitude and unanimity it is the measure of this day. What! shall we be told, when rebellion has actually broken out, and every moment is pregnant with danger, that we are to hesitate before we arm the government with powers for its suppression. When the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham) was a member of his majesty's government, a bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus passed through both Houses in a single day. There have been many other instances of bills equally urgent in their nature having passed with similar expedition; and if the present measure be at all fit for adoption, it is fit to be adopted without a moment's delay. Without wishing that government should be screened from any responsibility, I call upon the House not to expose Ireland to public danger by delay. And here it is I am induced to admire the conduct of an hon. gentleman (Mr. Sheridan), which presents a contrast to that of the other hon. member. That hon. gentleman, laying aside all considerations of party, comes forward on every occasion to give his support and assistance to the preservation of his country. At a time when a mutiny in the fleet unhappily broke out, he was found to give his assistance to government. In 1798, when the country was threatened with invasion—at a subsequent period, when the ravages of famine seemed to menace the land—and when, on a late occasion a dispute with the northern powers was likely to involve the country in great difficulty, that hon. gentleman has uniformly brought his great powers into action for the general good. On the latter occasion, when other gentlemen were accusing ministers of culpable neglect, and denouncing heavy charges against them, he exclaimed, "Let us now think only of securing the ship if she be in danger; and when it is past, we can bring the captain to account. Let us not talk about who is the minister, but consider who is the enemy to cope with." It is sentiments like these which will, in the page of history, stamp immortal glory on his name. The right hon. gentleman then moved for leave to bring in the bill.

Mr. Windham did not mean to question the propriety of the measure; the necessity for which rested upon the declaration of ministers, with the aid of the little knowledge which had been disclosed by the proclamation. He could not help observing, that it was owing to the peace [of Amiens that the present necessity existed. The right hon. gentleman seemed to be dealing out his eulogies with an unsparing hand.

Mr. Sheridan said:—It is impossible for me not to feel grateful for the praise bestowed on my conduct by the chancellor of the exchequer. The learned gentleman has borrowed a joke from his right hon. leader (Mr. Windham), in saying that I have this day fixed the side which I am espousing. My answer is, that I challenge either of them to point out a single act of mine which admits of the comment. I defy either of them to show that I have ever abandoned any one political principle which I have professed—forfeited one public pledge which I have given—or deserted any political attachment which I have formed. If my learned friend wants information respecting changing sides, and alteration of political connexions, he should apply to his right hon. neighbour, and not to me. He has indeed gone the round of all sides. I sat with him on this side of the House a long time, until he found a golden opportunity to cross over to those whom no man amongst us had been more strenuous in opposing. He then sat on the treasury bench opposite to me, just as long as he could. He then made a diagonal motion to his present situation, where I sincerely hope he may remain. But the right hon. gentleman accuses me of giving a new support to ministers inconsistent with my former conduct respecting them. Now, I have never engaged in opposition to the present administration. One only act of theirs I opposed, and severely reprehended; and that was the bill of indemnity to shield and cover that right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. But were I to admit, that at its first formation I did not think so well of this administration, where is the inconsistency in my supporting measures brought forward by them, which meet my sincere approbation? I have never, like that right hon. gentleman, professed sincere and unalterable attachment, to one man, and then deserted, reviled, and opposed him. I have never, like that right hon. gentleman, held out my political opponent as a master piece of corruption and hypocrisy, or boasted, that I had bared the “filthy dowlas,” which skulked under his flowery robe, and then placed myself at his feet, wrapped in a remnant of that dowlas. These things I have not done. What I will do, is to give an humble but sincere and zealous support to an administration so virulently and unfairly assailed, as long as I see them executing, according to the best of their judgment, the important duties which belong to the situation in which they are placed. I claim no merit in saying that this support shall be most disinterested. It shall be free from all colour, or suspicion, that in giving it, I am influenced by any motive, but a sincere and heartfelt love of my country—a country which, in my soul and conscience, I believe contains the best, the worthiest, and the happiest community in the universe.

After some farther debate, the bill went through its several stages, and was passed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable the lord lieutenant of Ireland to secure and detain such persons as he should suspect to be conspiring against his majesty's person and government. The bill was brought up, carried through all its stages, and passed. A clause was introduced into the two bills for limiting their duration to six weeks after the commencement of the next session. The bills were sent to the Lords, and, at half past ten o'clock, a message came down informing the House that the Lords had agreed to the same without any amendment.

Aug. 5. In a committee on the bill to amend the Military Service bill,

Mr. Wilberforce disapproved of the distinction made between those who served in volunteer corps, and those who should serve in the levy en masse.

The Secretary at War explained, that when the number of volunteers should be sufficient for the defence of the country, it had been the intention of the legislature to empower his majesty to suspend the operation of the act.

Mr. Windham disapproved of the volunteer corps, as forming bodies of aristocracy for the defence of the country, from which some were excluded from not being able to purchase uniforms, and others from that kind of modesty, which declined the distinction of a red coat, and prevented men from associating with those superior to themselves in rank. His opinion on that subject, was much strengthened by observations he had met in the public prints; in which he but seldom found any thing worthy attention.

Mr. Sheridan ridiculed this attack on the public prints, and said, that although the daily papers presented nothing worthy the right hon. gentleman's notice, yet there was a certain weekly paper (Cobbett's Register), to which he appeared more partial. For his part, he was candid enough to allow, that there was some merit in that print [Mr. W. bowed]. The right hon. gentleman answered with a condescending bow, he should therefore go no farther, for fear of hurting the feelings and blushing modesty of an author, perhaps the right hon. gentleman wrote a little for that publication. He liked the present bill, because it went to increase the number of volunteers.

Every body must allow, that the volunteers of the metropolis were much superior in discipline and efficiency to what could be expected from an equal number of men, raised by the levy en masse. It was, however a very good hint to men to turn volunteers, to know that if they did not, they might, in the course of a single month, find themselves in the ranks of common soldiers; subject to be tied up to the halberts, if they were to give a saucy answer to the serjeant.

Mr. Windham said, that the hon. gentleman had shown all the zeal of a new convert, in supporting administration, and, like a raw recruit, had fired off his musket, without ascertaining where the enemy was. He contended, that all this complicated machinery brought forward by government for the defence of the country, was not likely to add a single man to its effective or disposable force. In speaking of the press, he allowed that it now showed some ardour and energy, but it acted like the hon. gentleman: first it did all the mischief it could, and set the world on fire, and now it came with its bucket of water to extinguish it. He then panegyricized Mr. Cobbett, who he said, merited a statue of gold for his conduct in America, before he came to this country. That writer had resolutely opposed all the bad principles which had been propogated for the last ten years on politics, including those which the hon. gentleman had so often urged in that House.

Mr. Sheridan was happy the forms of a committee allowed him a second shot which he did not mean to fire in the air. He said, he was neither convert nor recruit. He had always, when the country was in a critical situation, lent his support to government; in this support, however, he was no recruit; he would accept neither rank nor pay, but should serve as a volunteer. He wished the right hon. gentleman would publish a book to be called "The art of raising the spirit of a country; by a late secretary at war;" for certainly the means taken by that right hon. gentleman in parliament, were the most whimsical that had ever been thought of: first, he endeavoured to persuade the people that the country was lost, unless one specific individual was made the minister; and that all their resources must be mismanaged and ill directed by the present government; secondly, that our honour was irrecoverably gone, and that our militia and volunteers were good for nothing.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended government from the charge of unnecessary delay. This measure could not with any propriety have been adopted until the foundation of the army of reserve had been first laid. He considered that there never was a man who more completely misconceived the means of raising the spirit of a country, than Mr. Windham appeared to have done, in endeavouring to lead the people to their duty, by instilling groundless fears and alarms.

Debate on Colonel Craufurd's Motion relative to the Defence of the Country.

Aug. 2. Colonel Craufurd rose to make his promised motion. Before he entered upon the subject, he assured the House it was his intention studiously to abstain from any details which, from being made public, might have an injurious tendency. He thought, however, that all this secrecy was needless. There could be no doubt but the situation of the country and of its coasts, were well known to the enemy. If we could take a peep into the Bureau de la Guerre at Paris, or into Buonaparté's cabinet, we should find plans—[Here Mr. Frankland moved the standing order of the House, for the exclusion of strangers: and the gallery remained shut for the remainder of the evening.]—The hon. officer concluded his speech with moving, "That, as it now appears to be in the contemplation of his majesty's government to erect works in the neighbourhood of London, in case an enemy should, by any extraordinary fortune of war, be able to approach the metropolis, it is the opinion of this House, that such a precaution will be highly wise and expedient; but that the efficacy of this and other measures of the same description, in different parts of the kingdom, must materially depend on their being executed before the disembarkation of an enemy shall have actually taken place: And the House will most cheerfully concur in granting to his majesty such powers, and making good such expenses as may be found necessary, for the most speedy and effectual accomplishment of these highly important objects."—Upon this, a long debate ensued, and an hon. member moved, "That the other orders of the day be now read." The only

Mr. Francis said : Mr. Speaker, in submitting my thoughts to the House on the present motion, I hope I shall not be suspected of pretending to military knowledge, or of thinking myself at all equal to the discussion of questions purely military. But there are some points of very great importance, which the motion naturally brings into view, and of which the common sense of any man, without professional information, may form a rational opinion. On some of these, I request your indulgence to be heard for a few minutes. First, however, I think myself bound to take notice of two things advanced by an hon. gentleman on the other side (Mr. H. Brown), in answer to an hon. bart. (sir F. Burdett) behind me, of whom he affirmed that he was a declared partisan of universal suffrage, and had maintained that dangerous opinion on occasions, when it might be attended with the most mischievous consequences. What the hon. baronet may have said in other places, I know not. On this night he has not uttered one word to that effect, nor do I believe that he ever did maintain such a doctrine in this House. On the contrary, I understand him to disclaim it. But the hon. gentleman is just as severe on every other idea of parliamentary reform, as on that, which he particularly, and as I think, justly reprobates. He forgets how many great authorities, on all sides of this House, and in all quarters of the country, are involved in that general condemnation. Among the rest, he forgets that no man has gone further in exposing the defects in the representation, and in promoting a parliamentary reform, than my right hon. friend (Mr. Tierney) on the other side, who I am sure will never disavow his opinion, or desert the cause in which he was eminently distinguished, or the character of that society who acted with him in supporting it. The hon. gentleman says, that military appointments and commands exclusively belong to the crown, and that we should invade that part of the prerogative, if we attempted to inquire in what manner it was exercised. I hope I shall be able to show that the question, incidentally brought under the consideration of the House, and to which this opinion is applied, is connected with national interests, and ought not to be determined solely by individual discretion. But I must tell that hon. gentleman, that he mistakes the constitution of our government, if he conceives that this or any other exercise of the prerogative is a personal act of the sovereign. The king, in his royal character, acts by the advice of his privy council, and not otherwise. The wise purpose of this institution is not only that the sovereign may have the benefit of good advice, but that this House and the nation may know how to direct their inquiries, and where to fix their censure, if bad advice should appear to have been followed. The House, I believe, will support me in reprobating a doctrine, which converts the prerogative into personal will and pleasure, and annihilates some of the principal functions of parliament. The powers of war and peace are generally vested in the crown. But if, in the conduct of war, or in the transaction of peace, you thought there was ground for suspicion, or reason for inquiry, would you suffer ministers to plead the prerogative in bar of your proceeding? Would you endure to hear them say, what certainly the doctrine would warrant, "We have made war without necessity, and peace without security; but it is no affair of yours. War and peace belong to the prerogative. We owe you no account, and we shall give you no answer." I leave it to the hon. gentleman to consider, in what manner parliament ought to receive such language. I believe they would soon teach the minister, who held it, a very different lesson.—The motion of the hon. officer fairly opens the debate to all manner of considerations connected with the war, particularly with the expectation, for I disdain to call it the apprehension, of an invasion. If I rightly understand that part of the secretary at war's speech, which related to the probability of an invasion of this island by a French army, in force sufficient, not merely to do mischief, but to make a general and serious impression, and of its being attempted in the quarter against which it has been denounced, I confess I am inclined to concur in his opinion. To be convinced of the reality of such a design, I shall wait, as he does, to see whether the enemy in fact have resolution enough to come out of their harbours with the first division of their transports to anchor in deep water, and to wait there till the next tide for the second division, and possibly, till the tide following for the third. When I see that they have had the courage to encounter, and the good fortune to escape all the dangers and difficulties of such an operation, in the face of an enemy, who are masters of the sea, I shall begin to believe that they seriously think it practicable to invade England in that form, and that at all events they are determined to make the attempt, that is, from the ports of Holland and Flanders, and to land on the coast of Essex. If their purpose be, as it is stated, to march to London, of course they will endeavour to land on that part of the coast which is nearest to their object. Sir, I am far from wishing to abate preparation, or to encourage any other idea of security but that which depends on vigilance and activity. Still it is a point to be considered, whether the quarter in which the enemy must expect to find you best prepared, (because you have had most warning), be that exactly in which you are most likely to be attacked. A mistake in that speculation, may leave you open in some place, where you are much more vulnerable. Some of the reasons for the affirmative are rather extraordinary. Buonaparté has publicly and solemnly promised France, and threatened England, that he will invade this island, and march to the capital. He has engaged his word to his army, and to all Europe: of course he must keep it. He has pledged his honour, and he is bound to redeem it. Characters are easily made and unmade to suit an argument. Up to this period we have heard of nothing but the flagitious perfidy and falsehood of Buonaparté; that he is incapable of truth, and insensible of shame. But now, all of a sudden, he is turned into a person of such strict veracity, and scrupulous honour, that having once made a voluntary promise, or contracted a voluntary engagement, he would risk the fate of his army and of his government, as well as his own, sooner than break it; as if the very demonstration he holds out might not be a part of his policy, and intended to divert our attention from his real purpose. I have nothing to do with the morals of this man; but I am very unwilling to let him pass for a fool, lest we ourselves should be the dupes and possibly the victims of a false conception of his character. If the accounts we have heard of his personal deportment, and of the language he sometimes holds, be true, as I dare say they are, he is evidently a man without discretion in his conversation or temper, or even decency in his behaviour. So much the better for those who have to deal with him, if they know how to use their advantage. But I see no reason yet to believe, that in his political conduct, he is a mere idiot, who has not sense enough to keep his own secret, much less to mislead his opponent by false lights. Holland and Flanders are the only quarter where harbours and vessels can be found, equal to so great an embarkation as could answer any rational purpose of invasion; and with no other stores and provisions than would be indispensably necessary at the lowest computation. The distance is considerable. The management of a fleet of three or four hundred vessels is extremely difficult, even without being disturbed by an enemy. To such a fleet, crowded with landmen, the mere chances of the sea would be formidable. A long calm would be a great distress; a gale of wind might be fatal. The wind must not only be favourable, but moderate. A short passage would be essential to success; but then it must blow fresh, which would bring them on a lee shore, where they would find such a surf, as a great fleet so filled could not encounter without very considerable risk. Let it be granted, nevertheless, that by dint of good fortune, they have crossed the sea, and landed their army on the coast—What sort of an army will it be? without cavalry, without artillery, except perhaps a few field-pieces, and with just as much ammunition and bread as every soldier can carry for his own use. I shall even admit that, by some means or other, inconceivable to my understanding, they are permitted to march to London. On that supposition I shall only say, that this land would not deserve the name of England, it would not be a country, in which a man of common spirit would wish to exist, if a single soldier of that army returned to France, otherwise than by our permission.—Sir, it is not my intention to look back for any purpose of finding fault. I shall not inquire now, whether the measures of government, for raising the greatest possible national force, were the wisest in themselves, or whether some of them ought not to have been undertaken at an earlier period. In every thing that is well intended to resist and defeat the projects of France, there can be no difference of feeling in this House. At a numerous meeting of the county of Surrey, where I attended yesterday, there was but one voice and one sentiment on this subject. If it depended on me, the same unanimity should prevail here. Then comes the question, whether ministers have done all that they ought to do to establish that unanimity and to turn it to the best account? Of the utility of the measure referred to in the motion I do not pretend to be a competent judge. But this conclusion at least is indisputable, that, if a plan to surround London with lines or redoubts be adviseable, the execution of it ought not to be deferred till the enemy shall have landed. Works of so great an extent cannot be attempted, much less could they be well executed in the face of an enemy. If they are undertaken in a hurry, they will be executed in confusion, and probably do more harm than good. Imperfect defences, hastily erected, are soon upset, and in some cases turned against you. In looking to the other military measures adopted by government, for the security of the country, I am willing to presume that a sufficient force is provided. Is that all? Have they done enough? Have they omitted nothing indispensably necessary to a wise and vigorous application of the force in their hands? On the best of my judgment, and with the deepest conviction, my answer is, that their preparations are defective in two essential articles. The subject I know is delicate as well as important, and I hope to be heard with a favourable construction. By inrolling the nation, by raising a great body of men, by organizing these men under a variety of titles, and furnishing them with arms, all you have gained is a material or instrumental power. What I apprehend is, that, without other conditions and properties, the mass of such a power may be unmanageable and inactive, if not dangerous. The power must be animated by a great pervading spirit, to give it life and motion; and then it must be directed by wisdom and experience. Have ministers taken the most effectual course to call out such a spirit, and to provide for such a direction? Before the subject was introduced this night by my hon. friend (Mr. Barham), it was not unknown to me that an offer had been made by an illustrious personage, of his services in the present crisis; that he had requested to be employed wherever his appearance and example might be most effectual, and that his offer had been positively rejected. My attachment to his royal highness bars me from saying much of what I think and feel of the injury he suffers by that refusal. On that subject, therefore, I shall say nothing but what I should have equally said, on public ground, if I had not had the honour of being personally known to him. When the heir apparent, when the first subject, and the second person of the kingdom, desires nothing but that he may be allowed to share in the danger, and to contribute to the defence of his country, it is difficult to conceive, on what principle a request so reasonable and so honourable could have been refused. To say nothing of personal merits, is it fair that he alone, of all his illustrious family, should be excluded from such station and leading in the army, as might in some degree be suitable to his rank, as might give him an opportunity of acting up to his principles, and of showing the nation that he is worthy of the place he holds, and fit to stand first in the succession to the crown? To such a man, so stationed and so acting, is it just, is it honest to say, "He may live in obscurity, he may enjoy in retirement, the provision which parliament has made for his subsistence? His royal brothers shall be invited into action, but, as for the prince of Wales, we shall take care that the true spirit of his character shall not be understood. All means of acquiring personal honour, in this great emergency, shall be denied him. The nation shall not know how much he deserves their affections, or whether, beyond a mere legal right, he has any moral pretensions or generous qualifications to entitle him, to govern them hereafter." Sir, I am of opinion, that the character of the prince of Wales is public property, and that whatever is said or done to lower it in the estimation of the country is a public injury. We have a right to his services, and above all to his example. It is not what his single hand can do. Any other individual may do as much. I look to his appearance in the front of the contest, for the general animation it would inspire, for the spirit it would excite. What right have you to deprive the army and the people of the benefit of an example; which, you well know, the meanest man in the kingdom would be ashamed not to follow? In another view of your preparation, I see another great defect. I speak of things, not of persons; and surely it ought to be superfluous for me to say, that I have no wish to disparage any man, and least of all, his royal highness the duke of York.

If the first general whom this country has produced, if John duke of Marlborough were at the head of the army, I should say to him, what I say now, "Your occupations, your labours and your cares are more than any single person is equal to. Without the advice and assistance of a council to relieve you in the detail of business, to examine plans, to decide questions as they occur, and occasionally to act in your absence, it is not possible for you to give due attention to the other and still more urgent duties of your command." When I speak of a council, Sir, it is not with a view to direct or control the commander-in-chief in action or in the field; to instruct him where to march, when to fight, or how to retreat. These things for the most part belong to instant execution, and cannot in their nature be subject to a distant council. What I allude to would be such a military council as that which succeeded with our enemies in the course of the late war, as long as they made use of it. I mean the stationary council at Paris, of which Carnot was a member. I forget the other names. They prepared and digested the general plan of the campaign. They concerted general measures, and corresponded on every event with the commanders in the field: and I well remember, that the success of those campaigns was universally attributed to the wisdom of that council. Sir, the merit of delivering this opinion does not originate here. We owe it to the wisdom and resolution of a noble lord (earl of Suffolk), whom I have the honour and the happiness to call my friend, that advice to this effect has been offered in another place, where undoubtedly it was received with benignity, and must have made a due impression. For that act of public and personal spirit, he deserves the gratitude, and something more than the gratitude of his country. Whatever pretences may be set up to the contrary, I cannot think it possible that any member of this House should, in his heart and conscience, disapprove of the measure. If it be rejected on a division, considering the nature of the question, the real sense of the House will be proved by the strength of the minority. On the whole, my conclusion is, that the mass of your force is sufficient. Let that mass be animated by great examples, and governed by wisdom, and then let the designs of the enemy be what they may, this island is safe. But is it true that this is the quarter, in which an invasion is most likely to be attempted, or in which we are not best prepared and most able to repel it? Is it likely that the enemy will make their attack on that part of the empire, where they are sure to find a powerful direct resistance, supported by the union as well as courage of the whole people; and that they will neglect another avenue of invasion, where, falsely I hope, but not unnaturally, they may expect to meet with less resistance, and some co-operation. I hope his majesty's ministers have done something more effectual for the security of Ireland, than by furnishing the government there with many copies of a loyal address and a vigorous act of parliament. Assistance of that kind may be dispatched in a day; but I hope it will not be depended on without supplies of another nature. Pikes and bayonets are not to be opposed with paper. Against treason and rebellion, co-operating with invasion, if that should be attempted, a sufficient increase of real force must be provided, and no time lost in sending it. Concerning the actual government of that kingdom, I wish I could speak with entire and unreserved approbation. Though I have not the honour of knowing the noble lord (earl of Hardwicke) who is at the head of it, I willingly assent to the character lately given of him in this House. Courtesy, justice, and moderation are great and useful qualities in the government of any country, particularly of Ireland. But in these times, and in the actual situation of Ireland, other qualities are required. They call for vigilance and vigour, as well as justice and moderation. But of vigilance and vigour, at the moment when they were most wanted, I see no evidence. The Irish council appear to me not only not to have had, as surely they might, any previous intelligence of an intended insurrection, or any suspicion, as they ought to have had, of a rebellious conspiracy against his majesty's government, in prosecution of which the outrages were committed, but not even to have taken warning from an extraordinary discovery, made by accident, which ought to have put the council on its guard, which ought to have roused their attention, and engaged them to redouble their precautions, at least, for the safety of the capital. The insurrection happened on Saturday the 23rd of July. On the preceding Monday a powder mill by accident blew up in that part of Dublin called the Liberty of Meath. A powder mill, existing in such a place, was enough to excite suspicion; and still more the discoveries that followed the explosion. In or near the same house a large quantity of cartridges was found. A manufacture of pikes and other weapons was detected. If this unexpected discovery had made a proper impression, and if the most obvious precautions had been taken, I cannot but believe that the tragical event which followed, might have been prevented. Private letters, of considerable authority, lament and complain of the supineness of government. In the face of such facts, I cannot readily give credit to the accounts we have repeatedly heard in this House, of the general tranquillity which prevails over Ireland, and of the contented and peaceable temper of the natives. It is not natural, it is not credible, that all the causes of the opposite disposition should have been so readily forgotten, or that that disposition should have been so very soon extinguished. By fatal experience we are sure of the contrary. If it be said that the two kingdoms are united under one parliament, I ask in return, are the hearts of the Irish people united to Great Britain? If not, the union is a formality, and nothing else. The case is urgent indeed; I know of nothing that approaches to it in the magnitude of its consequences, if a real and effective course be not taken to prevent them. Nominal relief and speculative concessions will not convince the suffering majority of that people, that they really enjoy the same privileges, the same equality of government with ourselves, and that they are truly, and in fact as well as name, one nation with the English. Some days ago an hon. gentleman (Mr. Corry) proposed, and the House immediately granted, fifty thousand pounds to build churches in Ireland, and houses for the Protestant clergy to reside in. Where they have hitherto resided he did not mention. I then took the occasion to throw out an idea, which has long been revolving in my mind, and which I know prevails with several of my countrymen, and others much better acquainted with the internal state of Ireland than I am. I do not believe that what is yet left to make the emancipation of the Roman Catholics complete, is much regarded by the majority of that persuasion. The benefit of what remains to be done would reach but to a few. The condition of the rest would be very little mended by total emancipation, unless it were accompanied, as it ought to be, by other concessions. One of the principal grievances of the Roman Catholics, and heavy it is indeed on all ranks of that part of the Irish people, from him, who has something like a house and cloaths to cover him, to the naked wretch, who pines and starves with a family of beggars in a mud cottage, is the cruelty and oppression of forcing them to pay double tithes for the support of two ecclesiastical establishments. The united legislature of the empire has it now in its power to give that essential relief, which the justice of the case demands, but which it would have been in vain to expect from an Irish parliament. I submit the measure, for its reason and its prudence, to the consideration of his majesty's ministers. I urge it on their attention, for its indispensable necessity. On the subject of Ireland I shall venture to offer you one salutary suggestion more, and with that I shall conclude. In all human dealing, particularly in acts of justice or benevolence, the form and the manner are as effective as the substance. The benefit is doubled, when it comes through a favourite channel. If the French are determined to attempt an invasion, their object, with any rational prospect of success, must be Ireland. Your military force in that country may be great; but there is a moral power of defence and security, which armies cannot give you. You have it within your reach, if you are wise enough to make use of it. The service to be done points out the person to be employed. To recover the affections of Ireland, there does not exist, the world does not furnish so powerful an instrument as the illustrious prince, to whose name and character I have alluded. That any heart, which he wishes to win, should resist him — I do not believe it possible. If with those personal qualifications, so eminently possessed by him, and so peculiarly suited to the occasion, he were allowed to carry with him the justice, or, if you will, the mercy of the legislature to the Catholics of that unhappy country, from that moment the union would be realised. The hearts of the people would gather round him. Alienation and despair would be converted into affection, and the whole power of the country be devoted to its defence.

Sir F. Burdett, alluding to an expression of col. Craufurd's, that the prince of Wales had offered his services, and that his offer had been rejected, stated his regret that such rejection should have occurred; as at such a period as the present, the character of his royal highness would furnish a tower of strength to the country. The hon. baronet recommended the appointment of a military commission, and concluded with complaining of the general misrepresentations of his sentiments.

Sir W. Erskine approved of the idea of a military commission.

Mr. Fox moved an amendment, in support of which he stated, that the greatest abilities on earth, even those of the duke of Marlborough, would not be sufficient for the extent of the duties to which a commander in chief's attention must necessarily be directed at the present crisis. The words of his amendment were, "That an address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to appoint a military council, consisting of general officers, and such others as to his majesty should seem fit, for the purpose of giving their advice when called upon by his majesty respecting the defence of the country, and of being consulted occasionally, or from day to day, if necessary, by the commander in chief, and his majesty's ministers upon that important subject." He could not conceive why the services of the heir apparent had been refused. Was his royal highness too old? Was he too young? Was he made a colonel twenty-two years ago, by way of douceur, as a little pecuniary aid? Was he not known to be in the very prime of life, at the very period when man was capable of the utmost energy? The country, he added, had a right to expect some explanation upon this subject.

Mr. Tyrwhitt, of the prince's household, said:—An illustrious personage, in whose family I have the honour to be placed, having been so directly alluded to, I can no longer be silent. The Prince, from the very commencement of the war, has manifested an anxious wish to be placed in any military situation to which his majesty might be pleased to call him; which wish has been made known to his majesty's ministers. If the services of the illustrious personage alluded to have been rejected, I have proof that the fault does not lie at his door.

Mr. Barham strongly urged the propriety of giving a military command to the heir apparent.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said: No man is more ready to bear attestation to the feelings so worthy of the rank and character of the illustrious personage alluded to than I am. But having made this declaration, I must here pause, and declare, that nothing short of the commands of the king shall compel me to say one word more upon the subject.

Mr. Windham strongly enforced the necessity of a council of war, and thought at all events the Prince should have a command.

General Maitland spoke against the motion, and maintained that there was a council of war to all intents and purposes now existing.

Mr. Calcraft was for the council. He spiritedly observed: the Prince of Wales has been a colonel in the army from the year 1782; his brother is a field marshal and commander in chief; three younger brothers are lieutenant-generals; and you leave the heir apparent to the monarchy to fight for that crown which he is one day to wear, as a colonel of a regiment, under the command of a major-general, his own equerry.

Colonel Craufurd having withdrawn his motion; and the motion for the other orders of the day being also withdrawn, the House divided on Mr. Fox's motion:

Tellers.

|      |   |                         |   |    |
|------|---|-------------------------|---|----|
| YEAS | { | Col. Craufurd .....     | } | 38 |
|      |   | Mr. Sheridan .....      |   |    |
| NOES | { | Mr. Secretary at War .. | } | 63 |
|      |   | General Maitland .....  |   |    |

So it passed in the negative.

Debate on Mr. Sheridan's Motion for a Vote of Thanks to the Volunteers. Aug. 10. Mr. Sheridan rose to make his promised motion relative to the Volunteers. He said, it was of a nature which he flattered himself would meet the approbation of every man in the House: and he trusted that whatever zeal of opposition had been manifested on other occasions, there might at least be one cordial day before their separation—one day in which every consideration was lost sight of but devotion to the cause of our common country. In bringing forward the motion, he had no wish to interfere with what more strictly was the duty of the servants of the crown; but he could not but think that a motion such as he had to propose came with peculiar propriety from an individual who appeared in that House as a volunteer in the cause of this country. Before he proceeded, he wished it to be distinctly understood that his motion was intended to include every description of individuals whose services were voluntarily offered at this difficult and trying crisis. It would include volunteer corps, corps of yeomanry, and corps which were raised by patriotic gentlemen, and accepted by government. There were one or two points on which he wished to say a very few words. At present there existed some degree of doubt respecting the proper construction of the clauses of the bill for the general defence of the country; and also of the bill by which some ambiguities were meant to be removed. It was not sufficiently understood how far a voluntary offer to enter into a corps, previously accepted by his majesty, would exempt the individuals making this offer from the compulsory operation of the bills to which he had just now referred. It was the clear spirit of the act, that when any individual entered into a corps of the nature which he had described, he was henceforth freed from the operation of all the compulsory clauses of the act. The next point on which he wished to make a few observations was, the mode in which many volunteer associations conducted their cloathing. It could not have escaped notice that many thousand individuals, whose loyalty was undoubted, were prevented from entering into volunteer associations, from the heavy expense to which a gaudy fashionable dress would expose them. If the cloathing were more cheap, thousands whom no consideration but that which he had mentioned now deterred, would flock to the standard of loyalty. He could not but think that gentlemen in affluent circumstances would do themselves infinite honour by appearing in the plainest dress possible. It was not idle pomp or tawdry magnificence which was to entitle members of a volunteer association to the confidence of their country. In this trying crisis we were to look for salvation to fortitude, to heroism, to contempt of death. He rejoiced to find that a military disposition pervaded the land, and he wished that the effect might be visible in a general military appearance in the country. In Ireland, when the system of volunteers, carried to an extraordinary pitch, left a greater proportion of the regular troops disposable for foreign service, every man was to be seen in his uniform. At that period, every member of the Irish House of Commons appeared in the dress of his appropriate association; and the gallery exhibited an equally military appearance. The public officers of state imitated the example, and even the grave judges on the bench, under his professional gown, exhibited a uniform. He could not but think that the adoption of a similar practice would be productive of the most beneficial effects. Even if it had no other effect but to point out those who were lukewarm and disaffected, it might be productive of infinite advantage. As to the spot where volunteer associations were to be trained, the places allotted for this purpose should, in the first instance, be as secluded as possible. He needed not to remind the House that there were many individuals who would much more cheerfully expose themselves to the shot of the enemy than encounter the derision of motley spectators. Before he sat down, he begged leave to advert to some other considerations connected with the subject immediately before the House. No man had seen with greater pleasure than he had, the patriotic donations of which the gentlemen at Lloyd's coffee-house had set so illustrious an example. He confessed that liberal as the subscription already was, it was with surprise that he still observed the absence of several classes of the community which he expected to have seen the first on the list. He had no wish to say any thing harsh respecting the noble and honourable persons of whom those classes were composed. Though they had not yet come forward with their contributions, he had no doubt that they would not be deficient in devotion to their country at this trying moment, and that though they had not taken the lead, they would not show themselves deficient in generosity in so sacred a cause. When he looked to the amount of the fund at this moment, and when he considered how much greater it might become by the contributions of those classes to which he had referred, he could not help thinking that it might admit of a more extended application. Though originally designed solely to afford aid to the wives and relatives of those who perished while fighting their country's battles, it did appear to him that so large a fund, instead of remaining unapplied, might, to a certain extent, be employed in contributing to the direct service of the country. Rewards might be offered to those who were willing to volunteer the performance of important national services, and who might be deterred merely by the consideration that in their absence their families would remain without a provision. He would allude to another source of assistance; he meant the patriotic contributions of our fair country women. In a contest involving the preservation of all the charities and all the endearments of domestic life, he could not believe that they would be backward in patriotism. To their other charms he was confident they would add the charm of love to their country and their homes.—The hon. gentleman then proceeded to advert to the description of the force, to the individuals composing which his vote of thanks would be addressed. He was no military man, and professed no power to give the House information on the subject. In the course of many discussions which had lately taken place, it had however frequently occurred to him, that many of these details might have been well spared, whether proceeding from military or unmilitary members of the House. He must, in the face of authorities deservedly high in a military point of view, say, that, as a constitutional member of parliament, he thought the force which was now formed for the defence of the country one in which he was warranted in placing the amplest confidence. Military men were too apt to view every object with what they were pleased to call a military eye; but, with all their minuteness of observation, they were very apt to overlook one little fortress, which he should never cease to think of the highest importance, and that was the fortress of the constitution. If he were asked, whether he did not think a hundred thousand regular troops a more effectual body for the defence of the country than an equal number of militia, volunteers, and yeomanry, he certainly could have no difficulty in giving his answer. Undoubtedly, for every military purpose, such a regular force was superior. He would maintain, however, that in addition to a regular army of a certain magnitude, a force, consisting of militia, volunteers, and yeomanry, was a force more suited to the habits, the circumstances, the constitutional liberties of this country. In saying this he did not speak of an army for the purpose of carrying on a continental war, but a force such as it behoved us to keep up when the necessity of cultivating military habits was more imperiously imposed on us by the ambition of a foreign enemy, whom nothing could satisfy short of our destruction. He liked the force the better, because it was of a diversified character. In the first instance the preference was given to the regular troops; the militia, the volunteer corps, and the yeomanry succeeded in their claims to distinction. There was in such a force a connexion which must ever make it formidable to a foreign enemy. There was in its compositions a facility for separation, which, in a constitutional view, he should always regard with satisfaction. Great standing armies, however disciplined and powerful, were not to be implicitly trusted. He might refer to numerous examples in proof of this position. A most striking instance occurred in the army of France. Never was there an army better disciplined, more brave, or apparently more dependent on the throne; but that very army thus constituted, and on which every possible reliance was placed, in the course of a very few hours suffered the monarchy to be overturned, and the revolution to triumph. In making this allusion, it was the farthest in the world from his intention to impeach the loyalty of our regular army. On the contrary, he believed that no body of men were ever animated with truer or more affectionate attachment to their sovereign. He admired, however, the present constitution of our military force, as being exempted from the inconveniences and the evils which attached, to a certain degree, to all standing, exclusive, permanent armies. By such a constitution, the strength and efficiency of the whole was confirmed and consolidated. He liked the present attitude of the country, whether we looked forward to the continuance of war, or to the conclusion of peace.—On the subject of peace he should just say one word. He should be the ready advocate of peace, if it could be obtained on terms consistent with the national honour and safety. This, however, he would distinctly say, and he was sure that he spoke the language of his majesty's ministers when he made the declaration, that no peace could be formed, no negotiation could be listened to, no offer for negotiation could be accepted, while there was a hostile army in any part of the united empire. If he had supposed it possible for ministers to have entertained contrary sentiments, he should have felt it his duty to have brought forward a distinct proposition, that the minister who should listen to so disgraceful a proposition, would deserve to be impeached, and to lose his head as the punishment of his infamy. He stated it distinctly, therefore, as what he conceived was the unalterable resolution of ministers, that no proposal for peace should be entertained, while a single French soldier had a footing on British ground. [This sentiment was universally applauded.]—The hon. gentleman, after this patriotic effusion, went on to recommend unanimity on this interesting occasion. He did not call on gentlemen to give up their opinions. He did not wish by any means to dictate to them the course of political conduct which they were to pursue. Within the walls of that House every man had a fair right fully and unequivocally to declare his opinions on public affairs. He might be permitted, however, to entreat of gentlemen, that as the period of their separation was now at hand, they would not utter such sentiments out of doors; that they would not resort to any measures which could damp the increasing ardour and energy of the country; that they would not lend the sanction of their names to sentiments which, coming from unauthorized sources, had never been received with any portion of favour. All that he asked of them was, to suspend their political animosities for a moment; not to represent the servants of the crown as weak and inefficient, at a moment when confidence in their exertions was so necessary to the salvation of the country; not to waste that time, and those talents in party spirit and intrigue, which might be so much more worthily employed in performing the sublime and animated duties of patriotism. This was a moment which called on every honest man to unite heart and hand in support of all that is dear to us as a great and free people, against the greatest danger with which we were ever threatened. Let but this small sacrifice be made to patriotism, and when they once more assembled in that House, they might resume their favourite pursuits, under the pleasing consciousness, that they had contributed their efforts to the general safety. The hon. gentleman then moved, "That the Thanks of this House be given to the several Volunteer and Yemanry corps of the United Kingdom, for the zeal and promptitude with which, at a crisis the most momentous to their country, they have associated for its defence."

General Gascoyne hoped that the motion would be unanimously adopted. He thought, now that our regular army was so powerfully supported by the militia, and 300,000 volunteers, we should remove the seat of war out of our own dominions, and learn to threaten the threatener: we ought no longer to confine ourselves merely to defensive operations.

Mr. Windham wished it were in his power to gratify the hon. mover; but while the hon. gentleman deprecated discussion, he threw out so many things to provoke it, that it was impossible his wish could be complied with. If the hon. gentleman imagined he was going to oppose the vote, he was mistaken. It was among the fancies of the hon. gentleman that he had spoken with disparagement of the militia and the volunteer corps. With respect to the volunteer corps, he had not a doubt of their zeal and spirit; and he was satisfied that in the day of trial they would serve their country in a way becoming Englishmen. He had said nothing to give offence to the militia. The whole amount of what he had said was, that with all the zeal and spirit which he always allowed them, they did not possess those qualities of soldiers which it was impossible to possess without having been in action. With respect to the motion, it was one to which a man was induced to give his assent, because he could not dissent without disapproving. He had no objection to a vote of thanks. It was here in some instances, as in public places, where one joined in the applause, because he could make no other noise which would not have the effect of censure. But, if he were to speak as a volunteer, he should say, "For God's sake, keep your thanks till we have done something to deserve them." It should be considered, that the volunteer corps were but just formed, and that many had chosen volunteer service to avoid compulsory service. It should be recollected, that at other times we had had volunteers, who had come forward without any influence or compulsion, and that no thought was entertained of bestowing on them, in the first instance, a vote like that now proposed. All that the House of Commons had to give to the most distinguished services by sea and land was its thanks; and when volunteer corps were to receive those thanks for coming forward at such a crisis, with a service which they would otherwise be compelled to render, he feared that the highest and most valuable testimony of the most eminent service, would become less valuable. He should think it the proper time to vote the thanks of the House when they had expelled Buonaparté, or even now he should think it right to thank the Irish volunteers, for suppressing the rebellion; and when the House was called upon for such a vote, he thought there should at least have been some direction from his majesty. Here he should leave this subject; but there was another on which he should say a few words, and here he should lay the ground for this privilege under the prohibition of the hon. mover. The hon. gentleman's wish went to deprive the House of its most valuable functions: when no one was allowed to speak, no one could hear! and when no one was allowed to illumine, no one could be enlightened. This doctrine was rather new, and in his opinion, not very wise. He wished the hon. gentleman had been in the House when his hon. friend (Mr. Fox) had so properly exerted his abilities on a subject somewhat related to this on a former night. He condemned the principle of having recourse to volunteer corps instead of calling forth volunteer service in other modes. From the sort of training which these corps received, there was an opportunity of judging of the manner in which they would be brought into action. The companies would be collected into regiments, and the regiments formed into brigades. He did not think they would be good for any thing in that way; neither did he think, that any judicious officer would accept of them. It was not true that numbers always made strength; neither could that other comfortable saying, that if they did no good they could do no harm, be applied in this instance. They would incumber the movements, obstruct the roads, and consume the provisions—and, which should also be a main consideration, they would be a great depository of panic, if, as was not unlikely, they once caught it. Under all these disadvantages, any skilful officer, instead of accepting their services, would rather say, place them at a distance. Such an officer would consider them as a wrestler would regard heavy garments, and say, let me have clear ground, free from any incumbrance.

An armed population, when it was once trained, would furnish out of it corps more generally useful, and whose services and co-operation the best officers would think desirable. He regarded as the most essential instrument of defence a force like this, possessed of all the characteristics of a loose light infantry; quick in loading and firing. When the population of the country was thus trained, every where that the enemy moved, a host would hang on him, and follow him like a swarm of insects, for ever buzzing in his ears, for ever teasing, harassing, and annoying him. If, combined with this force, we had the advantage of fortifications, the utility of which had been so strongly enforced by the hon. colonel behind him (Craufurd), and large armies, for large armies we should have, the fate of the country would not depend on one or two pitched battles; but it would be one continued warfare, in which every inch of ground would be disputed both in advance and in retreat. This was his opinion as to the proper mode of executing the measure of general armament. If the idea had been taken up which he suggested, a large force would by this time have been half trained, and nearly ready to be applied to the services for which it may be thought advisable. There were some measures in which a great progress might be made at the very commencement, and others in which no progress could be made for a long time. This measure of general armament was one of the latter description, in which, though much had been done in parliament, no progress was yet made in fact. It was like a July brewing, which, with the delay of fermenting, drawing off, and bottling, would not be fit to drink till Christmas. His majesty's ministers were fond of clatter, and they thought that the machinery he recommended would do nothing, because it was silent. He considered it a very great absurdity to suppose, that what was known to every man in England was unknown to the government of France, he meant the actual state of preparation in which we were. On the mere question of the vote of thanks he had nothing to say, and therefore should do no more than to press most seriously the consideration of providing this force with arms; for without a proper attention to the state in which it was as to arms, no effectual aid could be expected from it. The hon. gentleman wished for unanimity, and in one sense he would have it. If unanimity was meant to apply to the defence of the country, there could be no doubt that this unanimity existed. He should wish to know what part of his conduct had embarrassed the public service, or given ground for the charge of factious opposition; and when he and those gentlemen who sat near him, were charged with such things, he wished the instances to be cited. He had the satisfaction to think that most of those measures on which he and his friends took an active part, were rendered more perfect in their passage towards the House, and that he and his friends contributed to the improvement. He also disclaimed the charge of factious opposition. He had not opposed all things indiscriminately. He had never once opposed a tax bill though he knew gentlemen in another opposition, who, during the course of ten years, never suffered a tax bill to pass without comment.—It was a bad thing to have a government in which the country could not confide; if it was true that the present government was such, the country should know it. If it was untrue, the attempt to establish the belief would give room for the refutation. It was worse than all to have a weak government and to confide in it; for then the country leaned on a broken reed, which would certainly let it down. When a government regulated itself by public opinion, the proper way to correct it was, to apply the correction through the public opinion, to which it looked up so much. He denied the principle, that because a government was under difficulties, it was therefore to be the more relied on. The increase of danger naturally created unanimity. The rebellion in Ireland had created a unanimity of this kind, and a French invasion would create it still more. He, therefore, protested against an unanimity which would go to preclude the right of censure, and when this was the last day of discussion, and there would be no other opportunity till the next session, he thought it his duty to avail himself of this right; and as the hon. gentleman proposed to carry his restriction still further, and to abridge the liberty of speech out of doors during the vacation, as he proposed to lock him and his friends up in this manner, and to put the key in his pocket;—he thought it proper at least to save their right, by his protest, lest it be considered as entirely lapsed and surrendered by disuse. Having said this, he had no objection that the motion should pass, and the hon. gentleman might if he pleased, go about as master of the ceremonies making his bow to every one of the corps, and returning them thanks where they were not at all expected.

The Secretary at War thought it strange, that the right hon. gentleman, who was such an advocate for a regular army, should prefer a much more imperfect training, to that which the volunteers would receive. He could not help wondering, that in the last war, the public should have heard none of the right hon. gentleman's objections to the militia and the volunteers. He was then secretary at war, and a cabinet minister; and it was his duty to have proposed those means of defence, that, in his judgment, appeared the best. In answer to the question, Why the thanks of parliament had not been given to those volunteers, who preserved Dublin from falling into the hands of the rebels? he should answer, Dublin never was in that dangerous situation, described by the right hon. gentleman, nor was it so much the volunteer force, as the regular army, that defeated the insurgents.

Mr. Wilberforce thought it a little premature to vote the thanks of the House to men, for merely doing what must be expected from Englishmen. He thought they ought to wait for solid services and more splendid achievements. In giving his opinion of the volunteer force in general, he appeared to coincide with Mr. Windham's idea, that the peasantry of the country, armed and acting as an irregular force, would be more efficacious. He thought it would give more room for the exercise and display of individual energy and courage. He instanced the wonderful and gallant exploits of sir Sidney Smith at Acre, and stated that that officer had declared, that if he had had any regular officers of engineers with him, he must have reported the place untenable and quitted it. He concluded by expressing a confidence that the country was equal to the situation it was placed in, and would finally triumph over all its difficulties.

Mr. Francis said, he hoped that the hon. mover had, before he pledged himself so warmly to the support of government, received sufficient satisfaction on two points about which he had been much interested: first, as to the appointment of a military council; secondly, as to the offer of service on the part of an illustrious personage.

Colonel Craufurd thought that it would be time enough to return thanks to the volunteers, when they had repelled the invasion with which this country is threatened. He did not much approve of the introduction of German tactics among our volunteers; he thought there was too much of it among the regulars, and that it was not well suited to such a country as this: he agreed with Mr. Windham, in preferring the people raised en masse and acting as an irregular force, to our volunteers, in the way they are trained and disciplined.

Lord Hawkesbury cordially approved of the vote proposed, as he thought the record of it on the Journals, would be an encouragement to future exertions.

Mr. Sheridan made a brilliant reply to the arguments against his motion, which he had supposed would have past unanimously, and without much discussion. As to the questions put to him by Mr. Francis, he said, that neither the non-appointment of a military council, nor even the rejection of the offer of the prince of Wales, to whom he was so much attached, were sufficient to prevent him giving his support to the government, at a time so critical as the present. He believed the prince's feelings might be expressed in the language of lord Moira, who said he should rather serve as a private in the ranks, than divide the public opinion about his claims, when unanimity was so essentially necessary. He then animadverted, with severity, on the tendency of the speeches which had been delivered in that House, by Mr. Windham and his friends.

The motion was agreed to nem. con. As well also the following, "That a return be prepared, to be laid before this House in the next Session of Parliament, of all Volunteer and Yeomanry corps whose services shall have been accepted by his Majesty, describing each corps in order that such return may be entered on the Journals of this House, and the patriotic example of such voluntary exertions transmitted to posterity."

Debate on Mr. Hutchinson's Motion respecting the State of Ireland.] August 11. Mr. Hutchinson rose, to submit a motion relative to the affairs of Ireland. He began by stating how material it was in the present juncture to enable his majesty to avail himself of all the resources which every part of the empire was capable of affording, and how desirable it therefore was, to put Ireland in such a situation as to make her natural strength her wealth, and population available for the common safety of the empire. The unanimity which appeared in this country was a source of joy to every loyal mind; but the joy of an Irishman was considerably allayed, by the reflexion that so many of his countrymen were, by the oppression they endured, by the wretched poverty they suffered, damped in their ardour for the public security, if not altogether alienated in their affections for the British government. To remedy this misfortune, he called upon ministers to attend to the state of Ireland, and to reform radically the system by which it had been so long governed. He called upon parliament to consider this subject, and upon ministers to recollect the solemn pledges made to the Irish people at the time of the union. The hon. member then entered into a comparison of the systems on which the government of the two countries was managed, and contended that they were essentially different—the people of England enjoying the privileges of the constitution, and the advantages and profits of industry, to both of which the people of Ireland were almost entire strangers; for the Revolution of 1688, which gave liberty to the former cramped the industry of the latter, and laid the foundation of the discords which had since desolated that unhappy country. Under the beneficent reign of his present majesty, the greater part of the penalties which disgraced the Statute book, as applying to the difference of religious sentiments, had been expunged, but so long as any part of this vicious system was suffered to exist, it would be idle to calculate on the peace of Ireland. If any doubt was entertained of the melancholy situation of Ireland, let a deputation be appointed by the House to investigate the state of the poor, and to report their opinion to parliament after the recess. This was one of the means to which ministers ought to resort, to put parliament in possession of the most authentic information. The residence of the land owners in Ireland ought by some means to be enforced, at least some branch of each family. If the just expectations of the people of Ireland were satisfied, we should be qualified to despise the menaces of the insatiable despot, by whose machinations alone the horrible atrocity lately committed in Dublin was to be attributed. That any part of his countrymen could be so deluded as to trust to the professions of such a tyrant, or count upon any good to their country through his interference, was to him a source of the most sincere regret; but of this delusion he trusted that the benevolent interpositions of this House would cure them. It might be said, that ministers had it in contemplation to bring forward a better system for Ireland, but that it was not yet prepared. The case, however, did not admit of delay. From the time that the late minister had accomplished the union, nothing had been done to render that measure complete. To him, as an English minister, it certainly was a great object to attain; if he really did not mean to propose some conciliatory measures, he must have been either a blockhead or a knave: but it was understood that he did. The present minister, however, had shown no disposition to do any such thing. The hon. member proceeded to describe the happy consequences which would result from the appointment of the Prince of Wales to the lord lieutenancy of Ireland. If his majesty would give this farther proof of his parental attachment to his Irish subjects, and his royal highness would condescend to accept of it, his character, which was in still higher estimation than his high rank, would excite a degree of unparalleled enthusiasm throughout all Ireland. The disposition of this illustrious personage, and his known attachment to the Irish people, would naturally enough produce such a sentiment—but there was little hope that they would have the happiness of his Royal Highness's presence. The same evil genius which prevented his Royal Highness from being called into employment when the empire was pronounced in danger, would, no doubt interpose its baneful influence, to preclude Ireland from enjoying this felicity. If any commotion should take place in Ireland during the recess, the hon. member recommended government to meet it with vigour; but exhorted them to send positive orders, that no cruelty should be practised, that vigour should be blended with humanity; that the measures which the loyalists resorted to in 1798, should not be allowed, for they would only tend to create thousands of rebels. He hoped they would never again occur, and that we should hear no more of houseburnings, of pillages, or tortures! [hear, hear.] There were some gentlemen who doubted that such tortures had ever taken place, and that there were some who denied it altogether; but he would refer such persons to the authority of lord Cornwallis, who humanely and wisely put a stop to that horrid practice, and to the noble lord (Castlereagh), who knew enough of the proceedings in Ireland, and who had much to answer for his conduct in that country. But, if farther authority were wanting, he would refer to one of the last acts of the last parliament of Ireland, which affixed to their character a most memorable badge of disgrace. The act to which he alluded was the indemnity bill, which extended protection to the sheriff of Tipperary, and other magistrates—a bill which cheated men of the verdicts for damages obtained in a court of justice; a bill which imposed upon the plaintiffs in actions the necessity of proving that the magistrates, against whom such actions were brought, were not actuated in the conduct charged against them by a wish to put down rebellion. He concluded with moving, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he will be graciously pleased to direct that there be laid before this House such information as has been received respecting the late rebellious outrages in Ireland, and the present state of that part of the united kingdom."

Lord Hawkesbury considering the state of affairs abroad, the great measures adopting at home, and the number of members gone to the different places which most immediately required their presence, to give effect to the very measures which parliament had adopted, could not help saying, that this motion was highly inexpedient. If the motion were adopted, it could not meet with that investigation which the subject would necessarily demand. He had no idea of resisting any application for information to that House; but then, the information must be asked for on the ground that it was to be followed up by some practical proceeding for the benefit of Ireland, which could not be the case in the present state of the session. He saw nothing in this motion which tended to be of any advantage to Ireland. The possible effect of agreeing to it was that of unhinging the minds of the people. He had no difficulty in saying, that motions founded upon alleged grievances should never be assented to, unless those who stated the grievances were provided with some remedy for them. He did not believe that those which were stated to be the cause of the evils of Ireland had any connexion with them, nor did he believe that some of the remedies which had been mentioned would have the effect of removing these evils. He thought the motion pregnant with evil and should resist it.

Mr. Elliot said, that if no person of greater weight than himself had undertaken it, he should have felt it his duty to have brought this subject under the contemplation of the House previous to the close of the session. Had he been in his place when the king's message was debated; he should have concurred in the measures adopted by the House, because he thought the emergency required promptitude and decision: at the same time, he should have felt that he voted partly on a compulsory and temporary confidence in the declarations of ministers, and partly on the intelligence contained in private letters from Ireland: for there never was so grave a parliamentary proceeding taken on such a paucity of parliamentary information. The only parliamentary document that had accompanied his majesty's message was, the lord lieutenant's proclamation, which stated, that lord Kilwarden and his nephew had been murdered, and that there had been rebellious outrages in some of the streets of Dublin; but it did not mention that the king's troops had been fired upon, or that concealed communications and treasonable proclamations had been discovered; nor did it specify any circumstance which indicated a rebellious confederacy of so wide and extensive a nature as could justify so violent an encroachment on the constitution as the Martial law bill. There were, however, other reasons which induced him to deprecate the separation of parliament, without a due knowledge of the present state of Ireland; one was, the inauspicious ignorance which ministers had manifested in respect to the affairs of that country. He was afraid, too, there had been some very reprehensible remissness on the part of the executive government of Ireland. He had heard that intelligence had, for several weeks before the late outrages in Dublin been offered to the Irish government, stating indications of the existence of a treasonable confederacy in the country, but that such communications had been treated with indifference. In fact, the Irish government had been, in spite of the multiplied intimations they had received, completely surprised. The garrison had been so little prepared, that the troops from the barracks did not reach the part of the town, in which the rising happened until some hours after the commencement of the tumult, and the insurrection was suppressed entirely by the exertions of a volunteer corps, called the Liberty Rangers, and a very small detachment of the 21st regiment, which happened to be in the quarter of the city, where the commotion began. He must add, too, that the volunteers were very scantily supplied with ammunition. Under these circumstances, it would not be decent to suffer the session to terminate without calling for information. He repeated, that he thought the House ought to have the information: 1st, to justify itself for the measures it had lately passed; 2ndly, because there had been supineness on the part, both of the English and Irish government; and 3dly, because it was the duty of parliament to possess itself of the actual state of Ireland.

Lord Castlereagh said, there was manifestly in this motion great danger, if the House should comply with it; for if government brought forward the information called for, the statement would present to the House a partial account, upon which they could not judge fairly. The House would therefore not require, because it would not determine, upon information that was imperfect. There was no ground for this motion by way of reference to former proceedings. On the former occasion, the House had acted on his motion for the renewal of martial law in Ireland; the ground on which he urged that subject was, the immediate danger; but he rested it on the foundation of a precautionary system. There were no arguments at that time on the subject of the production of all information in the hands of government; the argument then was an argument upon the inconvenience of delay, and parliament thought they best discharged their duty by granting that power to government for a short period, and leaving the matter to be re-considered when the time should expire. His hon. friend had accused the government of Ireland of not taking measures of precaution. Now, the amount of the daily guard in Dublin was very great. There was nothing in the nature of the rebellion in Thomas-street, that demanded more force than the government had brought against the rebels. There was no proof that the arrangements made by government on that occasion were not adequate to the protecting of the city.—As to the censure which had been cast on the executive government or parliament of Ireland, he considered that that parliament had shown itself as jealous of public liberty as any body of men had ever been, under circumstances similar to theirs. The clause inserted in an act of parliament for the protection of the magistrates who had suppressed the rebellion, was a just and wise one. In some cases there had been excess of authority, and actions were brought by persons who had suffered by such excesses. Juries adopted in some cases a wrong rule of decision; which was, to call on the defendant in such actions to show the cause of his conduct, and to find a verdict against him if he could not do so to their satisfaction. This introduced a complication of hardships upon magistrates, from the death of witnesses, and a thousand other circumstances incident to a rebellion. Parliament, therefore, enacted, that the court should call on the plaintiff to prove the malus animus of the defendant before a verdict should pass against him; and this he maintained was an act of justice. The noble lord proceeded to defend the government of lord Camden and lord Cornwallis, and observed, that they were remarkable for lenity; that the military power had never been employed, except where the civil power had been tried in vain. As to outrages, there had been many on both sides, but there never was a rebellion without them. The distress of Ireland as well as the disposition to rebellion, had been much exaggerated. No power in Europe had made more rapid strides in wealth and general happiness for the last fifteen years, than that part of the British empire had done. The hon. gentleman did not state the proposition which should follow the discussion; but even if he had, what means were there, at this instant, of carrying that proposition into effect? It would be useless to talk of grievances without showing what they specifically were, where they were to be found, or what the remedies for them were, and that at a moment like the present,

Mr. Windham thought the motion, the information sought, and the observations made by the hon. mover, were not of a nature to do any mischief; but that, on the contrary, much good must result from it. The government of Ireland appeared to him, in spite of repeated warnings, to have suffered itself to be completely surprised. He denied that the merit of putting down the rebellion, belonged principally to the regulars; it was the volunteers, assisted only by the 21st regiment, who put down the rebellion. The plot of the rebels, was as extensive in its confederacy, as sudden in its execution; and if it had not happened that some of the insurgents were intoxicated, and that lord Kilwarden passed that way before the time fixed for their acting, he thought it probable, that the insurgents would have carried the castle of Dublin. He then defended generally, the tenor of his speeches, during the session. He was accused of alarming and frightening the people of this country; but it was in vain to attempt to rouse people to defend themselves, without pointing out the danger.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer accused the right hon. gentleman of himself showing that tardiness and indecision which he imputed to others, when on a former day he hesitated to vote the customary address of thanks to his majesty, for the communication respecting Ireland. On such an occasion as that, delay would have been ruinous; and yet the right hon. gentleman was for delay. As to the general state of Ireland, it would be foolish to suppose, that that spirit which had before manifested itself in rebellion so widely extended, should now be completely extinguished; yet he believed it had abated considerably of its violence, and that numbers of persons, in that country, who were formerly disaffected, had now entirely quitted the cause of rebellion, and would be ready to join in the defence of the country, against any invader.

Dr. Laurence said, he considered the motion to be perfectly proper, and contended that the government of Ireland had suffered itself to be surprised. He did not object to the measures which had been adopted with regard to Ireland; he only complained that they had been adopted without sufficient information having been laid before parliament. He repeated the charge against ministers, of procrastination in their measures for the public security. If the information called for could be granted with safety, he hoped it would not be refused.

The Attorney General said, that the only practicable means of carrying the motion into effect would be, to address the king not to prorogue parliament; a measure which he did not suppose any gentleman would recommend at a period, when the presence of gentlemen was so necessary in the country. It had been said, that a committee might be appointed to sit during the prorogation, for the purpose of examining into the state of Ireland. But the only way in which such a committee could be instituted was, by an act of parliament: and he would venture to say, there was not a precedent for such a measure on the Journals of the House. There were besides great constitutional difficulties in the way of such a measure; because a committee so constituted would be independent of the power of the House, and of the prerogative of the crown. The hon. gentleman had recommended this, in order to show the people of Ireland the vigilance with which their affairs were attended to. But it would show a strange kind of vigilance to agree to a measure of this kind on the last day of a session, when it could not be attended with any practical good effect.

Earl Temple said, he should support the motion, because he thought it important to know whether government was in possession of information sufficient to enable them to act decisively sooner than they had done. Adverting to the occurrences which had taken place in Dublin, he observed, if government had previous information of what was going forward, they ought to be brought to a severe account for it. Had they in such a case speedily come forward with vigour and decision, the life of lord Kilwarden, and many others, might have been saved. He censured the precautions taken by the government of Ireland for the security of its capital, as inadequate and insecure.

Mr. Hutchinson, in reply, defended his motion upon the grounds of the necessity that existed to examine the situation of Ireland. He still retained the same sentiments with respect to the act of indemnity which had been passed by the Irish parliament. Dreadful enormities had been committed by several persons during the last rebellion under the mask of law. When the injured parties afterwards brought their actions, this law was pleaded, in order to screen the offenders from the punishment due to their crimes. When he brought forward his motion, his intention was, to call the attention of government to the affairs of Ireland. He did not now expect a system, but merely wished that ministers should turn their attention to the subject. He had not the most distant idea of throwing any reflexion on the present government of Ireland. As far as he had had an opportunity to observe the conduct of lord Hardwicke, there never was a lord lieutenant more calculated to conciliate the affections of the people. To say that the state of Ireland ought to be inquired into, could not have a tendency to excite rebellion. On the contrary it must have a completely opposite effect. He contended, that the rebellion had nothing to do with religion. Most of the leaders were Protestants, and the first seeds were sown in the north, where the number of Catholics was less than in the south. He adverted to the emancipations of the Catholics, for which he had voted in the Irish parliament; but he would not have started that subject, if it had not been done before. He concluded by observing, that unless some dispositions were shown to conciliate Ireland, it would be humanity at once to annihilate it.

The motion was negatived.

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Money Bills.] August 12. His Majesty came this day in state to the House of Peers, when the usher of the Black Rod was sent to command the immediate attendance of the Commons; who forthwith appeared at the bar.

Mr. Speaker Abbot then addressed his majesty as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"Your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burghesses, of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in parliament assembled, have at length completed the supplies granted to your majesty for the service of the present year—a period memorable for the events which it has produced, and awful for those which may be yet to come.

"In granting those supplies, your majesty's faithful Commons have considered that a crisis without example, demanded unexampled efforts, and, by resolving to raise annually a large proportion of the supplies for the current year, so long as the war may endure, they have given to all the world a solemn pledge of their inflexible determination to render public credit unassailable.

"They have also proceeded to revise the system of your majesty's permanent revenue. By consolidating the duties in each of its principal branches, they have simplified its operations, and at the same time they have endeavoured to render its pressure less burthensome, by regulating its mode of collection.

"The commercial interests of this country, to which our attention was called by your majesty's gracious commands at the commencement of the present session, have been maturely considered; and measures have been taken for affording material accommodations and facilities to mercantile transactions, by rendering our principal ports free for all nations to import, deposit, and re-export their merchandise, without toll or tax, unless voluntarily brought into our own market for home consumption.

"Nor have we forgotten to bestow our earnest and serious thoughts upon the safety and efficacy of our church establishment, in every part of the united kingdom. Upon this subject, as comprehending all that consecrates our rational hopes, morals, and policy, we have deliberated with peculiar care and anxiety; and we presume to believe, that the important laws which have been passed in aid of our church establishment will materially strengthen and gradually extend its influence through succeeding ages.

"But, Sire, these were cares and objects belonging to times of peace. Wise, politic, and desirable as they might be, nevertheless, called upon now by your majesty's commands, we have without hesitation turned all our thoughts and efforts to meet the renewal of war, persuaded that your majesty's paternal care preserved to us the blessings of peace so long as they could be retained with safety and honour, and confident that since they have been openly attacked, and the justice of our cause has been made manifest to the world, our appeal to arms will not be in vain.

"This war we see and know to be a war of no ordinary character. We feel that our religion, laws, and liberties, and existence as a nation, are put to the issue, and we have prepared for the contest accordingly. Besides the supplies of money, we have augmented, beyond all former example, every species of military force known in this country—we have met rebellion with prompt and necessary laws—and for the defence of a sovereign, endeared to us by long experience of his royal virtues, and commanding not our allegiance alone, but our hearts and affections, the whole nation has risen up in arms.

"May then the God of our Fathers go forth with us to battle, and bless our cause, and establish with victory that throne which we revere as the bulwark of our liberties; and so shall other nations at length learn, that a free, valiant, and united people is unconquerable, and able to set lasting bounds to an empire of violence, perfidy, and unrelenting ambition. To the bills which I have now humbly to present to your Majesty, your Commons with all humility, entreat your Majesty's royal assent."

The King's Speech at the Close of the Session.] After the royal assent had been given to the said bills, his Majesty delivered the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I am at length enabled, by the state of public business, to release you from your long and laborious attendance in parliament. In closing the session, I have the utmost satisfaction in expressing the strong sense which I entertain of the zealous and unwearied regard for the welfare and honour of your country which has distinguished all your proceedings.

"During the continuance of peace, your conduct manifested the just view which you had taken of our actual situation and of the dangers against which you were peculiarly called upon to provide; and since the recurrence of hostilities, you have displayed an energy and promptitude which had never been surpassed, in the means which you have supplied for the defence of the country, and for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

"Your proceedings, in consequence of the late treasonable and atrocious occurrences in Ireland, will, I trust, have the effect of preventing any further interruption of its internal tranquillity; and of convincing my loyal subjects in that part of the united kingdom, that they may confidently rely on that protection to which they are so justly entitled.

exigency of the times, you have not been unmindful of other objects, to which I had directed your attention; and I have great satisfaction in observing that you have completed a system for consolidating the duties, and regulating the collection and management of the several branches of the revenue, and that you have adopted measures which are calculated to afford material accommodation to the mercantile part of the community, and to encourage and extend the navigation and commerce of my dominions.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons;

"I return you my particular thanks for the liberality and readiness with which you have granted the supplies for the public service. It is painful to me to reflect, that the means of necessary exertion cannot be provided without a heavy pressure upon my faithful people; but I cannot sufficiently applaud that wisdom and fortitude which have led you to overlook considerations of temporary inconvenience, for the purpose of preventing a large accumulation of debt during the continuance of the war. You may be assured that there shall be as strict an attention to economy on my part as may be consistent with those preparations and exertions which will be best calculated to frustrate the designs, and to weaken the power of the enemy, by whose arrogant pretensions and restless ambition alone these sacrifices have been rendered unavoidable.

"My Lords; and Gentlemen,

cessation of your parliamentary duties, you will continue to be actuated by the same spirit which has been uniformly displayed in your councils. It will be your duty to assist in carrying into effect those important measures which your wisdom has matured for the defence and security of the realm; and particularly to give the most beneficial direction to that ardour and enthusiasm in the cause of their country which animate all classes of my people.

"Justly sensible of the state of pre-eminence in which it has pleased the Almighty to support us for so many ages amongst the nations of Europe, I rely with confidence that, under the continuance of his Divine protection, the exertions of my brave and loyal subjects will prove to the enemy and to the world, that an attempt to subvert the independence, or impair the power, of this united kingdom, will terminate in the disgrace and ruin of those by whom it may be made; and that my people will find an ample reward for all their sacrifices, in an undisturbed enjoyment of that freedom and security which, by their patriotism and valour, they will have preserved and insured to themselves and their posterity."

The Lord Chancellor then, by his Majesty's command, prorogued the parliament to Thursday, the 6th of October. It was afterwards further prorogued until Tuesday the 22nd of November 1803, on which day it met for the dispatch of business.

END OF THE

FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE YEAR 1803.

FROM WHICH LAST-MENTIONED EPOCH IT IS CONTINUED DOWNWARDS

"HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES."

March, 1820.

PARLIAMENTARY WORKS.

THE following Works, which will be found peculiarly interesting and useful to every Member of Parliament, Statesman, and Lawyer, are in the course of Publication by Baldwin, Cradock, and Joy; Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, and Brown; J. M. Richardson; Black, Kingsbury, Parbury, and Allen; J. Hatchard and Son; J. Ridgway and Son; E. Jeffery and Son; J. Booker; Rodwell and Martin; R. H. Evans; Budd and Calkin; J. Booth; and T. C. Hansard.

I.—THE PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the earliest period to the year 1803;—from which last-mentioned Epoch it is continued downwards in the Work entitled, “Hansard’s Parliamentary Debates.”

* * In the Edinburgh Review, No. 49, June 1815, p. 208, note, mention is made of this Work in the following words: “‘The’ (New) ‘Parliamentary History.’ We cannot quote this careful and judicious Collection without bearing testimony to its singular merits. It deserves, as well as the New Edition of the State Trials, to be numbered among the most useful and best conducted Works of late years. Both are indispensable parts of all collections of English History. To mention two such important Works, in a note on the review of so worthless a publication as that before us, may seem to be a treatment very unsuitable to their importance. The truth is, that it has long been intended to notice them more becomingly: that such an intention is far from being now relinquished; but that experience of the accidents which are apt to delay the execution of literary projects induces us to take the earliest opportunity of apprising all our readers of their great value.”

II.—THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, from the Year 1803, to the present time:—forming a continuation of the Work entitled, “The Parliamentary History of England from the earliest period to the Year 1803.” Published under the superintendence of T. C. Hansard.

The Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Volumes of this Work, containing the Proceedings in both Houses during the last Session, are ready for delivery. Complete Sets may still be had of the Publishers; but the Volumes containing the Debates of any particular Session, may be purchased separately.

* * All Communications for the Work, if forwarded to Mr. WRIGHT, No. 5, Panton Square, or to Mr. T. C. HANSARD, Peterborough Court, Fleet Street, will be carefully attended to.

III.—HOWELL'S STATE TRIALS,

In Royal 8vo. Price 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* boards,

Vol. XXVII, being the Sixth of the Continuation of

A COMPLETE COLLECTION OF STATE TRIALS and Proceedings for High Treason and other Crimes and Misdemeanors from the earliest Period to the Year 1783, with Notes and other Illustrations: compiled by T. B. HOWELL, Esq. F. R. S. F. S. A., with a Continuation to the present time by his son T. J. HOWELL, Esq.
